MODIUS. The modius or bushel measure is sometimes represented on Christian tombs. Martigny refers to Lupi's Dissertations, &c., on the Epitaph of the Martyr Severus, p. 51, tab. viii., for the best known example. The inscription over a Christian named Maximinus says that "he lived 23 years the friend of all men;" and his effigy is carved on the stone with a rod in his hand, and a bushel full of corn, from which ears are springing, is placed near him. Padre Lupi thinks this is an allusion to Luke vi. 38—the full measure, pressed down and running over, which Maximus hoped for in death; or to the grain of corn sown and washing away in earth, to bear much fruit, John vii. 24. And he gives another example of the modius in Boldetti, p. 371, from the tomb of a Christian named Gorgonius. He observes, however, very sensibly and truly, that Maximus may have been a mensor cereris augustae, or have had some connexion with the corn-trade, and quotes a further instance of the modius on the tomb of a baker, one Vitalis (BITALIS), dated 401. There is no reason why the survivors should not have attached the symbolism of the Lord's wheat and garner, or of His reward, to the usual signs of the business in which the dead had been engaged; and some disputes might be saved as to Christian symbolism if we consider that in primitive days as well as our own, devout and imaginative people saw and delighted in meanings which may have been overlooked then, as now, by people equally good but more matter of fact. Martigny refers to his article, Instruments et Emblemes représentés sur les tombeaux chrétiens, p. 324, Dict., the first part of which enumerates emblems of the trades of the smith, woolcomber, husbandman, baker, and surgeon. See FOSSOR.

I. GENERAL HISTORY OF MONASTICISM.

—The history of monasticism is one of the strangest problems in the history of the world. For monasticism ranks among the most powerful influences which have shaped the destinies of Christendom and of civilisation; and the attempt to analyse it philosophically is more than usually difficult, because the good and the evil in it are blended together almost inextricably. To those who contemplate it from a distance, wrapped in a romantic haze of glory, it may appear a sublime and heroic effort after superhuman excellence. To others approaching it more nearly, and examining it more dispassionately, it seems essentially wrong in principle, though accidentally productive of good results at certain times and under certain conditions. They regard the blemishes which from the first marred the beauty of its heavenward aspirations, as well as the more glaring vices of its later phases, as inseparable from its very being. To them it is not so much a thing excellent in itself, though sometimes perverted, as a mistake from the first, though provoked into existence by circumstances, not an aiming too high, but an aiming in the wrong direction. By declaring "war against nature," to use the phrase of one of its panegyrists (Montal. Monks of the West, i. 357), it is, in their eyes, virtually "fighting against God." In their judgment it degrades man into a machine. In their estimation the monk shunning the conflict with the world is not simply deserting his post, but courting temptations of another kind quite as perilous to his well-being. In brief, far from being an integral and essential part of Christianity, it is in their eyes a morbid excrescence.

Monasticism, in the proper sense of the word, cannot be traced back beyond the 4th century. Almost from the very commencement of Christianity ascetics are mentioned (ἀσκηταί, σπουδαίοι, ἐκλεκτοὶ ἐκλεκτοτέροι), persons, that is, pre-eminent in the Christian community for self-denial and sanctity; but these were "in the world," though not "of it." In the 3rd century eremites or hermits began to form a distinct class in the East and in Africa; in the 4th they began to be organised in coenobitic communities. The origin of monasticism has sometimes been imputed to a growing indifference to faith in the Atonement (e. g. Hospinian de Orig. Monachatus, Epist. Dedic.), but it would be easy to cite passages from Augustine and other panegyrists of monks conclusive against this theory as inadequate, if not altogether groundless. Rather the origin of the monastic life is to be found partly in the teaching of the schools of Alexandria, partly in the social state of the world external to Christianity. The luxury and the profligacy of the Roman empire even more than its outbursts of persecuting fury alienated the most earnest disciples of the Cross from taking their part in things around them and drove them far from the haunts of men, inspired by the passionate longing of the Psalmist for "the wings of a dove," that they might "fly away into the wilderness and be at rest." The causes at work were many and complex. To the timid and indolent the monastery was a refuge from the storms of life; it was a prop and a defence against themselves to the weak and wavering; to the fanatic it was a short and speedy way to heaven; to the ambitious, for the haughtiness which was its especial bane in later days, soon intruded into the cell, it was a pedestal from which to look down on the rest of mankind; to men of nobler temperament it seemed, according to the notions then becoming prevalent, the only fulfilment of what have been called "the counsels of perfection." (Chrys. adv. Opp. Vit. Mon. i. 7 et passim; Socr. H. E. iv. 23, 4; Soz. H. E. i. 12–15, iii. 14; vi. 28–34.)

Monasticism was not the product of Christianity; it was its inheritance, not its invention; not its offspring, but its adopted child. The old antagonism between mind and matter, flesh and spirit, self and the world without, has asserted itself in all ages, especially among the nations of the East. The Essenes, the Therapeutae, and other Oriental mystics, were as truly the precursors of Christian asceticism in the desert or in the cloister, as Elijah and St. John the Baptist. The Neoplatonism of Alexandria, extolling the passionless man above the man who regulates his passions, sanctioned and systematised this craving after a life of utter abstraction from external things, this abhorrence of all contact with what is material as a defilement. Doubtless the cherished remembrance of the martyrs and confessors who in the preceding centuries of the Christian era had triumphed over many a sanguinary persecution, gave a fresh impulse in the 4th century to this propensity for asceticism, stimulating the devout to vie with their forefathers in the faith by their voluntary endurance of self-inflicted austerities.

Some of the various terms used by early Christian writers for the monastic life shew how it was commonly regarded, and illustrate its twofold origin. The monks are frequently termed "the philosophers," and the monastery their "school of thought" (φιλόσοφοι; φροντήριον, σχολή, &c.), as the successors and representatives of Greek philosophy. They are termed "the lovers of God," "the servants of God" (φιλόθεοι, θεραπευταί, servi Dei, famuli Dei, &c.), as being the lineal descendants of Hebrew prophets and seers. As undergoing a discipline of extraordinary rigour, as inuring themselves to hardships, like good soldiers, stripping themselves of every encumbrance, and drilling themselves for the warfare with Satan, they are called "the renouncers," the "athletes of Christ," and the scene of their self-imposed toils and struggles is their "wrestling-yard" or "gymnasium" (ἀποταξάμενοι, renunciates; παλαίστρα, ἀσκητήριον, &c.). They are called endearingly "fathers" (nonni, abbates), by way of affectionate reverence; "suppliants," as giving themselves to prayer (ἱκέται); "the angelic," as leading the life of angels (ἰσαγγελοι, coelicolae); "fellow-travellers" (συνοδίται); "dwellers in cells" (cellulani). Their abodes are called "holy places" (σέμνεϊα), "seats of government" (ἡγουμενεϊα), "sheepfolds" (μάνδραι). The terms monastery (μοναστήριον), originally the cell or cave of a solitary hermit, laura (λαύρα), an irregular cluster of cells, and coenobium (κοινόβιον), an association of monks, few or many, under one roof and under one government, mark the three earliest stages in the development of monasticism. In Syria and Palestine each monk originally had a separate cell; in Lower Egypt two were together in one cell, whence the term "syncellita," or sharer of the cell, came to express this sort of comradeship; in the Thebaid, under the customs of Pachomius of Tabenna, each cell contained three monks. (Bened. Anian. Conc. Regul. c. 29; Cass. Instit. iv. 16; Coll. xx. 2; Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 38; Soz. Hist. Ecc. iii. 14.) At a later period the monks arrogated to themselves by general consent the title of "the religious" (religiosi), and admission into a monastery was termed "conversion" to God. (Ferreol. Reg. Praef.; Smaragd. Vit. Bened. Anian. c. 56.)

Passages laudatory of monasticism abound in the Christian writers, both Greek and Latin, in the 4th and 5th centuries. Basil of Neocaesarea, one of the founders of monasticism in Asia, and his friend Gregory of Nazianzum, the learned Jerome in his cell at Bethlehem, and the eloquent Chrysostom in the midst of a noisy populace at Constantinople, profound thinkers and men of action like Augustine of Hippo and Theodoret of Cyrus, all vie with one another in reiterating its praises (Basil. Constit. Mon.; Gregor. Naz. Or. 12; Chrys. Vit. Mon.; Aug. de Mor. Eccl. 31, de Op. Mon. c. 28, etc.; Hieron. passim; Theodoret, Hist. Rel.; Epiphan. Ancor. 107, etc.). The great Augustine is said to have lived in a kind of monastery with the clergy of his cathedral; and by his eulogies of the monastic life in his 'Commentary on the 36th Psalm' to have won Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspe, in the 6th century, to become a monk himself. In one enthusiastic passage he expresses a fervent hope that monasticism may shoot out its branches and offshoots all over the world (De Op. Mon. 28). Jerome goes so far as to speak of embracing the monastic life as a kind of second baptism (Ep. 39, ad Paul.). And yet in the writings of those who extolled monasticism most highly there are cautions and warnings not a few against the dangers which beset it. Augustine, with characteristic insight into the strange contradictions of human nature, describes, almost as one of the greatest of modern painters has represented it on his canvas, the recoil of a novice on first entering a monastery from the vices and inconsistencies of some among its inmates (In Ps. c.; cf. Hieron. Ep. ad Rust. 125, ad Eustoch. 22). Pride was always the besetting sin of the cloister. Ambition and covetousness crept in even among those who had renounced the world, its pomps and vanities (Hieron. Ep. ad Rust. 125, ad Eustoch. 22; Aug. Ep. 60, ad Heliodor.), and sensuality assailed those who had retired, as they hoped, to a safe distance from the temptations of the flesh (Hieron. Ep. ad Rust. 125, ad Eustoch. 22). The loneliness, the silence of the cell, often brought on that torment of the over-scrupulous, a religious melancholy, and sometimes downright insanity (Hieron. Ep. ad Rust. 125; Cass. Instit. v. 9). And though, as a rule, the monks were among the fiercest and noisiest champions of orthodoxy, at times, in their ignorance and isolation from the church at large, they were equally zealous for the extravagant notions of heretical fanatics (Sozom. H. E. i. 12). Whatever side they espoused, they were the fiercest of its partisans. In retaliations on the heathen for the cruelty which they had inflicted on the church, in putting down heresy by force, in extorting from the civil authorities the pardon of criminals, monks were ever foremost. By the advice of Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, and in consequence of the tumults in Antioch about Peter the Fuller, Leo the Thracian, in the middle of the 5th century, made an edict forbidding monks to quit their monasteries and excite commotion in cities (Milm. Hist. Lat. Christianity, i. 294). The outrages of the Nitrian monks against Orestes, the praefect, in their zeal for Cyril of Alexandria, of Barsumas and his rabble against Flavian of Antioch in the "robber council" of Antioch, and the ferocity which would not leave the saintly Chrysostom in peace even at the point of death, are no extraordinary instances of what the monks of the 5th century were capable of in their theological frenzies. By a strange, yet not uncommon inconsistency, the monk in his cell listened eagerly for the rumours of polemical controversy in the world which he had abjured, and reserved to himself the right of rushing into the fray, not as peacemaker, but to take part in the combat. They claimed for themselves an authority above that of bishops, emperors, councils. As in the Iconoclastic controversy, so generally they were on the side of superstition. The Egyptian monks clung tenaciously to their anthropomorphic conceptions of the Deity. One of them, an old man named Serapion, exclaimed with tears, on hearing that God is a Spirit, "They have taken away our God! We have no God now" (Cassian. Coll. x. c. 3; cf. Ruffin. de Verb. Senior. c. 21). Some monks in Asia Minor inculcated rigid abstinence generally, and condemned marriage as sinful (Soc. H. E. ii. 43, iv. 24; Concil. Gangr. c. A.D. 330, cc. 1, 2, 9). Antinomianism prevailed among some of the Mesopotamian monks in the 4th century (Epiphan. Haeres. lxx.). Augustine speaks of Manichaean tendencies among monks (De Mor. Eccles. i. 31).

In the 4th century the growing reverence for celibacy aided monasticism to make its way into almost every province of the Roman empire, the civilised world of that day. (Aug. de Mor. Eccles. i. 31; Theod. Hist. Rel. 30). The elder Macarius in the Scetic or Scithic desert, the elder Ammon on the Nitrian mount, higher up the Nile Pachomius in the Thebais, treading in the footsteps of Antony, the celebrated hermit, founded enormous communities of monks, with some sort of rude organisation. The numbers of monks in Egypt thus herding together and withdrawn from ordinary duties of a social and political life, were reckoned at this time by thousands. (Soz. H. E. iv. 14, vi. 31; Cass. Inst. iv. 1.) In Syria Hilarion and his friend Hesychas, with Epiphanius, afterwards bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, in Armenia Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, the first, according to some writers, to prescribe a monastic dress, in Asia Minor Basil, the first, to impose the vow (Soz. H. E. vi. 32; Hieron. Vit. Hilar.; cf. Helyot, Hist. des Ordres; Bulteau, Hist. des Moines d'Orient), led the way. In Africa the rage for the monastic life, according to Augustine, was chiefly among the poor (De Op. Mon. 22). The severe enactments of the persecuting emperor Valens were powerless to check the rush of popular feeling in this direction (Soz. H. E. iv. 24). Jerome speaks of multitudes of monks in India, Persia, Ethiopia (Ep. 107 ad Lact.).

From Syria and Egypt the passion for monasticism spread rapidly westwards. Severinus, called "the Apostle of Noricum," was a monk, like most of the great missionaries of this period, and propagated monasticism side by side with Christianity. The islands of the Adriatic sea soon swarmed with monks, nor were the isles in the Tuscan sea slow to follow their example (Hier. Ep. de Mort. Fabiol.; Hieron. Ep. 60 ad Helio.). About the middle of the 4th century, Athanasius, in his exile from Alexandria, sought shelter at Rome, and there, in the metropolis of the world (Aug. de Mor. Ecc. 33), the growing taste for monasticism enjoyed to the full all the advantages which his reputation for orthodoxy and sanctity could lend it, or which it could derive, half a century later, from Jerome's fervid and uncompromising advocacy. There was much in the monastic life thoroughly in keeping with what remained among Romans of their pristine sternness; it was a congenial reaction from the luxury and effeminacy of the day. Eusebius, contemporary with Athanasius, fostered it at Vercellae, in Northern Italy, where, as bishop, he resided under the same roof with some of his clergy, all living together by rule; and somewhat later, the illustrious Ambrose promoted its development in and about Milan, then, as now, one of the chief cities in that part of the peninsula (Aug. de Mor. Eccles. 33). Cassian, early in the 5th century, carried his experiences of eremitic and coenobitic life in Egypt and the Thebaid to Marseilles, already an important trading place, there establishing two monasteries, afterwards of great celebrity. He found similar institutions flourishing in the islands then called Stoichades, and now so familiar to invalids, off the southern coast of France, at Toulouse, and in the adjacent district, under the direction of Honoratus, Jovinianus, Leontius, and Theodorus. St. Martin, bishop of Tours (Caesardunum), turned his episcopal palace into a monastery, and at his death was followed to the grave by 2000 monks (Sulpic. Vit. St. Mart.). In the earlier part of his life he had founded a monastery (Locogiagense, in modern times Ligugé), near Poitiers (Pictavium). One of his disciples, Maximus, founded a monastery on L'Isle Barbe (Insula Barbara) near Lyons, and another at Trier or Treves (Augusta Trevirorum) in the East. Romanus, a pupil of Benedict, of Monte Casino, with his brother, Lupicinus, faithful to their master's teaching, planted monasteries on the Jura mountains in the West, early in the 6th century (Mabill. Annal. O.S.B.). In Spain, probably from its proximity to Africa, and easy communication with that country, then the representative of Western or Latin Christianity, monasticism flourished at an earlier date even than in southern Gaul, under the auspices, apparently, in the first instance of an African named Donatus (Ildefons, de Vir. Illust. iv.). So early as in A.D. 380 a decree of a council at Saragossa, forbidding priests to affect the dress of monks, shews that monasticism had even then made considerable progress in Spain (Concil. Caesaraugust. c. 6; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. iii. 38, 39). In the British Isles, monasticism flourished extensively long before the mission of Augustine to England; but the Roman missionaries on their arrival received anything but a cordial welcome from their British brethren, a feeling of mutual distrust and hostility arising from the differences which existed in ritual, costume, &c. But rapid as was the growth of monasticism, it had many and grave difficulties to contend with. The very enthusiasm in its favour, which the ardour of men like Jerome kindled among devout persons, only intensified in other quarters the bitterness and rancour of antagonism. The tumultuous uproar of the Roman crowd at Blesilla's funeral (Hier. Epp. 127 ad Princip. 39 ad Paul.) was a popular protest against the austerities which were supposed to have been the cause of her death. Salvian in the 5th century speaks of the unpopularity of the monks in Africa, and of the jibes and jeers which their pale faces and sombre dress excited in the streets (De Gubern. viii. 4). And though the imperial government on rare occasions, probably under some exceptional influence, shielded the monasteries, as when Justinian allowed minors and slaves to embrace the monastic life without the permission of their superiors (Cod. I. iii. 53, 55; Novell. v. 2), yet, as a rule, the civil power regarded with a not unreasonable jealousy the absorption of so many of its citizens into a current which withdrew them not for a time only but for life, for the obligation soon came to be considered a lifelong one (Aug. Serm. 60 ad Frat.), from all participation in responsibilities of a social and political nature.

From the first there was a marked contrast, which has been well expressed by the terms "endogenous" and "exogenous," between eastern and western monachism. The dreamy quietism of the East preferred silent contemplation of the unseen world to labour and toil; its self-mortification was passive rather than active. So far as it prescribed work at all, it was more as a safeguard for the soul against the snares which Satan spreads for the unoccupied, than with a view to benefiting others. Weaving mats and baskets of rushes or osiers was all that was required, as a harmless way of passing the time, or of busying the fingers while the thoughts were fixed on vacancy. The soft and genial climate, too, spared the Asiatic or the African the trouble of providing for his own daily wants and those of his brethren with the sweat wrung from his brow. And the same habit of indolent abstraction held him back from those literary pursuits, which were in many an instance the redeeming characteristic of the great monasteries of the West, even while it gave the rein to an abstruse and bewildering disputativeness, ever evolving out of itself fresh materials for disputing. In Europe it was quite otherwise. There, even within the walls of the monastery, was the ever-present sense of the necessity and the blessedness of exertion. There, the monk was not merely a worker among other workers, but by his vocation led the way in enterprises of danger and difficulty. Whatever time remained over and above the stated hours of prayer and study was for manual labours of a useful kind, and farming, gardening, building, out of doors and within the house, for caligraphy, painting, &c. The monks in Europe were the pioneers of culture and civilisation as well as of religion; usually they were the advanced guard of the hosts of art, science and literature. From this radical divergence of thought and feeling, two main consequences naturally followed. A less sparing, a more generous diet was a necessity for those who were bearing the fatigues of the day in a way which their eastern brethren could form no idea of. A more exact, a more minute arrangement of the hours of the day was a necessity for those who, instead of wanting to kill time, had to economise it to the best of their ability. The closer and more systematic organisation which, from the date, at least, of Benedict of Monte Casino, marked the monasteries of the West, and the more liberal dietary which he deliberately sanctioned were admirably adapted for the Roman and the Barbarian alike in the Europe of his day. To the one, with his innate and traditionary deference for law, the orderly routine of the cloister was infinitely preferable to the lawless despotism of the empire; and even the sturdy independence of the Goth bowed willingly beneath a yoke which it had chosen for itself without constraint.

"In truth the prison unto which we doom Ourselves no prison is."

In the East the monasteries, as a rule, were larger, but less firmly administered. There the laxer system of the "Laura" prevailed more widely and lasted till a later period than in Europe (Mabill. Praef. V. vi.). In East and West alike, the control exercised by the bishop of the diocese over the monasteries in his jurisdiction was from first to last scarcely more than titular. But in Latin Christendom the centralising authority of the pope supplied the want of episcopal control, not, however, without the vices which are inherent in an overstrained centralisation.

Before the 5th century there was no uniformity of rule among the various monasteries even of one race or country. Cassian complained that every cell had its rule; that there were as many rules as monasteries (Instit. ii. 2). In some cases, under the roof of the same monastery, a divided allegiance was given to several rules at once (Mab. Annal. O. S. B. Praef. 18). All this was perhaps inevitable from the fact that the monastic life had its origin not in an impulse given by any one directing and controlling spirit, but in the exigencies of the age generally. Gradually order emerged out of this chaos. The ascetic writings commonly ascribed to Basil of Caesareaia sometimes to his friend Eustathius of Sebaste, exercised from the first over the monasteries of the East an influence which they have never lost in those unchanging lands where change is an impiety. The rule of Basil—the first written code of the sort—was popular for a time in Southern Italy, a stronghold, from the circumstances of its colonisation, of Greek sympathies, was translated into Latin at the instance of Urseus, abbat of Pinetum, probably near the famous pine woods of Ravenna (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I. 15), was used in Gaul during the 5th century at Lemovicus (Limoges) in conjunction with Cassian's Institutes (ib. IV. 40); and won for itself the commendation of Cassiodorus and Benedict. Some European monasteries at first adopted their rules from Egypt, the mother-country of asceticism; thus the so-called rule of Macarius was in force in a Burgundian monastery, and the "rule of Antony" in a monastery near Orleans (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I.). Cassian was the precursor of Benedict in the arduous work of systematising the development of monasticism. But it is inexact to speak of "Cassian's severe and inflexible rule" (Milman, Lat. Chr. II. ii.). Strictly speaking, Cassian is the author of no rule properly so entitled; he was a compiler of materials suggestive of legislation, not a legislator himself. It was probably through his influence, in part at least, that many of the Gallic monasteries copied the type presented to them by the celebrated monastery of Honoratus at Lerina (Lérins), which seems to have been itself in its commencement a copy from those great Egyptian communities, which Cassian knew well from his own personal experience, wherein the brethren, dwelling each in his little separate cell, all under one abbat, met together at stated times for the sacred offices, and for refreshment (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I. 29, 30).

The appearance of the rule of Benedict, first and greatest in the long list of monastic reformers, was the commencement of uniformity in the monasteries of the West. Starting from its birthplace, Monte Casino, on the wildly picturesque spurs of the Apennines, it asserted its supremacy in Italy before the end of the 6th century, in the countries which are now France and Germany after the era of Winfrid or Boniface, and in Spain, where the rule of Isidore had prevailed, after the 9th century. In the next century it was almost universally accepted throughout Christian Europe (Pelliccia, Ecc. Chr. Pol. I. iii. 1, 4).

Like Aaron's rod it swallowed up its rivals. For a time, indeed, the more ascetic rule of Columbanus, emanating from the remote shores of Britain, where, before his missionary labours in Gaul and westwards, he had been trained under the rigorous tutelage of the famous Comgall, abbat of Bangor, came into conflict in central Europe with the Benedictine rule, and disputed its pre-eminence. But the followers of Columbanus never became a separate order. The monasteries wherein his rule was followed solely and absolutely were never numerous. More usually his rule was combined with that of Benedict, as in the monasteries of Luxovium (Luxeuil) and Bobium (Bobbio) in the 7th century. The most characteristic part of his rule the Poenitentiale, was too peremptory, too Draconic ever to become generally popular. After the synod of Mâcon, A.D. 625 (Concil. Matiscon.), in which the rule was defended by Eustathius, abbat of Luxeuil, from the charges brought against it by one of his monks, the Columbanist rule may be said to have ceased to exist separately. The Benedictine rule was milder and more flexible than its compeers; it was more in harmony with the temperament of the Italian peninsula, whence at that time other Christian lands in the West received their ecclesiastical laws; it enjoyed the favour and patronage of Rome, the capital of Christendom (Mab. Annal. O. S. B. Praef. pp. 23, 25). Wherever the two rules existed side by side in the same monastery, the Italian rule, inevitably and as of necessity, sooner or later ousted the Hibernian. Even in its own birth-land, notwithstanding the obstinate tenacity with which the native monks ("Scoti," i.e. Irish) clung to their prepossessions about the right time for keeping Easter and the right way of shaving for the tonsure, &c., the rule of Columbanus failed to hold its own against the encroachments of its exotic rival. In the 8th century, the rule of Benedict was carried by Saxon missionaries beyond the Tweed (Holsten, Praef. in Cod. Regul. S. Bened. Anian. pp. 403-405).

Amid all these divergencies and discrepancies, that which gave cohesion and stability to the monastic system was the almost absolute authority of the abbat, an authority greater than that of a captain of an English man-of-war in modern times, and almost on a par with that of an Oriental despot (e.g. Conc. Francof. A.D. 794). For his monks to hear was to obey. He held his office, ordinarily, for life. Within the walls, primarily intended for defence against enemies from without, but which soon came to be quite as useful for keeping the brethren in, he reigned supreme; and his watchful eye followed them even beyond the precincts (Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 11). Each monk in turn was a spy on the others (Greg. M. Epp. x. 22); was bound to inform the father-abbat of any misconduct on their part, bound, too, by habitual confession to the abbat, to accuse himself. It was an integral part of Benedict's policy thus to magnify the office of the abbat. It was, in a word, the keystone of his arch. Gregory the Great, a century later (the Roman church has always been skilful in utilising her monastic auxiliaries), was very severe against vagabond monks (Greg. M. Epp. I. 40, vi. 32, vii. 36, &c.; cf. Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 19). On the same principle Charles the Great enacted that solitary recluses should enroll themselves either as monks or canons (Car. M. Capit. 802 A.D. I. c. 17, 806 A.D. IV. c. 2, &c.; cf. Justin, Novell. 133.) Throughout the history of monasticism, the vow of unhesitating and unquestioning obedience has been one great secret of monastic vitality.

From the first the necessity had been recognised of repressing insubordination with an iron hand. Jerome and Augustine had censured the lawlessness of the "Remobothi," the "Sara-baitae," the "Gyrovagi," and other monkish vagrants (Hier. Ep. ad Eustoch.; Aug. de Op. Mon. cc. 28, 31; Rett. i. 21). Jerome, indeed, had recommended the very plan which afterwards became a prominent feature in the Benedictine policy, that the abbat should have a provost or prior under him as the officer next in command to himself, assisted by deans in the larger monasteries. Benedict himself preferred that the government of the monasteries should be carried on by abbat and deans without the intervention of a prior, lest there should be any rivalry between the abbat and his lieutenant. As monasteries, both in Eastern and Western Christendom, began to be founded in closer proximity to great cities, these and similar precautions against disorder became more and more necessary. Gregory the Great, exercising an almost ubiquitous supervision over Latin Christendom, recommended a probation of two or three years before a novice should become a monk (Greg. M. Epp. iv. 23). Again and again, in his solicitude for the preservation of a rigid monastic discipline, he insists that the abbat must be a monk whose moral and spiritual fitness has been well proved and tested before his election; that he is to relieve himself, as far as possible, of mundane distractions by having a good lay-agent; that he is to be strict in correcting offenders; that he is to retain in his own hands the appointment of the deans; and, in the appointment of a prior, to exercise his own discretion, if necessary, by deviating from the order of seniority, and by selecting the brother whom he believes best qualified for the office (ib. pass.). Council after council issued its fulminations against recalcitrant or disorderly monks, and endeavoured to weld together the organisation of each monastery firmly and compactly under one head. Thus the council of Agde, A.D. 506, ordered that no member of the community should live in a cell apart from the cloister, except by the abbat's special leave, nor, even so, outside the precincts ("intra saepta") (Conc. Agath. c. 38; cf. Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 7; Novell. 133). The same council enacted that no abbat should superintend more than one monastery, hospices excepted (cf. Gregor. M. Epp. x. 41). The abbat was usually elected by the monks (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. IV. i.). Louis, the son and successor of Charles the Great, restored this ancient privilege to the great abbays of his dominion, from whom his father had wrested it. [ABBAT.]

During the period of turbulence and confusion in Europe, which followed the crash of Rome under the onset of the barbarians, and before the disintegrated empire had been reconstructed by the strong hand of Charles the Great, the monks were everywhere the champions of order against lawless violence, of the weak and defenceless against the brute force of the oppressor. Again and again they confronted kings and nobles without fear, and without favour, as Columbanus for instance, among the Franks, rebuked the profligacy of the Merovingian princes. The proudest monarch, the most reckless of his barons, bowed in reverence before the mysteriously awful attributes of the pale, emaciated recluse coming forth like a phantom from his cell, or, at least, affected the friendship of so powerful an ally. The cloister, always a sanctuary and asylum for the friendless and the unfortunate, became in an age when even the tenure of the throne was so precarious, a convenient place for the incarceration of those whom it was desirable to put out of the way without killing. What had been at first in many cases involuntary, came to be prized for its own sake. Clothilda, the widow of Clovis, in the 6th century, when threatened with death or the tonsure for her sons, preferred "death before degradation." In the 8th century two ex-kings, Carloman the Frank, and Rachis the Lombard, sought and found shelter at the same moment by their own choice, in the monastery of Monte Casino. Louis, the successor of Charles the Great on the throne of the Franks, was only dissuaded by his nobles, in A.D. 819, from becoming a monk; fourteen years later he was compelled by his sons to retire to the monastery of St. Medard, at Soissons. The list of sovereigns who from the 5th to the 10th century, either by constraint or by choice, became monks, is indeed a long one. Distinguished offenders among the Franks had the option of being shut up in a monastery or of undergoing the usual canonical penances (Capitul. Reg. Franc. vi. 71, 90; vii. 59).

Early in the 6th century, for the first time, according to Mabillon, criminal priests or deacons were sentenced by a council in the south-east of France to incarceration in a monastery (Conc. Epaonense, A.D. 517, c. 3; cf. Gregor. M. Epp. viii. 10). In the 7th century, in the words of the great historian of the Western church, "the peaceful passion for monachism had become a madness, which seized on the strongest, sometimes the fiercest souls. Monasteries arose in all quarters, and gathered their tribute of wealth from all lands" (Milman, Hist. of Lat. Christianity, ii. 221).

Under the fostering care of the great Charles, monasteries were not merely a shelter and a refuge from social storms, and centres from which radiated over fen and forest the civilising influences of the farm and the garden, but schools of useful learning, according to the requirements and capacities of the period. Already, under the Merovingians, sons of princes, for instance, Meroveus, son of Chilperic, had been sent to monasteries to be taught (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. iii. 54). Charles made many and liberal grants of land to the monasteries, and his monk-loving son gave even more bountifully. But fine buildings and wide domains, besides attracting the cupidity of the spoiler, brought with them the pride and the luxury, which follow in the train of wealth and prosperity (Milman, L. C. ii. 294). Abbats too often took advantage of the absence of neighbouring barons on military service to seize their fiefs, stepping into their place, and becoming themselves feudal chieftains. But they were not content with the comparatively limited jurisdiction of their predecessors. The recognised appeal to the king in their case soon fell into desuetude; they assumed a position above their feudal peers, as suzerain lords; and on the principle that a thing once devoted to God becomes His only, His always, His altogether, they claimed various immunities for their lands from the ordinary tolls and taxes. "Their estates were held on the same tenure as those of the lay nobility; they had been invested with them, especially in Germany, according to the old Teutonic law of conquest. Abbacies were originally, or became, in the strictest sense benefices. Abbats took the same oath with other vassals on a change of sovereign. Abbats and abbesses were bound to appear at the Heerbann of the sovereign." (Milman, ib. ii. 289.) Though the abbats themselves were forbidden to carry arms, and took their oath of fealty as counsellors, their "men" were as much bound to follow the king in his wars as the "men" of his lay vassals (ib.). The first instance recorded of a fighting abbat is that of Warnerius, in his breastplate and other accoutrements, taking an active part in the defence of Rome against the Lombards in the 8th century (ib. ii. 243). Abbats, not unnaturally perhaps, in circumstances like these, grew rapidly less and less distinct in their manner of life from their compeers, the lay aristocracy around them. Their illustrious patron had to repress their hunting and hawking propensities, ordering them to do their shooting and their other field sports by deputy, in the person of the lay brothers (Capit. Car. M. A.D. 769, c. 3, A.D. 802, l. c. 19; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 14), and he denounced severely monks who are "lazy and careless." Charles reserved to himself the appointment of the great abbats. Under the feeble sway of his successors monasteries became more and more secular. The younger and the illegitimate sons of noble or royal families came to regard the richer abbeyes as their patrimony, and resented the intrusion of men of lower birth into these high places of the church. And though then, as always, in spite of every discouragement, genius and piety sometimes forced their way to the front, and though sometimes baser arts won preferment, the larger ecclesiastical fiefs passed so generally into the hands of the nobles, as to make the great abbats almost a caste (Milm. Lat. Chr. ii. 329).

The relation of monks to the clergy, and their continually recurring jealousies, form a curious chapter in the history of monasticism. Originally monks, as a class, were regarded as laymen, although even from the first there were individual instances of persons becoming monks after being ordained. Still, as monks, all ranked collectively with the lay, not the clerical part of the Christian community. The term "clerici" was applied not only to the clergy properly so called, but to the numerous officials connected with the church in various secular capacities, as bursars, doorkeepers, &c. Accordingly, the monk, even if he were not himself a layman, was naturally classed with laymen, as being unconnected with ecclesiastical offices of any sort. Monks, for their part, were more than content to be so regarded. It was one of their axioms that a monk should shun the company of a bishop as he would the company of a woman, lest he should be ordained perforce and against his own free will; for monks were in request for the diaconate or the priesthood as well as abbats for the office of bishop* (Cass. Inst. xi. 17; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. iv. 7). Monks indeed had no cause to be ambitious of ecclesiastical dignities. In the 5th century they took precedence of deacons (Epiphan. Haer. lxxviii.); and in the East their archimandrites had places at the councils of the church (C. P. I., Conc. Eph. Act. I. Sess., Conc. Chalced.). Like other barriers between the monk and his fellow men, this demarcation between monks and clergy became less strongly marked after the 4th century; the gradual relaxation of primitive austerity in the monastery being partly the cause and partly the result of this mutual approximation of the one to the other (Hieron. Ep. ad Eustoch.). Other causes also were at work. The monastery was often a nursery or "training-college" for the clergy (Hieron. Ep. ad Rust.; cf. Conc. Vasens. A.D. 529). On the one hand, dioceses needed clergy other than the parochial clergy for missionary work; on the other hand, the monastery needed one priest at least, if not more than one, as its resident chaplain. The illiterate clergy looked naturally to the nearest monastery for help in the composition of sermons. Deacons, though forbidden to preach, were allowed to read homilies in church; and these were furnished in case of need by the monks, men, sometimes at least, of learning, in comparison with the country clergy (Mabill. Annal. O.S.B. iii. 56). And they, who were thus assisting the clergy in their work, affected not unreasonably a clerical costume. More than one council in the 6th century made its enactment against monks wearing the "orarium," or stole, and against their wearing boots or buskins instead of their own rude sandals (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506; Conc. Aurel. i. A.D. 511; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 518; cf. Conc. Laodic. A.D. 361). Sometimes, at first more usually, the spiritual wants of the monastery were supplied by the bishop sending a priest at the abbat's request, to perform mass at stated times; sometimes by a priest being appointed to reside in the monastery; sometimes by one of the monks themselves being ordained (Greg. M. Epp. pass.). On festivals the monks usually resorted to their parish church (Alteserr. Ascet. i. 2). [ORATORY.]

One of the hardest tasks of successive popes was to regulate and adjust the rival claims of their monks and their clergy. Gregory the Great, like his distinguished predecessor Leo, the first of the popes of that name, seems to have laboured to prevent either party from intruding beyond its own proper province into the duties and privileges of the other. He forbade monks to officiate without leave outside their walls (cf. Leo I. Epp. 118, 119). He forbade the parochial clergy to retreat at pleasure from their cures to the quietness and leisure of a monastery. He ordered baptisteries to be removed from monasteries. He discouraged clerical abbats; and he censured the parochial clergy, who either entered a monastery or quitted it without their bishops' sanction. Sometimes, however, he transferred the charge of a church neglected by its parochial clergy to the monks of the adjoining monastery, on condition that they should provide accommodation among themselves for a priest who should act as their "vicar" (Epp. i. 40; iii. 18; iii. 59; iv. 1; iv. 18). After the 6th century monks began to be classed in popular estimation with the clergy (Mab. AA. O.S.B. Praef. Saec. ii.); and the ecclesiastical policy of the great Carolingian legislator in the 8th century, by subjecting the abbats to the jurisdiction of the bishops and archbishops, unintentionally favoured this notion. A council at Rome, in A.D. 827, ordered abbats to be in priests' order (Conc. Rom. c. 26); a council at Aachen about the same time permitted them to admit any of their monks into minor orders; another at Mainz soon afterwards permitted them to hold benefices (Conc. Aquigr. A.D. 817, c. 60; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 827). Monks were the predominating element in the synods of the ninth century, sometimes sitting apart from the clergy in a separate chapter (AA. SS. Jun. ii. c. 22, St. Minuerc.). In the eleventh and twelfth centuries more than one council prohibited monks from having charge of parishes; but Innocent III., their patron and champion, sanctioned their officiating even in parishes where they had no "domicilium" or residence. Gregory of Tours uses the terms "monachi" and "clerici" indiscriminately. But the long-standing rivalry between the monks and clergy lasted on, notwithstanding this superficial fusion, or rather all the more acrimoniously, because of their being brought more frequently into collision.

The right of the bishop of the diocese to exercise jurisdiction over the monasteries in his diocese, and the limits within which his authority ought to be exercised were a constant source of irritation on both sides. The struggle between bishop and abbat dates from the very commencement of monachism; council after council endeavoured to arbitrate between their conflicting claims; but it was inevitable that fresh occasions of dispute should arise continually. At first, and so long as the monk was distinctly regarded as a layman, there was less danger of rivalry or collision. The council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) enacted, that the bishop of each city should superintend its monasteries according to "the traditions of the fathers," and that every refractory monk should be excommunicated; that no monk should enter the city of Constantinople (already the monks had caused disturbances there) without the bishop's permission; and that the consecration of the monastery by the bishop should be the guarantee against its being secularised (Conc. Chalced. cc. 4, 8, 23, 24). Africa, notorious already for the turbulence of its vagabond monks, was the first to raise the standard of revolt. One of the abbats in the diocese of Byrsa, having been excommunicated by his own bishop, Liberatus, appealed to the bishop of Carthage, metropolitan in the proconsular province of Carthage (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v. Primas). At a synod in Carthage (A.D. 525), presided over by Bonifacius, bishop of Carthage, in right of his see, sentence was pronounced in favour of the abbat. Indeed, in their desire to prevent any intrusion on the part of Liberatus, the council went so far as to lay down the rule, that monasteries being as heretofore ("sicut semper fuerunt") entirely exempt from the obligations which restrain the clergy ("a conditione clericorum libera") should be guided only by their own sense of what is right ("sibi tantum ac Deo placentia"), and this decision was confirmed by a synod nine years later, in the same city (Conc. Carth. A.D. 525; A.D. 534). Mabillon thinks that this right of appeal to another bishop, involving for the monastery the right of choosing its own visitor, was a security against episcopal oppression. A similar dispute between Faustus, abbat of Lirinensis Insula (Lérins) and Theodorus, bishop of Forojulium (Fréjus), was settled at Arles far more equitably. There it was enacted, that clerical monks should obey the bishop in questions relating to their office as clergy, while lay monks should obey their abbat only; on the one hand, that no one should officiate in the monastery, except as delegated by the bishop, and, on the other, that the bishop should never receive any lay-brother to ordination, without the consent of the abbat (Lab. Concil. ed. 1762, viii. pp. 635-656). But even this was no final or permanent solution of the ever-recurring difficulty. Councils again and again through the 6th and 7th centuries reaffirmed this fundamental distinction between monks as monks, and monks as clergy, but in vain. The tendency of things actually was to make the monastery within its own domain more and more independent of its bishop.

No new monastery could be founded without the bishop's sanction (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 24; Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 27); just as a layman needed the same permission to erect a church (Conc. Ilerd. A.D. 524, c. 3). If the bishop himself were the founder he might devote a fortieth part of his episcopal income as endowment, instead of the hundredth part permissible for the endowment of a new church (Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 5). But, the monastery once founded, the choice of a new abbat belonged not to the bishop but to the monks themselves. But the bishop might interfere, in case of their electing a vicious abbat. They were free to elect whom they would, one of their own body by preference, if possible, but, in the event of there being no eligible candidate among themselves, a stranger from another monastery (Bened. Anianens. Concord. Regul. v. s.; Conc. Roman. A.D. 601; Conc. Tolet. x. A.D. 656, c. 3). Nevertheless the abbat was to hold his office under the supervision of the bishop; he was to attend the bishop's visitation yearly; if he failed in the discharge of his duty, he was to be admonished and corrected, or even, in case of gross misconduct, deposed by the bishop, not, however, without a right of appeal to the metropolitan or to a general assembly of abbats (Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, cc. 19, 20; Conc. Epau. A.D. 517, c. 19; Conc. Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 3; Conc. Roman. A.D. 601). Outside their monastic precincts the bishop was supposed to have a general jurisdiction over the monks in his diocese, and in this way, obviously, might often prove himself an invaluable and almost indispensable ally to the abbat, seated within his monastery, in coercing and reclaiming truants. (Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 19; Conc. Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 2). Monks were forbidden to wander from one diocese to another, or from one monastery to another, without commendatory letters from the bishop as well as from the abbat; if contumacious, they were to be whipped (Conc. Tolet. A.D. 635, c. 53; Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, cc. 5, 6). The bishop's permission was requisite, not the abbat's only, for a monk to occupy a separate cell apart from the monastery (Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 22). In short the bishop was in theory, if not actually, responsible for the moral conduct of the monks in his diocese. Of course his control was more of a reality over their ecclesiastical ministrations. The bishop might not ordain a monk, nor remove a priest-monk from a monastery to parochial work without the abbat's consent, might not interfere to prevent a priest or deacon from taking the monastic vow (Conc. Agath. 506, c. 27; Conc. Roman. A.D. 601); might not ordain a monk who broke his vow and relapsed to the life secular (Conc. Aurel. 511, c. 21). Still, in accordance with the principle promulgated at Arles in A.D. 556 (u. s.), it was generally admitted that the monk's vow of obedience to his abbat was not to supersede the canonical obedience of the clerk to his bishop; and, though the force of circumstances might naturally draw the monk to his abbat and to his brother monks whenever their peculiar rights and privileges were threatened, the bishop could always retort effectively by simply holding back his hand when called to give the monastery the benefit of his episcopal services. From the reiterated cautions of the councils in this period against any encroachment of the bishops on the property of the monasteries, it would seem as if a wealthy monastery was sometimes a "Naboth's vineyard," as old monastic writers express it, in the eyes of a greedy or overbearing prelate. Bishops are forbidden by the council of Lerida, in the north of Spain, A.D. 524, to seize the offerings made to monasteries (Conc. Ilerd. c. 3); forbidden to tyrannise over monasteries or meddle with their endowments by the council of Toledo (Conc. Tolet. iv. c. 51), and by the council of Rome, A.D. 601 (Conc. Rom. A.D. 601). Another council of Toledo in A.D. 656, ordered any bishop guilty of appropriating a monastery for the aggrandisement of himself or of his family to be excommunicated for a year (Conc. Tolet. x. c. 3).

The master mind of Gregory the Great was quick to recognise the importance of keeping the monks distinct from the secular clergy, and, at the same time, of providing some efficient, official supervision, against laxity or immorality in the monastery. Of those numerous letters of Gregory, which attest his almost ubiquitous vigilance over the ecclesiastical affairs of western Christendom, and the commanding influence which made itself felt far and near, not a few contain his adjudication in quarrels of abbats with their diocesans. His personal sympathies were divided, for he had himself been an ardent and devoted monk, before becoming the head of the ecclesiastical system of Europe; and, like a true statesman, he saw that the way to make the cloister and the diocese mutually helpful, was to guard against any confusion of the boundary-lines between their respective spheres. The office of the monk, he writes, is distinct from that of the clerk (Greg. M. Ep. v. 1); it is dangerous for a monk to leave his cell to become a priest; a clerk once admitted into the monastic brotherhood ought to stay there, unless summoned to work outside the walls by the bishop (Ep. i. 42). The abbat is first to be elected by the monks, and then to be formally consecrated by the bishop (Ep. ii. 4, 2). On one occasion Gregory, taking the selection of an abbat into his own hands, sends a certain monk, Barbatianus, to be instituted abbat in the diocese of Naples. But in writing to the bishop, Gregory qualifies his mandate by adding, that Barbatianus is to be appointed "if the bishop approves his life and character" ("si placuisset vita ac mores"). Barbatianus, as abbat, admitted into the monastery without due probation a postulant, who soon afterwards ran away. Gregory blames the bishop for neglecting to make proper enquiries beforehand about Barbatianus (Epp. ix. 91, x. 24). Similarly, he reprimands bishops very severely for not looking more closely after the morality of their monasteries, and, in more than one instance of a monk or a nun breaking the monastic vow and returning to the world, he lays the fault on the carelessness of the bishop as visitor (Epp. viii. 34, x. 22, 24, viii. 8, ix. 114, x. 8, etc.). He charges the bishops to exert themselves in reclaiming runaway monks, and to be strict in repelling them from holy communion (Ep. ix. 37, etc.). The bishop is not to set up his cathedral throne in the monastery, nor to hold public services there; he is not to ordain any monk for the services of the monastery unless by the abbat's request, nor for ministerial work outside the monastery without the abbat's leave (Ep. ii. 41, etc.); he is not to encourage the monks to rebel against their abbat; above all (and this seems to have been the most frequent cause of contention), he is not to harass or oppress the monasteries, by visiting them too frequently, by putting them to inordinate expense on those occasions, by interfering with the revenues of the monastery and with its internal management, or in any other way; on the contrary, he is to defend their rights and privileges diligently (Epp. i. 12, vi. 29, viii. 34, ix. 111). In order to escape from the pressure of episcopal control, monasteries not infrequently placed themselves under the bishop of another diocese (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. i. 42).

The policy of Charlemagne towards monasteries was more repressive than that of Gregory; it substituted also the emperor for the pope as the mainspring of the system, as the person to whom the final appeal should be made. It was his aim at once to make the monastic discipline more binding, and to prevent the monastery from becoming a separate republic, independent of church and state. He sought to aggrandise the abbat as delegate of the bishop and the emperor, but not as a power in himself, to strengthen him in his authority over his monks, but at the same time to keep him obedient and dutiful to his bishop. The emperor's idea was, that the clergy and monks of his realm should be, like his feudal retainers, a compact, well-organised militia for defensive and offensive service; the monks in their cells and the clergy in their several dioceses were all to live by rule, the rule of the monastic order or the rule canonical, the monks teaching^b in the schools attached to their monasteries, the clergy busily at work in their way under their bishop. All that could be done by legislation was done, and done with consummate skill, for this purpose under the emperor's direction in the parliament synods of his reign. But in spite of councils and their canons, the monasteries grew insensibly more autonomous, the parochial clergy more secular. It was far more easy, as Gregory had found, to say that the bishop must be responsible for good order in monasteries of his diocese than to enable him to enforce his authority on a monastery indisposed to accept it. It was enacted by the council of Vern, or Verne, near Paris, that if the bishop cannot himself correct an offending abbat, he must invoke the aid of the metropolitan, and, that failing, of a synod; that, the offender is to be excommunicated by the bishops generally, and a successor appointed by the king or his council (Conc. Vernens. A.D. 755, c. 5), and this was confirmed under Charles (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 802, c. 15). It had been also provided, that the abbat should render an account to his bishop as well as to the king, of any exemptions or immunities which he claimed (Conc. Vern. c. 20). The monks were not even to elect their abbat without the bishop's approval (Conc. Francof. A.D. 795, c. 17); and as the abbat received his office at the hands of the bishop, so he was to allow to the bishop, as visitor, free ingress into the monastery, reserving however for himself the right of appeal, first to the metropolitan, and from him to the crown (Car. M. Capit. A.D. 812, iii. 2; Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 4). About this time the Eastern church enacted that the bishop or metropolitan should appoint a bursar or treasurer ("oconomus") in every monastery not provided with one already, to keep account of the receipts and expenditure; and that any abbat convicted of granting admission into the monastery for money, should be banished to another monastery and there do penance (Conc. ii. Nicaen. A.D. 787, cc. 11, 19; cf. Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 26).

Louis, the successor of Charlemagne, always devoted to monks, enriched the monasteries, and made them more secure in their possessions; but the power of the great feudal bishops was increasing proportionately; and sometimes the rapacity or the tyranny of their ecclesiastical superior drove a monastery to place itself under the protection of the king or one of his barons (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. 294-5). The popes took some monasteries under their own special tutelage, as the patriarchs had done in the east; and before the end of the 12th century some of the greatest abbats were appointed by the pope, and some of the most important questions concerning the temporal and spiritual affairs of monasteries generally were regulated solely by him (Pellicia, Ecc. Chr. Pol.).

In the isles of the west, by their position and by other circumstances removed from immediate contact with central Europe, the course of events was somewhat different. Before the Saxon occupation of Britain, monks and monasteries were already very numerous, but monastic discipline was lax. No Benedict had mapped out the daily life of the monastery. Columba was rather a missionary than a monastic reformer, and his influence, though very widely extended, was rather the personal influence of a holy man, than the stereotyping influence of a legislator. Columbanus had bequeathed his rule to other lands rather than to his own country. The fervid temperament of the Kelts was in itself less patient of control, less amenable to discipline. Solitaries, that is monks living as hermits, each in his cell, apart from the monasteries, were not so systematically discountenanced, nor so carefully supervised in Ireland, as on the continent. The character, also, of their ecclesiastical organisation tended to make the monastery less dependent on its bishop. Originally, the chieftains of the clan or tribe, even after its conversion to ^b The emperor's attention was awakened to the need of an educational reformation by some badly written letters to himself from certain monasteries (Mabill. de Stud. Monast. i. c. 9).

Christianity, exercised a patriarchal authority in spiritual, as well as in temporal matters; and as the conventual establishments grew in number and importance, the headship of them was still retained generally in the family of the chieftain, the office of the abbat, like the office of the bard, who was usually to be found in every Celtic monastery, being, as a rule, hereditary (Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. pp. 194, 281-287).

Among the Saxons in England a similar result was produced by other causes. When Christianity came, the second time, into the island, it came in the guise of monachism. The monk and the missionary were one. Many of the British monks had been massacred by the heathen invaders; many had fled for safety to the peaceful and prosperous monasteries of their brethren in Ireland. But their places were quickly filled by their Teutonic successors. Almost every large church was attached to a monastery; and in the first instance the monks were the parish-priests of the diocese (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. c. 4). All this gave the monasteries in England a hold over the people which they never lost, till their dissolution in the 16th century; and as the tie grew weaker which had grouped the monks around the bishop of the diocese, and as the monastery became detached from the minster, all this strengthened the abbats in their independence. The formal exemption of monasteries from episcopal control in things secular dates from the 7th century; and the council of Cealchythe (Chelsea?) a century later only affirmed that the monks should take the bishop's advice ("cum consilio episcopi") in electing an abbat (Conc. Calcutheus. A.D. 787, c. 5). For all practical purposes the authority of an individual bishop in England over a monastery was hardly ever more than nominal; and in course of time the lordly abbats of the great monasteries vied in power and magnificence with the occupants of the greatest sees.

The history of monasticism, like the history of states and institutions in general, divides itself broadly into three great periods of growth, of glory, and of decay. Not indeed as if the growth were unchecked by hindrance, the glory unchecked by defects, the decay never arrested by transient revivals from time to time of the flickering flame of life. Still the successive seasons of youth, maturity, old age, are marked plainly and strongly enough. From the beginning of the 4th century, to the close of the 5th, from Antony the hermit to Benedict of Monte Casino, is the age of undisciplined impulse, of enthusiasm not as yet regulated by experience. It has all the fervour, and all the extravagance of aims too lofty to be possible, of wild longings without method, without organisation, of energies which have not yet learned the practical limits of their own power. Everything is on a scale of illogical exaggeration, is wanting in balance, in proportion, in symmetry. Purity, unworldliness, charity, are virtues. Therefore a woman is to be regarded as a venomous reptile, gold as a worthless pebble, the deadliest foe and the dearest friend are to be esteemed just alike (e.g. Ruffin. de Vit. SS. c. 117). It is right to be humble. Therefore the monk cuts off hand, ear, or tongue, to avoid being made bishop (e.g. Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 12) and feigns idiocy, in order not to be accounted wise (Ruff. ib. c. 118). It is well to teach people to be patient. Therefore a sick monk never speaks a kind word for years to the brother monk who nursed him (St. Inc. ap. Rosw. Vit. Patr. c. 19). It is right to keep the lips from idle words. Therefore a monk holds a large stone in his mouth for three years (ib. c. 4). Every precept is to be taken literally, and obeyed unreasoningly. Therefore some monks who have been plundered by a robber, run after him to give him a something which has escaped his notice (Mosch. Prat. c. 212). Self-denial is enjoined in the gospel. Therefore the austerities of asceticism are to be simply endless. One ascetic makes his dwelling in a hollow tree, another in a cave, another in a tomb, another on the top of a pillar; another has so lost the very appearance of a man, that he is shot at by shepherds who mistake him for a wolf (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 5; Mosch. Prat. c. 70; Theodoret, Philoth. c. 15). The natural instincts, instead of being trained and cultivated, are to be killed outright, in the utter abhorrence of things material as a defilement of the soul. Adolius, a hermit near Jerusalem, and it is merely one instance out of many, is said to have fasted two whole days together ordinarily and five in Lent, to have passed whole nights on Mount Olivet, in prayer, standing and motionless (Pallad. ib. c. 104), and habitually to have slept only the three hours before morning. Dorotheus, a Scetic monk, used to sleep in a sitting posture, and when urged to take his proper rest, would reply "Persuade the angels to sleep!" (ib. c. 2). Cleanliness became a sin, as a kind of self-indulgence. The common duties of life were shunned and neglected, because the end of all such things was near. No wonder, if with no more active occupation than meditation, or twisting osiers into baskets, the soul of the recluse preyed upon itself, and peopled the dreary solitude around it with demons and spectres. No wonder, if in this superhuman effort to burst the barriers of our mortal nature by a protracted suicide, men mistook apathy for self-control, and became like stocks or stones, or brute beasts, while wishing to be as God. [MORTIFICATION.]

The period which follows, from the first Benedict to Charlemagne, exhibits monasticism in a more mature stage of monastic activity. The social intercourse of the monastery duly harmonised by a traditional routine, with its subordination of ranks and offices, its division of duties, its mutual dependence of all on each other and on their head, civilised the monastic life; and as the monk himself became subject to the refining influence of civilisation, he went forth into the world without to civilise others. The contemplation of spiritual things was still proposed as the first object in view. But stated and regular hours for the religious services left leisure for other occupations, and brainwork took its proper place alongside of manual labour. The Benedictine rule implied, if it did not assert in so many words, that monks are to make themselves useful to others as well as to themselves; and the practical result is seen in the conversion of the greater part of Europe to Christianity, and in the revival of European learning and arts among the wild hordes from the north, the conquerors of Rome. Had it not been for monks and monasteries, the barbarian deluge might have swept away utterly the traces of Roman civilisation. The Benedictine monk was the pioneer of civilisation and Christianity in England, Germany, Poland, Bohemia, Sweden, Denmark (Mabillon, de Stud. Monast. i. c. 9). The schools attached to the Lerinensian monasteries were the precursors of the Benedictine seminaries in France, of the professorial chairs filled by learned Benedictines in the universities of mediæval Christendom. With the incessant din of arms around him, it was the monk in his cloister, even in regions beyond the immediate sphere of Benedict's legislation, even in the remote fastnesses, for instance, of Mount Athos, who, by preserving and transcribing ancient manuscripts, both Christian and pagan, as well as by recording his observations of contemporaneous events, was handing down the torch of knowledge unquenched to future generations, and hoarding up stores of erudition for the researches of a more enlightened age. The first musicians, painters, farmers, statesmen in Europe, after the downfall of Rome Imperial under the enslavement of the barbarians were monks (Mabillon, de Stud. Mon. i. cc. 4, 7, 8, 9, 12, 22).

In what are called the middle ages, the various monasteries of each order were under the presidency of the monastery, originally the seat of the order. This development had not been contemplated by the rule of Benedict. The abbot of the parent monastery convoked the chapters-general. In the 9th century, the abbot of Monte Casino was nominally, if not actually, supreme over all abbots. In the 10th, Odo of Clugny was supreme over the abbots of his order of Benedictines. At a later date, among the friars, the cloisters of each province were under the authority of a "provincial," and the whole order under a "general," usually resident at Rome (Ferd. Walter, Manuel du Droit ecclési.; Pelliccia, Chr. Eccles. Politia).

How the original monastic idea came in course of time to be lost sight of, as monasteries became wealthy and powerful, how monastic simplicity was corrupted and enervated by luxury, how one monastic order vied with another for worldly aggrandisement, how, too often, the unfraternal rivalry was embittered by jealousies of the pettiest kind, and how the monastic orders became the janissaries or praetorian cohort of the papacy, is beyond our present scope to describe. The difference between Rome under Commodus and Rome in the days of Cincinnatus is hardly greater than the difference between a great mediæval monastery, with all its pomp and ostentation of appurtenances, and the conception of a monastery in the rules laid down by the first founders of monasticism. Every new rule, every new order, has been in turn a protest against degeneracy, a spasmodic effort to revert to pristine simplicity. But the disintegration and the decadence of the monastic idea are due, not exclusively, nor indeed mainly, to causes acting upon it from without, but rather to something within itself, an inherent part of its very being from the first. If we look below the surface, and endeavour honestly to analyse the complex elements which, as ever happens in human actions, conspired to result in monasticism, we cannot but observe there, powerfully at work, a very subtle form of selfishness. Fear of ultimate punishment, hope of ultimate recompense, instead of being merely secondary and subsidiary motives, thrust themselves forward as the dominating principle of this apparent self-abnegation, too abnormal, too stupendous to be ever realised on earth, unless by sacrificing at the same time the responsibilities and the privileges which have been providentially constituted an essential part of man's probation. In his fanatical eagerness to secure his own salvation, the devotee of monasticism abjured the claims of home and country. He "died to the world" (Gregor. M. Epp. i. 44, Not. Benedictin.), not simply in the sense of mortifying evil affections, but as dead henceforth to the ordinary sympathies of humanity.

II. PARTICULAR RULES.—Monastic rules in the ordinary sense are necessarily subsequent to the establishment of the coenobitic system. The earliest monks were such according to the strict meaning of the word—μοναχοί, solitaries—occupying isolated cells in the deepest recesses of the desert, or the most inaccessible mountain gorges, as far as possible from other human habitations. The life of an anchorite was therefore absolutely independent. Each solitary was at liberty to frame for himself such a rule as he found best adapted for the development of the life of spiritual communion, contemplation, and abstraction from all worldly concerns, which was his object. He might seek counsel from others, but he was free to follow or reject it. No one could claim to lay down a law for another. But as time went on, and the monastic life could number its votaries by thousands, a desire was naturally felt to profit by the experience of others, and the more celebrated ascetics were called upon by their younger and less disciplined brethren to draw up ordinances for their guidance in what began to be called "the true philosophy."

Rules of St. Antony and St. Isaiah.—The codes of rules of this nature, which bear the names of St. Antony and the Syrian abbat Isaiah, printed by Holstenius in his Codex Regularum, are, it is acknowledged, compilations of a later date, and partially adapted to the coenobitic system. They have however considerable value, as affording a faithful picture of the mode of life of the earliest solitaries, and indicating the temptations to which they were most liable. They are generally characterised by sound common sense, and an intimate knowledge of human nature. The object of the rule, to which all else was subsidiary, was true humiliation for sin, with earnest contrition, as a means of gaining the pardon and favour of God. Rigid self-discipline is enforced as a means to this end, valueless in itself. The ostentatious display of asceticism, almsgiving, or devotion is sternly prohibited, and warnings are given against spiritual pride. The day is to be divided between manual labour, reading, and prayer. "Ora et lege perpetuo" (Reg. S. Anton. c. 2; Reg. Is. 11); even when going to draw water the monk is to occupy himself in reading (Ant. c. 23); the Psalms are to be the chief subjects of his perusal and meditation, to keep him from impure thoughts (Ant. c. 40; Is. 13). The appointed hours of prayer are to be strictly observed. Before the monk goes to rest he is to devote two hours to watching, in prayer and praise. Midnight is to be spent in watching to prayer (Is. c. 57), and as soon as he rises he is to pray and meditate on the word of God, then begin his work (Ant. c. 32). Prayer is to be made standing, and that with the utmost reverence of body; the monk must not lean against the walls of his cell, or shift his weight from one foot to another (Is. c. 36). Food is never to be tasted before the ninth hour, except on Saturday and Sunday; only one meal is to be taken in the day (Ant. c. 2); eating to satiety is to be avoided, still more gluttony (Ant. c. 32); a little wine is allowed, but all drink must be taken slowly, not gulped down noisily. If two or more monks eat together each is to take what is placed before him, and not stretch out his hand to another dish (Ant. 33; Is. 20). The sick are not to be forced to eat, nor to be robbed of their portion (Ant. c. 5). Meat is to be avoided altogether (Ant. c. 14). Wednesdays and Fridays are to be kept as strict fasts, unless a monk is sick (Ant. c. 15). The time for taking food and its quantity is to be fixed by each monk for himself, and the rules laid down are to be strictly observed, giving to the body as much as it wants, that it may be able to pray and worship God. Excessive fasting is to be avoided (Is. c. 54, 56). The monk must maintain solitude, live alone, work alone, walk alone, above all sleep alone (Ant. c. 68, 8; Is. c. 18). He is specially to avoid conversing with boys or youths, and as the most dangerous of all, with women (Ant. c. 3; Is. c. 1). Even his relations living in the world are to be shunned, and the thought of them repressed. He must not loiter in other monks' cells. But if any one knocks at his cell he is to open to him immediately, and receive him with a cheerful countenance. No idle questions are to be put to him, but he is to be asked at once to pray, and a book is to be given him to read. If he is tired, water is to be given for his feet: if his clothes are ragged, they are to be mended; if foul, washed. If he chatters foolishly he is to be cautiously silenced; if he is an idle runagate he is to be refreshed and sent about his business (Is. c. 33). When the owner of the cell departs, the visitor is not to raise his eyes to see which way he goes (Is. c. 35). If the guest leaves anything behind the host must not examine it to see what it is (Is. c. 34). If it is some vessel or implement of common life he is not to use it without his leave (Is. c. 60). Crowded churches are to be shunned (Ant. c. 20). If anything takes a monk to the city he must keep his eyes on the ground, finish his business as soon as he can, and return promptly. In offering his wares for sale he is never to haggle about the price (Is. c. 59). If an old man accompanies him on the road he is not to be allowed to carry anything; if younger men, they are to share the load equally, or if it is very light each is to take it by turns (Is. c. 43). Idleness is to be shunned as the greatest of dangers (Ant. c. 43). The monk must force himself to work against his will, and fulfil any task assigned to him without murmuring (Is. c. 7). If two monks occupy one cell, neither is to lord it over the other, but each is to be ready at once to do what the other bids him (Is. c. 30). The utmost respect is to be paid to others; none should spit or gape in another's presence (Is. c. 21). All sense of property is to be put away. If a monk returns to a cell he has left and finds it occupied, he is not to try to turn out the intruder, but go and seek another cell (Is. c. 63). If he changes his cell he is to take nothing away with him, but leave all to his successor (Is. c. 64). All ostentation in dress is to be avoided; young monks are to go shabby and wait till they grow old before they wear a good dress (Is. c. 38). A monk must not shew off his voice, but pray in a low tone (Ant. c. 27). If he copies a book he is not to ornament it (Is. c. 23). The love of riches is to be regarded as the bane of a monk (Is. c. 66). The sick and infirm are to be visited, and their water vessels filled (Ant. c. 34). Alms must be given up to, but not beyond, one's means. A monk should never laugh, but always wear a sad countenance as one that mourns for his sins, except when other monks come to visit him, when he is to shew a bright face (Ant. c. 47; Is. c. 33). The diseases of the soul are to be opened to his spiritual father (Is. c. 6, 43). All is to be done that others may glorify their Father which is in heaven (Ant. c. 30). (Regulae S. P. N. Antonii ad filios suos monachos; Isaiae Abbatis Regula ad Monachos. Holstenius, Cod. Reg. tom. i. pp. 4-9.)

Rule of St. Pachomius.—When the eremitic gave place to the coenobite, and the solitary cell developed into a convent peopled with a numerous society, the need of rules for the government of the fraternity was immediately felt. Regulations had to be laid down as to the dress, food, and daily occupations of the inmates, as well as for their stated meetings for worship and ordinary intercourse. The earliest rule of this nature is that of Pachomius, the founder of the coenobitic system, born, like Antony, in the Thebaid, A.D. 292. We have this rule in Jerome's Latin translation, with a preface from the pen of that father. It is a document of great interest, comprising 194 separate heads. The society, for which it was drawn up, was first planted on the island of Tabennae in the Nile, from which it extended with such rapidity that before the founder's death in A.D. 348 it comprised nine coenobia for men, and one built for his sister for women. The number of monks in Jerome's time amounted to 50,000.

The whole society formed one vast industrial and religious fraternity, every member of which owed implicit obedience to a chief (omnium monasteriorum princeps) who resided in the parent house, at which the entire body assembled twice a year, at Easter, and in the month of August. The Paschal meeting was the great religious festival of the year. That in August was held for clearing up accounts, both religious and secular. All received absolution, and those who were at variance were reconciled. The administrators of each monastery brought in their accounts, all necessary business was transacted, and officials were appointed for the coming year (Hieron. Praefat. in Reg. Pachom. c. 7, 8). Each monastery was divided into thirty or forty houses (domus), each house containing about forty brethren; three or four houses being grouped according to the employments of the brethren into a "tribe," the members of which went to work together, or succeeded one another in the weekly ministry. Each monastery was presided over by an abbat (pater), and had its staff of stewards (dispensatores), hebdomadaries, and ministers. A provost (praepositus) exercised authority in each house. To him the brethren gave a weekly account of their work (ibid. c. 2, 6). The authority of the provost was very strictly defined; within certain limits he was absolute. Nothing was to be done without his sanction. All the property of the house was in his keeping, and he was to dispense it as he thought good, going round to the workshops for that purpose. No one was to murmur at his assignment, or try to exchange with another monk (Reg. S. Pachom. c. 97, 111, 157). But his authority was chiefly economical. His disciplinary power was restricted to ordering penance. Cases of insubordination or crime were to be brought before the abbat, and the provost exposed himself to rebuke if he neglected in three days' time to report them (ibid. c. 181, 152). The importance of his office may be measured by the number, particularity, and strictness of the injunctions for its execution, and the solemn maledictions against the abusers of their authority (ibid. c. 159). He was allowed to have a deputy. If he slept out of the house he was not to be readmitted, even after penance, without the superior's leave (ibid. c. 137). Under the provost were the hebdomadarii, weekly officers who served a week in rotation in various duties connected with divine worship, manual labour, or domestic duties (ibid. c. 12-15). [HEBDOMADARIUS.] Every day, after mattins, the hebdomadarii were to ask the abbat for orders, and carry them into execution. They were to visit all the "houses" to see what each wanted, to give out the books, and collect and replace them at the end of the week (ibid. c. 25). These officers, together with the provost, were to be vigilant guardians of the property of the convent. All tools were to be brought back at the end of the week, counted, and locked up till the beginning of the next (ibid. 66). They were to see that the mats on the pavements of the oratory were beaten, a proper quantity of rushes given out for rope-making, and a register kept of the ropes made each week (ibid. c. 26, 27). A stated daily amount of work was to be required of each brother, but they were not to be distressed by an excessive demand (ibid. c. 177, 179). The day began with public prayer (collecta). No monk was allowed to be absent unless he was sick, or had just returned from a fatiguing journey (ibid. c. 143, 187). The monks were summoned by a horn or trumpet. A penance was imposed on those who came late. No one was to presume to sing without leave, on pain of penance. They were all to repeat scripture in order when called on by clapping the hand. Those who blundered or halted were chidden. No one was to look at another when praying. If any one talked or laughed during service he was to stand before the altar with his head and hands held down, and be rebuked by the superior. No one was to leave the collecta before the end of service, except under necessity (ibid. c. 3-11). Mattins over, the monks were to attend a conference, or a disputation proposed by the provost, or to hear the praecepta majorum read. If a monk fell asleep during reading he was made to stand during the superior's pleasure (ibid. c. 20-23). There was one common meal after mid-day. A table was also set in the evening for the children, old men, and labourers, and for all in the extreme heats of summer. Some ate only at one, some at both meals, some of one dish only, others of more. Some ate only a little bread. If a monk was disinclined to come to the public table he was allowed bread and salt in his cell (Praef. Hieron. c. 5). It was an offence to come late to table, or to talk or laugh during the meal, to stretch out the hand over the table, or to look at others eating. If the provost bid a monk change his place he must obey instantly. Anything wanted must not be asked for, but indicated by a sign (Reg. Pachom. c. 28-33). Neither wine nor broth were allowed (ibid. c. 45). No one was to have more, or more delicate food than another. The plea of indisposition was to be decided on by the superior (ibid. c. 40). No monk might work in his cell. Those who went out to work took pickled vegetables with them (ibid. c. 80). At the end of the meal sweetmeats (tragemata) were given to the monks at the door of the refectory, to be taken to their cells, but not in their hoods, and eaten there. The dispenser was not to take his own share, but to receive it from the provost (ibid. c. 27, 29). A similar rule held good in the distribution of food, materials for work, and the like. A strict community of all things was enforced. No one was to presume to take anything for himself, neither vegetables (c. 73), palm-leaves for weaving (c. 74), ears of corn, grapes, nor fruit (c. 75). Those who were set to gather dates might eat a few, and some were to be brought to the brethren who stayed at home, for their eating; windfalls must not be eaten nor taken to the cells (c. 114), but piled up at the root of the tree (c. 78). No one was to claim anything in his cell as his own, and on changing it, he must leave all it contained to the new-comer. No monk might have his own pair of tweezers for pulling out thorns; a common pair was to hang in the window where the codices were placed (c. 82). No addition must be made to the clothing provided by the superior, viz. two tunics (levitonaria), one worn with use; a long cape for the neck and shoulders (sabanus); a leathern pouch to hang at the side; galoshes (gallicae) and two hoods; a girdle and a staff (c. 81): anything besides this equipment a brother might possess was to be brought to the provost, and placed at his disposal (c. 192). The hoods were to bear the mark of the convent (c. 99). The monks were to sleep alone on a mat spread on the floor without a bolster (c. 81, 88). The cell door was to be always unfastened (c. 107). No one was ever to sleep in any place but in his own cell (c. 87). The rule guards most carefully against the dangers of unrestricted intercourse between members of the society. No one was to enter another's cell without necessity, or remain there when his business was concluded (c. 102). They were never to speak to one another in the dark, or hold one another's hands, or lie together on the same mat. No one was to go out alone (c. 56), but when two walked together they must be a cubit apart (c. 94). A monk was forbidden to anoint, wash, or shave another, or take out a thorn for him, except by the provost's permission (c. 93-95). Two might not ride together on an ass, or on the tilt of a waggon (c. 109). When forced to be together, as when kneading bread, or carrying the dough to the oven, silence was to be maintained, and the mind given to meditation on Holy Scripture (c. 116). The same rule was to be observed on board ship, nor were they to go to sleep on deck, or in the hold, nor allow others to do so (c. 118, 119). The greatest vigilance was to be observed against wandering thoughts. All who had mechanical duties to perform, e.g. to summon the brethren, give out materials, or serve food or dessert, were to meditate on a portion of scripture. When they went to work they were never to talk on secular matters (c. 59, 60). All tattling abroad, or bringing gossip home, was strictly prohibited (c. 85, 86). The rule of Pachomius, in broad distinction to some later rules and the practice of the majority of solitaries, is very particular in its directions about the washing of the monks' clothes. This was to be done in common, at the provost's order; the clothes were to be dried in the sun, but not exposed later than 9 A.M., lest they should get scorched. When brought home they were to be gently suppld (leviter mollientur). If not quite dry one day they were to be laid out a second. There was to be no washing on Sundays except for sailors and bakers (c. 67-73). Invalids received special care. A sick monk was conducted by the provost to the infirmary (trichinium aegrotantium), which he alone was permitted to enter. Extra clothing and food were given to him, according to his need. He was forbidden to carry these to his own cell. He might not be visited even by relations, except by the licence of the provost (c. 42-47). A monk who had hurt himself, or was poorly, but who was still about, might have extra clothing and food at the discretion of the provost (c. 105). There was to be a guest-house (xenodochium), where all who claimed hospitality were to be entertained with due honour. Weaker vessels and women were not to be repulsed, but to be received with caution in a place apart assigned to them (c. 51). If a relation came to see a monk, by the special sanction of the abbat he was allowed to go out and converse with him, with a trustworthy companion. If any good things were brought him to eat he was permitted to carry sweetmeats and fruit to his cell, but whatsoever had to be eaten with bread was to be conveyed to the sick-house, and there partaken of (c. 52). If a monk had to leave the convent to see a sick relative he was bound to observe the rule of the monastery as to eating and drinking (c. 54). He could only attend a kinsman's funeral by the provost's leave (c. 55).

Different degrees of penance were ordained for minor offences: breaking earthenware (c. 125), losing the property of the convent (c. 131), spoiling his clothes (c. 148), appropriating what did not belong to him (c. 149); and heavier punishments for offences of graver complexion; angry and passionate words (c. 161); falsehood (c. 151); false witness (c. 162); corrupting others (c. 163); stirring up dissension (c. 169). Any article found whose owner was unknown was to be hung up for three days before mattins, to be claimed (c. 132). A novice was first to be taught the rules of the order, and was then set to learn twenty Psalms, or two Epistles, or some other part of scripture. If he could not read, he was to have three lessons a day, and be forced to learn to read even against his will ("etiam invitatus legere compelletur"). Every inmate of the convent was expected to know by heart at least the Psalter and the New Testament (c. 139, 140). If any of the boys brought up in the monastery proved idle, and careless, and refused to amend, they were to be flogged. The provost was to be punished if he neglected to report their misdeeds to the abbat (c. 172, 173).

The rules which pass under the names of the early anchorites, Serapion, Paphnutius, and the two Macariuses, though with no claim to be regarded as the production of those fathers, are important as additional evidence of the character of the earliest coenobitic life. The separate ordinances in the main correspond to those of Pachomius. They supply more distinct information as to the apportionment of the early part of the day. The time between the conclusion of mattins and the second hour, 8 A.M., was to be spent in reading, unless any necessary work had to be done for the society. From the second to the ninth hour was to be devoted by each severally to his own work, without murmuring (Regul. Patrum, c. 5, 6). Passing over the rule of Orsiesius, abbat of Tabennae, the disciple of Pachomius (d. c. A.D. 368), which, as its title, "Doctrina sive tractatus" implies, is a prolix hortatory address to the members of his society, embracing all the chief particulars of Pachomius's system, not a code, and the Regula Orientalis, compiled in the 5th century by Vigilantius the deacon from the earlier monastic rules, which exhibit nothing deserving special notice, we come to the rules of the founders of Cappadocian monasticism, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Basil the Great.

Rule of St. Basil.—St. Basil's monastic institutions run to a considerable length. They are comprised in his Sermones Ascetici, and his two collections entitled respectively Regulae fusius tractatae, and the Regulae brevius tractatae. The Constitutiones Asceticae printed in Basil's works, are assigned by the best authorities to Eustathius of Sebaste. The ἐντιμία or Poenae in Monachos Delinquentes, an early example of a Poenitientiale, does not proceed from Basil's pen.

The picture of monastic life in these various rules is characterised by Basil's high-toned piety, and a common-sense drawn from the intimate knowledge of human nature he had gained in his intercourse with the world in early life, which is often wanting in rules of later date. The principle with which he starts is that "the one object of the ascetic life is the salvation of the soul, and that everything that conduces to that should be reverentially observed as a divine command." The unpractical and repulsive form too soon assumed by Eastern asceticism has no place in Basil's idea of the monastic life. Self-discipline is set forth by him, not as having any merit in itself, but as an instrument for enabling the spirit to rise above the flesh, and conquering the appetites and passions of fallen nature to give its whole powers to communion with God. The body was to be rendered the obedient servant of the higher nature, not made unfit for such service by exaggerated austerities. Selfishness is inconsistent with his idea of the religious life. "It was the life of the industrious religious community, not of the indolent and solitary anchorite which was to Basil the perfection of Christianity. . . . Prayer and psalmody were to have their appointed hours; but by no means to intrude upon those devoted to useful labour. . . . Life was in no respect to be absorbed in a perpetual mystic communion with the Deity" (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 9; vol. iii. p. 109). Basil was a zealous advocate of the coenobitic as opposed to the eremitic life, which he condemns as concentrating on self the gifts and graces intended for the benefit of mankind. The solitary buries his talent in the earth, and renders it useless by sloth. He can neither feed the hungry, nor clothe the naked, nor visit the sick. He has no one towards whom he can exhibit humility, or compassion, or patience. If he errs he has no one to bring him back; if he falls no one to lift him up; his offences remain hidden for want of any one to rebuke him. The solitary life, therefore, he decides to be both difficult and dangerous. (Basil, Reg. fusius tract. c. 7). He advises that a coenobitic establishment should be in a retired place, far from the converse of men (ibid. c. 6), and that there should not be more than one such house in the same place, to avoid rivalry and squabbles, to diminish expense and trouble, and to save aspirants from the difficulty of choice and from fickleness of purpose (ibid. c. 35). The number of brethren should be over rather than under ten. A man of tried character and morals should be placed at their head, who might be a pattern of all Christian virtue, and commend his authority by his blameless life. Implicit obedience must be paid him, and his word must be law. He should be old rather than young, but advanced years is not to be deemed the chief qualification (Serm. Ascetic. i. p. 320 sq., ii. p. 324; Reg. c. 48). The superior is to rebuke offenders without fear or favour (c. 25). The brethren are to lay bare to him all the secrets of their hearts, as the confessor of the establishment (c. 26). He should have a deputy to supply his place if sick, absent, or busy (c. 45). No brother is to be admitted without examination and trial for a definite period (c. 10). Married persons may be received on the assurance of mutual consent (c. 12), and children when presented by their parents or lawful guardians. Orphans of both sexes were to be adopted as the children of the community. These were not to be placed on the register until they were old enough to judge for themselves, and could understand the meaning of the monastic vows. They were to be separated from the brethren, except at public worship, and to follow special rules as to sleep, food, hours, etc., suitable to their age (c. 15). Runaway slaves, after admonition and reformation, were to be sent back to their masters. If the master was an evil man who commanded things contrary to God's law, the slave was to be exhorted to obey God rather than man, and to bear patiently the trials he might have to endure (c. 11). Those who entered the society were not bound to resign their property into the hands of their natural heirs if they were likely to abuse it, but should entrust it to those who would use it for God's glory (c. 9). The idea of ownership was to be studiously repressed; no one was to call anything, either shoe or vestment or vessel or any necessary of life, his own. All that the brethren required was to be kept in a common storehouse, and dispensed at the discretion of the superior, according to the needs of the brethren (Serm. Ascet. i. p. 322; ii. p. 324). A monk was forbidden to form any special friendships, and was to endeavour to love all equally (ib. p. 322). The whole life was to be given to prayer (ib. p. 321); but to secure regularity in devotion the canonical hours were to be observed, the midday prayer being divided into two to make up the "seven times a day" of Ps. cxix. v. 164 (ib. p. 322). Work was not to be neglected on the plea of devotion, but the tongue was to be vocal in prayer and psalmody while the hands were busy. The brothers working at a distance were to keep the hours in the field (Reg. c. 37). Every member of the body was to give himself to the works he could do best, so that the whole community might be supported by the labours of its own hands. The nature of these labours was strictly defined. They were to be such as were of real use to the community, not such as might contribute to luxury; such, also, as could be practised without noise, crowds, or disturbing the unity of the brethren. On these grounds weaving and shoemaking were to be preferred to building, carpentering, or braziers' work; but of all occupations agriculture was most recommended (c. 381). The produce of these handicrafts were to be entrusted to a grave, elderly man, deserving of confidence, who would dispose of them without compelling the brethren to leave the convent (Serm. Ascet. i. p. 321). Fairs were to be particularly avoided, even those which under the name of religion were held around the martyrs' tombs (Reg. c. 40). If it was necessary for the brethren to sell their goods themselves, they should, as much as possible, come together to one town and remain there, even if the market was not so good, rather than wander from town to town. All the monks from different convents should assemble in the same inn, both as a mutual safeguard, and to ensure the keeping of the hours of prayer. Towns should be chosen which had a high character for piety (Reg. c. 39). The food eaten should be such as would nourish the body, and whatever was put on the table was to be partaken of; nor was wine to be rejected as something detestable, but drunk when necessary. Satiety, however, was to be avoided, and all eating for the gratification of the appetite (Serm. Ascet. i. § 4, p. 321; Reg. c. 18). No rigid uniformity was to be laid down as to the amount of food taken, but the superior was to judge in each case what was sufficient, with special regard to the sick (c. 19). Squabbles for the highest places at table were discreditable to a family of brothers (c. 21). If guests visited them no difference was to be made for them, but they were to partake of the ordinary fare (c. 20). The monk's clothes should shew humility, simplicity, and cheapness, and should be characteristic of his vocation. He was to wear the same garment by day and night, and never change it for work or resting (c. 22). He was always to be cinctured with a leathern girdle (c. 23). Silence was to be strictly observed except in prayer and psalmody (c. 13), and loud laughter was absolutely forbidden, though a gentle cackinnation was approved of as a sign of a cheerful heart (c. 17). Nods or signs were to be used in place of words or oaths. But even these were forbidden if they indicated sullenness or discontent, or illwill towards others. When it was necessary to speak it should be in a low and gentle voice, except when rebuke or exhortation had to be given, when a louder tone was not forbidden (Serm. Ascet. ii. p. 326). The rejection of medicine under a false notion of its being an interference with the will of God is decidedly condemned. It was to be accepted as God's good gift, to enable the body to render Him more ready service. It must not, however, be trusted to of itself, nor always resorted to on any slight cause. When the malady was distinctly a punishment for sin, it was a grave question whether any attempt should be made to remove it, instead of accepting it submissively as God's gracious chastisement (c. 55). No one was permitted to leave the convent without the licence of the superior (p. 326). Long journeys and protracted absences from home were to be avoided as far as possible. When for the interest of the convent it was necessary that a visit should be paid to a distant place, if there was one in the society who could be trusted to travel without harm to his own soul, and with advantage to those whom he might meet, he might be sent alone. Otherwise several brothers were to go together, who were to take care never to separate from one another, but to be a mutual safeguard. On their return a very strict inquiry was to be made into their conduct during their absence, and suitable penances imposed if they had in any way transgressed the laws of the society. All idle gadding about and huckstering under the plea of business was prohibited as utterly inconsistent with the monastic life (c. 44). All women and idle persons were to be excluded from the convent precincts. If such presented themselves, on no pretext was there to be any intercourse between them and the brethren. The superior alone was to question them as to their business and receive their answers (p. 322). Intercourse with relations was carefully guarded, and was only to be permitted in the case of those with whom edifying conversation could be held. Those who set at nought God's commandments were not to be admitted. All talk which could revive the memory of the monk's former life in the world was to be studiously shunned. A monk's relations were to be regarded as the common kinsmen of the society, not specially his own (c. 32). The necessary intercourse between the male and female members of a religious society was to be ordered so as to give no room for scandal. Two of each sex were to be present at every such interview (c. 33). Labour and rest was to be equally shared among the brothers, who were to be told off in rotation in pairs, every week, for the necessary duties of the establishment, so that all might gain an equal reward of humility (p. 322 ad fin.). A discreet and experienced brother was to be selected, to whom all disputes were to be referred, who, if he could not settle them himself, was to bring them before the superior (c. 49). The superior must be careful not to rebuke anyone angrily, lest instead of delivering his brother from the bonds of his sin he bind himself (c. 50). If rebuke was not sufficient penance must be imposed corresponding to the offence, e.g., exercises of humility for the vainglorious; silence for the empty chatters, vigils or prayer for the sluggards, hard work for the lazy, fasting for the gluttonous, separation from the others for the discontented and querulous (c. 28, 29, 51). Other usual penances were exclusion from the common prayers, or psalmody of the society, or a restriction of food. Incarceration was the punishment for the rebellious, who, if they continued obstinate were to be expelled (p. 322, c. 28). The superior himself was to receive needful warning and correction from the oldest and most prudent brother of the society (c. 27). The superiors of different establishments were to meet at stated times for mutual counsel as to the regulation of their societies, when difficulties were to be discussed, the negligent reprimanded, and suitable commendation given to those who had fulfilled their duties well (c. 54).

The Regulae brevis tractatae, 313 in number, are very short decisions of questions relating to monastic life; e.g. whether it is allowable to talk during psalmody, if a sister who refuses to sing is to be forced, whether a serving brother may speak in a loud tone, if all must come punctually to dinner, and what is to be done with those who come late; as well as resolutions of theological and moral questions, and of scriptural difficulties. The collection is valuable as helping to form a faithful picture of monastic life in detail, but does not answer to the idea of a "rule," as dealing with minor details rather than with broad principles.

The 34 Constitutiones which, as has been stated, are probably to be assigned to Eustathius of Sebaste, are partly addressed to solitaries, partly to coenobites, seventeen to the one, and seventeen to the other class. They are based on the same lines as the rules of St. Basil, and do not add much to our knowledge of monastic life. The duties of humility, obedience, temperance, and independence of all worldly interests are expressed, and rules laid down for the regulation of intercourse with the brethren, and with seculars. The monk must not seek honour or dignity, or desire holy orders (c. 24); he must have no personal friendships (c. 29), nor private business (c. 27); he must not be nice in the choice of his clothes or shoes (c. 30), or be particular in his food (c. 25).^c

Very wholesome counsels are given to the superiors, to treat the brethren with all fatherly kindness, and not enjoin duties beyond their power, though they must take care that no one hides his strength to shirk his tasks (c. 28, 31, 32). They must also exhibit great caution in receiving brethren from other monasteries, lest by admitting the disobedient and mutinous, they encourage laziness and disorder, dishearten the diligent and faithful members of their houses, and render the maintenance of discipline more difficult (c. 33).

The Rule of St. Augustine.—More than one rule for monks is extant under the name of St. Augustine. These are all spurious. The only rule which can claim authenticity is that for nuns contained in his 109th letter, from which it has been extracted and arranged in sections, as the Regula Sancti Augustini sanctimonialibus præscripta. The convent for the use of which this rule was drawn up was that founded by St. Augustine himself at Hippo, and presided over till her death by his sister. She had been succeeded by a nun of long standing who had served under her with her entire confidence, but whose rule had proved so distasteful to the sisters that they rose in open rebellion against her, and clamoured for her removal. In other respects the picture of the convent given in this letter is far from edifying. The society was not only mutinous, but disorderly. Instead of a perfect equality of food and habit, the richer sisters claimed superior indulgences on account of the property they had brought into the house, and looked down on the poorer members, who in their turn grumbled, and accused the superior of partiality. Jealousies, heartburnings, and squabbles were rife. Hard words flew about; unseemly jests and sports among the sisters were not unknown. Presents and letters stole in from the outside world. The life of the sisters was one of self-indulgence rather than of self-discipline, and, foulest charge of all, when they walked about or attended church, their aspect and deportment was far from being characterised by the purity befitting the spouses of Christ. They had begged St. Augustine to visit them, but he declined lest his presence should only bring their dissensions to a head, and force him to adopt severe measures for their correction. He therefore wrote a letter, in which, after severely rebuking the sisters for their contumacy, he proceeds to lay down a code of rules for their future discipline. He first enunciates, as the fundamental principle of coenobitic life, perfect oneness of heart and spirit, and complete community of all things, power being allowed to the lady superior, præposita, to regulate the distribution of food and clothing in accordance with the requirements of each (c. 1). If ladies of property enter the monastery, they must gladly make their wealth over to the common stock, but they must not hold their heads high on that account, or look down on their poorer sisters, finding more to glory of in their association with the lowly than in the rank of their parents. Nor are the poorer sisters to congratulate themselves on obtaining in the convent food and clothing such as they could not have had outside, or think much of themselves on account of their being members of the same society with ladies whom they could not approach in the world, lest, while the rich are humbled in convents, the poor should be puffed up (c. 2, 3). The oratory is to be used only for its proper purpose of singing and prayer, lest, if the sisters gather in it to gossip, those who wish to go there for private devotion should be hindered. They must think of the meaning of the words while they sing, and not sing anything but what is set down (c. 4). When at table, they are not to chatter, but listen to the reading. They must not grudge more delicate food to the feeble in health, or to those who had been accustomed to a more refined mode of life, not regarding them as the happier for having such indulgences, but themselves for not requiring them (c. 5). Dress, as might be expected, presents a great difficulty. All the dresses ought to be in one wardrobe, and looked on as common property, so that no one should take it ill if she does not always have the same dress given out to her, but sometimes has a worse one than another sister, still less that she should grumble or squabble about it. Even if a nun is allowed to have a dress to herself, it must always be put in the same wardrobe with the rest, and no one is permitted to make anything, either for her bed or her person, not even a girdle or cap. If any present of clothing is made to a nun, she must not keep it to herself, but give it to the superior, who will let her have it when she really wants it. Their hair is to be closely covered, no locks being allowed to stray from under the cap by carelessness, or of set purpose; nor must the head-gear be so thin as to let the hair be seen through (c. 6, 10). The nuns' clothes are not to be washed too often, but only when the superior thinks right (c. 11). The sisters are not to have a bath oftener than once a month, unless the physician orders it. Not fewer than three must take it together, and these not by their own choice, but named by the superior. Indisposition is not to be accepted as an excuse for having a bath unless under medical sanction (c. 12). To receive letters or presents of any kind was regarded as a crime of the deepest dye, to be punished severely, if need be, by the bishop himself (c. 9). All immodest or unseemly frolicking between the sisters is strictly forbidden (c. 19), as well as all gazing on men with desire, or of such a character as to excite desire. They must remember that those who do so are seen when they think no one sees them, and even if they escape all mortal eyes, they cannot escape the eye of the all-seeing God (c. 7). The sick are to be under the charge of one sister specially told off for that purpose, who is to ask for what they want from the cellarer, and fulfil her duties without murmuring (c. 13). The books are to be given out at a fixed time, and at no other (c. 14). If a sister detects another in a grave fault, she is to admonish her seriously, but if she perseveres she is to call in the aid of two or three more, and if she still continues obstinate, she is to be reported to the superior, by whose verdict, or that of the presbyter in charge of the convent, she is to be punished (c. 8). All differences or quarrels between sisters are to be checked at once, and forgiveness is to be granted immediately on the expression of penitence. Any one who is unwilling to forgive is out of place in a convent (c. 15, 16, 17). Due self-respect forbids a sister asking pardon of those whom duty has compelled her to rebuke, even if she is conscious that she has used over-harsh language. But she must ask pardon of God alone (c. 18). The rule closes with an order that to do away with the excuse of forgetfulness, the rule is to be read out aloud once every week.

^c Some very curious particulars are given as to the use of the pickle allowed in some convents to give zest to the bread or vegetables. Eustathius does not forbid its use, but recommends its being mixed up with so large a mess of bread or vegetables as to deaden the tempting flavour (c. 25).

The Benedictine rule has been fully treated of in a separate article [BENEDICTINE RULE AND ORDER].

The Rules of Caesarius of Arles.—Among the Western monastic rules which yielded to that most perfect order, was the almost contemporary rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles (d. A.D. 542). This rule, which, in two divisions, embraces both monks and nuns, and was a great advance upon those that had preceded it, has been censured as needlessly pedantic and minute. The censure is little deserved, at least as regards that for monks. That for nuns is much inferior in elasticity to that of St. Benedict, and enters perhaps needlessly into details. But, as has been remarked, the rules "must be judged by their age, and regarded in the light of the whole spirit of monasticism" [CAESARIUS, St.]. The rule for monks starts, as usual, with the perfect community of all things. No one was to have a cell, or even a cupboard, which could be closed (c. 3). Talking was forbidden during singing (c. 3) and at table, when one of the body was to read aloud (c. 9). No religious of either sex was to stand sponsor to a child, lest it should induce too much familiarity with the parents (c. 10). Late comers to service were to be caned on the hand. No one was allowed to reply when rebuked by his superior (c. 11). Monks were to read to the third hour and then fulfil their appointed tasks (c. 14), which were not to be chosen by themselves, but assigned them by the superior (c. 7). The receiving of presents or letters without the cognisance of the abbat was strictly prohibited (c. 15). The fasts were to be limited to Wednesdays and Fridays from Easter to September. Saturday was added from Christmas to a fortnight before Lent. From September to Christmas, and from a fortnight before Lent to Easter, they were to be observed every day except Sunday, when to fast was a sin. Poultry and flesh-meat was forbidden at all times save to the sick. No one was permitted to have anything by his bedside to eat or drink (c. 22, 24). A monk excommunicated for any crime was to be confined in a cell, in company with an elder brother, and employ his time in reading until he was bidden to come out and receive pardon (c. 28). The service for Saturdays, Sundays, and festivals was to include twelve psalms, three antiphons, and three lectures: one each from the prophets, epistles, and gospels (c. 25).

St. Caesarius's rule for nuns is, as has been said, much more minute and particular than that for monks. It is based upon that of St.

Augustine, the chief provisions of which it embodies almost verbatim. Among the most remarkable additional regulations are the following. No one, not even the abbess, was to have a waiting-maid of her own (c. 4). No infant was to be received, nor any child under six or seven years old, who was too young to learn to read and render obedience (c. 5). All the sisters were to perform the kitchen duties and other domestic offices in rotation, with the sole exception of the mother or superior. The cooking sisters were to have some wine for their labour (c. 12). At the vigils, to keep off sleep, work was to be done which would not distract the mind from listening to the reading. If a sister got drowsy, she was to be made to stand (c. 13). The chief occupation of the sisters was to be spinning wool for the clothing of the convent, which was all to be made within the walls, under the superintendence of the provost (præposita) or woolweaver (lanipendia). Each sister was to accept her appointed task with lowliness and fulfil it with modesty (c. 14, 25, 26). No talking was allowed at table. The reading over, each was to meditate on what she had heard (c. 16). All were to learn to read, and to devote two hours, from six to eight in the morning, to study (c. 17). All were to work together in the same apartment. There was to be no conversation while thus engaged. One sister was to read aloud for one hour, after which all were secretly to meditate and pray (c. 18). The sisters were most solemnly charged "before God and the angels" to buy no wine secretly, or to accept it if sent them, but to give it over to the proper officers, who should dispense it to the sick and weakly. Inasmuch as it was customary for a convent cellar to have no good wine, the abbess was to take care to provide herself with such as would be suitable to the sick or delicately nurtured (c. 28). The officers were to receive their keys as a sacred trust, on the Gospels (c. 30). No men were to be admitted, except bishops and other ministers of religion commended by their age and character. The utmost caution was to be observed in the introduction of workmen where any repairs were needed (c. 33). Even females still in the lay habit were to be excluded (c. 34). Banquets were not to be prepared for bishops, abbats, or distinguished female visitors, except most rarely and on very special occasions (c. 36). The abbess was not to take any refreshment alone, except when forced to do so by indisposition or any close occupation (c. 38). If new clothes were sent to a nun, she might accept them with the abbess's leave, provided they were of the proper fashion and colour (c. 40). No dyeing was permitted in the convent except of the simplest hues. The counterpanes and bed furniture were to be of the plainest (c. 41). No embroidery was permitted, with the exception of sewing crosses of black or cream-coloured cloth on cushions or coverings. No male clothing or that of secular females was to be taken into the convent either for washing, mending, or any other purpose (c. 42). No silver plate was to be used except for the service of the oratory (c. 41). To the regula, a recapitulatio is appended, containing additional rules of great particularity relating to diet and the duties of the cellarer and porter.

Rule of St. Isidore of Seville.—A picture is given us of the internal arrangement of a Spanish monastery in the 7th century in the rule of St. Isidore of Seville (d. A.D. 636). The separate rules are of much greater length than is usual in other codes, and may be rather called short homilies on a given text. The monks, when not engaged in public worship or private prayers, were to be always engaged in working with their hands at the various arts or handicrafts with which they were best acquainted. While at work, they were to sing and pray. In summer the day was to be thus divided: from early morning to 9 a.m., work; from 9 to 12, reading; 12 to 3 p.m., rest; 3 to vespers, work. In autumn, winter, and spring, reading and work changed places before and after 9 a.m. (c. 6). When saying the hours, the monks were to avoid talking and laughing, and to prostrate themselves in adoration at the end of each psalm (c. 7). Three times a week there was to be a collatio, when the brothers were to come together to receive instruction from one of the seniors (c. 8), at which any monk might ask questions concerning anything he had not understood in his private reading (c. 9). All were to eat together in the same refectory, ten at a table, the abbat taking his place at the head, and partaking of the same fare with the rest. On all days but Sundays and feast days, when a very little meat was allowed, the diet was to be of vegetables alone, "viles olerum cibos et pallentia legumina." No one was to eat to satiety. Silence was to be kept while one brother read aloud. The gates of the monastery were to be closed at meal-times, and no layman was to venture to intrude. No food was to be taken, save by the sick, except at meal-times (c. 10). The monk's dress was to be sufficient to keep him warm, but remarkable neither for splendour nor meanness. They were never to wear linen. They were to have three tunics and as many capes (pallia) and one hood apiece, to which was to be added a sheepskin, napkin, or a scarf (mappulae), hose (manicae pedales), and a pair of thick shoes (caligae). The stockings were only to be worn indoors during the severity of winter or on a journey. The brethren were to consult decorum by wearing their capes indoors, or, if not, their mappula. A severe denunciation is levelled at those who paid any attention to the appearance of their face, "per quod petulantiae et lasciviae crimen incurrat." All were to have their hair cut short after one fashion, it being reprehensible "diversum habere cultum ubi non est diversum propositum" (c. 13). The brethren were all to sleep in one chamber, if possible. Not fewer than ten were to occupy the same apartment under the superintendence of a decanus. No one was to have better or handsomer bed furniture than another. Each was to be content with a straw mat, a blanket, and two sheepskins. The pillows denied by earlier and sterner rules were allowed them, not one only, but two. A torche-cul, "faecistergium," formed part of their equipment for the night. The beds were to be inspected by the abbat once a week, that no brother might have more or less covering than he needed. Each was to sleep alone. Perfect silence was to be observed. A light was ever to be kept burning (c. 14). The offences against the rules of the monastery were to be visited with different degrees of punishment according to their gravity. The slightest after ordinary penances was a three days' excommunication (c. 16). Excommunication was pronounced by the abbat or provost. The excommunicated party was confined to one place, and absolutely cut off from intercourse with the brethren. No one might talk, pray, or eat with him. He was to fast till evening, when one meal of bread and water was furnished him. Except in the depth of winter, he must sleep on the ground or on a mat, and wear nothing but a closely shorn frock, or a hair shirt and rush shoes (c. 17). All moneys given to the house were to be divided into three parts—one to buy indulgences for the old and sick, and superior food for feast days, one for the poor, one for the monks' clothing and other necessities (c. 18).

The officers of the monastery under the abbat were—(1) The protost, praepositus, who had to manage all law-suits, the care of the estates and buildings, the oversight of the farms, vineyards, and flocks. (2) The sacrist, who had to see that the bell was rung for day and night offices, to take care of the veils, vestments, sacred vessels, books, lights, and all things pertaining to public worship. The wardrobe of the members was also under his care, and he was to give out the thread for making or mending the clothes. The plate of the establishment and all articles of metal were under his charge. To him also was committed the oversight of the tailors, seamsters, chandlers, &c., of the house. (3) The doorkeeper was to guard the entrance, announce all comers, and take care of guests. (4) The cellarer had charge of the victualling department, giving out to the hebdomadary whatever was necessary for the material wants of the brethren, the guests, and the sick. Every week he was to take account of the articles entrusted to the outgoing hebdomadary, and hand them over to the incomer. The whole oversight of the sources of supply, both for the table and the wardrobe, was laid on him, and the labourers, bakers, shepherds, farm servants, shoemakers, &c., were under his command. (5) The hebdomadary was the brother told off in rotation for all minor duties, such as setting the table, preparing the dishes, and ringing the bell. (6) The gardener had the care of the hives of bees in addition to the proper duties of his office. (7) The preparation of the bread devolved partly on laymen, partly on monks. All the more laborious work, the cleaning and grinding the wheat, belonged to the former, the monks only kneading the dough. The laymen were deemed the more skilful bakers. The bread for guests and the sick was to be made by them. (8) An old and very grave monk was entrusted with the care of the storehouse in the city, who was to be accompanied by two boys. (9) A holy, wise, and aged brother was to be selected to bring up and teach the boys; and (10) one who possessed the gift of administration was to act as almoner and hospitaler (c. 19). The utmost care was to be taken of those who were really sick, but caution was observed lest sickness was simulated to obtain indulgences. Baths were not permitted, except to those whose health required them (c. 20). Guests were to be received with all cheerfulness and honour, and their feet washed (c. 21). Absence from the convent was forbidden, except by express permission of the superior. Two should always go together if duty called them to the town or elsewhere, who, before they set out and on their return, were to receive the solemn blessing of the society in the church. None was allowed to see relatives or friends, or to receive letters, or send letters or presents without special leave. Monks visiting another monastery were bound to live according to the law of the society to avoid giving scandal to the weak (c. 22). On each occasion of the decease of a monk, the holy sacrifice was to be offered before his burial for the remission of his sins, and a general celebration was to take place at Whitsuntide for all the departed. The dead were all to be buried in the same cemetery, "that one place might embrace those in death whom charity had united in life" (c. 23).

We have the rules of another Spanish house in the Regula Monachorum and the Regula Monastica Communis of St. Fructuosus, archbishop of Braga in Portugal, in the 7th century (Holstenius, vol. i. p. 198, sq.). These will reward examination, but space forbids our entering on them here. The most detailed rule belonging to this period is that known as the Regula Magistri ad Monachos (Holstenius, ib. p. 224 sq.), containing no less than ninety-five canons of considerable prolixity, each containing an answer to a question of a disciple. The date and country of the author are doubtful, but it is clear that his rule is subsequent to that of St. Benedict, and various expressions and allusions render it probable that the rule was composed in Gaul. The minuteness and puerility of some of the rules shew the decay of the free self-reliant spirit of the original founders of monasticism.

Rule of St. Columba.—Our examples of monastic rules have hitherto been taken from Asia and southern Europe. We will conclude with the transcript of that attributed to one of the noblest patterns of Northern monasticism—St. Columba. Although, in the words of Mr. Haddan, "the nature of its contents and the absence of evidence that St. Columba ever composed a written rule, mark it almost certainly as the later production of some Columbite monk or hermit," this document may be regarded as embodying the principles and general regulations of early Celtic monasticism, and therefore of great value. This rule was first printed by Dr. Reeves from a MS. in the Burgundian Library at Brussels. It is found also in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. ii. p. 119. The translation alone is here given from Skene's Celtic Scotland, vol. ii. p. 508.

"The rule of Columcille here beginneth :

"(1) Be alone in a separate place near a chief city (i.e. an episcopal see) if thy conscience is not prepared to be in common with the crowd.

"(2) Be always naked, in imitation of Christ and the evangelists.

"(3) Whatsoever, little or much, thou possessest of anything, whether clothing, or food, or drink, let it be at the command of the senior and at his disposal, for it is not befitting a religious to have any distinction of property with his own free brother.

"(4) Let a fast place, with one door, enclose thee.

"(5) A few religious men to converse with thee of God and His testament and to visit thee on days of solemnity ; to strengthen thee in the testaments of God and the narratives of the Scriptures.

"(6) A person, too, who would talk with thee in idle words, or of the world, or who murmurs at what he cannot remedy or prevent, but who would distress thee more were he to be a tattler between friend and foe, thou shalt not admit him to thee, but at once give him thy benediction, should he deserve it.

"(7) Let thy servant be a discreet religious, not tale-telling man, who is to attend continually on thee, with moderate labour of course, but always ready.

"(8) Yield submission to every rule that is of devotion.

"(9) A mind prepared for red [bloody] martyrdom.

"(10) A mind fortified and steadfast for white martyrdom [i.e. self-mortification, and bodily chastisement].

"(11) Forgiveness from the heart to every one.

"(12) Constant prayer for those who trouble thee.

"(13) Fervour in singing the office for the dead as if every faithful dead was a particular friend of thine.

"(14) Hymns for souls to be sung standing.

"(15) Let thy vigils be constant from eve to eve under the direction of another person.

"(16) Three labours in the day, viz. prayers, work, and reading.

"(17) The whole to be divided into three parts, viz. thine own work and the work of thy place as regards its real wants ; secondly, thy share of the brethren's work ; lastly, to help the neighbours only by instruction, or writing, or sewing garments, or whatever labour they may be in want of, as the Lord has said, 'Thou shalt not appear before me empty.'

"(18) Everything in its proper order, for 'no man is crowned except he strive lawfully.'

"(19) Follow almsgiving before all things.

"(20) Take not of food till thou art hungry.

"(21) Sleep not till thou feellest desire.

"(22) Speak not except on business.

"(23) Every increase that cometh to thee in lawful meals, or in wearing apparel, give it for pity to the brethren that want it, or to the poor in like manner.

"(24) The love of God, with all thy heart and all thy strength.

"(25) The love of thy neighbour as thyself.

"(26) Abide in the testaments of God throughout all times.

"(27) Thy measure of prayer shall be until thy tears come.

"(28) Or thy measure of work of labour till thy tears come.

"(29) Or thy measure of thy work of labour, or of thy genuflexions, until thy sweat often fomes if thy tears are not free." [E. V.]

III. ARCHITECTURE.—The object of the present section is to give some account of the structural and architectural development of the buildings comprised under the general term "monastery."

The word monastery has in popular use travelled far from its original meaning. True to its derivation, μοναστήριον was primarily the dwelling-place of a solitary ascetic, μοναχός, where he lived in complete isolation from his fellow-men. Cassian thus defines very clearly the difference between a monasterium and a coenobium. "Monasterium potest unius monachi habitaculum nominari. Coenobium autem non potest nisi plurimorum cohabitantium degit unita communio." (Collat. xviii. 18.) The founders of Christian monasticism (the Jews, it will be remembered, had had both hermitages and coenobitic communities), Paul and Antony in Egypt, and Hilarion in Palestine, and the crowd of Eastern anchorites who emulated their example in abnegation of the world and severe self-discipline, made their dwelling in deserted tombs, rock-hewn or natural caverns, or huts of the rudest construction, whose contracted dimensions barely afforded shelter for a human body. Hilarion, c. A.D. 328, is described as living in a cabin on the sea-shore, near Gaza, built of boards and broken tiles, and thatched with straw, too small either to stand or lie down in (Soz. Eccl. Hist. iii. 14). This affords an example of the earliest form of Christian monasticism, before the ascetics had felt the necessity of withdrawing entirely from the world. In such cases they placed their habitations at no great distance from a village or town, where they lived singly, independent of one another, supporting themselves by the labour of their hands, and distributing what remained after the supply of their own scanty wants to the poor around. Increasing fear of contact with the world, and a vain hope of escaping temptation by fleeing from the society of their kind, aided by persecution, contributed to drive these ascetics into mountain solitudes, and the most remote recesses of the desert. But even there they could not be alone. A hermit's reputation for superior sanctity robbed him of the isolation he coveted. "In all parts the determined solitary found himself constantly obliged to recede farther and farther. He could scarcely find a retreat so dismal, a cavern so profound, a rock so inaccessible, but that he would be pressed upon by some zealous competitor, or invaded by the humble veneration of some disciple . . . The more he concealed himself the more he was sought out by a multitude of admiring and emulous followers. Each built or occupied his cell in the hallowed neighbourhood. A monastery was thus imperceptibly formed around the hermitage" (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 11, vol. iii. p. 207). This gradual formation of a monastic community is strikingly exemplified in the case of Antony (A.D. 312), who, as Neander remarks (Ch. Hist. vol. iii. p. 316, Clark's tr.), "without any conscious design of his own thus became the founder of a new mode of living in common. Thus arose the first societies of anchorites, who lived scattered in single cells or huts, united together under one superior." Other examples of this rudimentary coenobitism are given by St. Julianus Sabbas, who, having retired to a cave in Osrhoene, was followed by eager votaries, with whom he shared his rock-hewn dwelling, as many as a hundred at last finding shelter in its labyrinthine recesses (Theod. Vit. Patr. p. 774). Passing from the East to the West we find St. Honoratus also at the end of the 4th century, while occupying a cavern at Cape Roux, near Fréjus, converting the Isle of Lerins into a second Thebaid, through the multitude of the disciples that flocked to him, and took up their abode in adjacent caverns. The foundation of Saint-Antoine de Calamus, in the Pyrénées Orientales, and la Sainte-Baume, in the Bouches du Rhône, and the celebrated Spanish religious site of Mont Serrat, are mentioned by Le Noir (Architecture monastique) as still exhibiting interesting examples of the manner in which monasteries, in the later sense, grew up around the cavern, which was the consecrated retreat of some one solitary celebrated for his sanctity. Le Noir gives a plan shewing no fewer than thirteen different hermitages collected round the centre of chief sacredness at Mont Serrat. A Byzantine painting of the funeral of St. Ephrem Syrus, of the 10th or 11th century, preserved in the Christian Museum at the Vatican, engraved by Agincourt (Peinture, pl. lxxiii.), affords a graphic representation of one of these communities [MONKS, IN ART]. Seven or eight caverns are depicted, each with its bearded inmates, some engaged in prayer, others in basket-making or forge work. From the roof of the caverns depend lamps and sacred pictures. St. Martin of Tours, in A.D. 356, housed the monks he collected about him at Ligugé, near Poitiers, in wattled huts, his own being of the same character, "ipse eo lignis contextam cellulam habebat" (Sulpic. Sever. Vita Beati Martini). At a later period of his life, when he had resigned his bishopric at Tours, and retired to Marmoutier (Majus Monasterium), he again collected a confraternity about him, the cells being hollowed out of the soft calcareous rock.

The first to introduce order and system into these irregular collections of monastic recluses was Pachomius (d. A.D. 348), who may be regarded as the founder of coenobitic life among Christians. The solitaries continued for the most part to live in their old cells, but they were incorporated into a regular community by the adoption of rules, of which Pachomius was the author, for the division of their time, their daily occupations, their stated gatherings for worship and food, etc., all the members being subject to the head or father of the body. The first ascetic community of this nature was formed on the island of Tabennae, in the Nile, in Upper Egypt, between Tentyra and Thebes. Eight others were founded in Pachomius's lifetime, numbering 3000 monks. The advantages of a settled organisation and a recognised authority caused the rapid spread of the institution. A multitude of affiliated coenobia sprang up in Egypt and the Thebais, recognising Tabennae as their mother house, which within fifty years of Pachomius's death could reckon 50,000 members. These coenobia may be compared to religious villages, peopled by a hard-working ascetic brotherhood, from which females were rigidly excluded. Each coenobium was surrounded by an enclosure, "diversas cellas in una aula" (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca. ii.), with a single door guarded by a doorkeeper (Regula Sancti Pachomii, xxvi. xxx.), and comprised from thirty to forty dwellings, each group of three or four being united for common labour. These cells, each of which, according to Sozomen (H. E. iii. 14), housed three monks, were detached ("manent separati sejunctis cellulis," Hieron. Epist. ad Eustoch. xxii. § 35; "tres in cella manent," Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca. ii.), and arranged in orderly rows or avenues (λαύραι). There was a common refectory, with its kitchen and cellars, to which the brothers were summoned for their common repast by the sound of a horn at 3 P.M. (ibid. ii. xix.), up to which time they fasted. There was a garden with its gardeners (xxxviii.). For sick monks there was an infirmary, with a triclinium aegrotantium (xx.), and for strangers and wayfarers a guest-house, xenodochium. There was also a common oratory, to which the monks were summoned by a horn or trumpet. The monks slept in their cells, not in beds, but on reclining chairs. They devoted their time to handicrafts, chiefly the making of baskets and mats from the rushes of the Nile, but also paying attention to agriculture and shipbuilding. At the end of the 4th century each of the Pachomian coenobia had a vessel of its own, built by the monks themselves. There were also artisan brothers who supplied the community with its chief necessities. Palladius, who visited the Egyptian coenobia towards the close of the 4th century, found at Panopolis, among the 300 members, fifteen tailors, seven smiths, four carpenters, fifteen tanners, and twelve camel drivers (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca. c. 39). Each coenobium was regulated by its own oeconomus, the whole body being subordinate to the oeconomus of the entire Pachomian confraternity (ὁ μέγας οἰκονόμος, residing at the principal monastery, where they met twice a year under the presidency of the archimandrite (the "chief of the fold"), and at their last meeting gave in an account of their administration during the year (Vit. Pachom. § 52; Hieron. Praefat. in Regul.; Pachom. § 8, quoted by Neander, vol. iii. p. 318, Clark's edition). Coenobitic institutions were introduced into Palestine by Hilarion, c. 328. He founded a monastery on the Pachomian principle, near his native town of Gaza, the houses affiliated to which soon spread over the whole of Syria. Chrysostom in early life joined one of these monastic communities in the vicinity of Antioch, and we learn many particulars relating to them from his writings. The monks lived in separate huts, κάλυβαι, dotted over the mountain side. They had a common refectory in which they partook of their frugal evening meal of bread and water, reclining on hay. Sometimes they took their repast out of doors. There was also an oratory in which they assembled four times a day for prayer and psalmody (Chrysost. Homil. in Matt. 68, 69; Homil. in 1 Tim. 14). The coenobitic system spread rapidly in Asia. It was introduced into Armenia by Eustathius of Sebaste, into Pontus and Cappadocia by Basil the Great, and the influence of Ephrem Syrus secured for it an enthusiastic reception in Mesopotamia, but few, if any, details of the arrangement or construction of the monastic buildings have come down to us. A century later we learn much respecting the construction of Syrian coenobia, and the distinction between such institutions and a "Laura," from the life of Euthymius (d. A.D. 473), by Cyrillus Scythopolitanus. The monasteries, as we have seen, generally had their nucleus in the cells and hermitages of distinguished anchorites. This was the case with those of Elias and Martyrius (Vit. Euthym. c. 95), and still more remarkably with the vast monastic establishment, called from its venerated founder, Euthymius, which was gradually developed from the little dwelling-place erected by his noble Saracen convert, Ashebethos, or Peter (afterwards first bishop of the Paremboleae), as a token of his gratitude. Ashebethos began by excavating a huge cistern, near which he constructed a bakehouse and three cells, and an oratory, that Euthymius might stand in need of nothing he required. There had been no original intention of erecting either a laura or a coenobium, but such a step was rendered necessary by the large number of Saracen converts who flocked thither desiring to embrace a religious life. For their accommodation more cells were built, and a church erected, consecrated by Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem (Vita Euthymii, cc. 37, 41, 42). It is evident from other parts of this biography that a laura was distinguished from a coenobium, as being a place of stricter discipline, and therefore less fitted for a young monastic aspirant (cc. 88, 89, 91). A coenobium, with its oratory, refectory, and other monastic offices, and orderly rows of contiguous cells, enclosed within a high protecting wall, not unfrequently formed the central mass of the wide area of the laura, with its straggling groups of cabins. Thither the anchorites from the laura repaired every Saturday and Sunday for worship and instruction, bringing with them the mats and baskets, and other articles they had finished, and taking back materials for the work of the next week, together with a supply of bread and water, after having partaken of a little cooked food and wine in the general refectory (ibid. cc. 89, 90). On the elevation of Anastasius to the see of Jerusalem, A.D. 458, he ordained his early friend and fellow anchorite, Fidus, deacon, who, in obedience to a supposed vision of St. Euthymius, destroyed the cells of the laura, and converted the whole establishment into a coenobium. Anastasius supplied them with a large body of masons, and builders, and engineers, by whose labour the work of rebuilding was completed in the space of three years. The whole area was fortified with a palisade and wall, and further protected by a strong tower, forming the citadel or stronghold of the whole desert, rising in the middle of the cemetery, on the very brink of the steep precipice on which the monastery was built, with the gate just below. A new church was built, the old one being converted into the refectory of the brethren (ibid. cc. 114–119). The tower, just described, was a very usual feature in the monasteries of the East, which, from their liability to attack from the predatory tribes, assumed the character of strong fortresses, surrounded by lofty blank stone walls, sometimes crenellated and strengthened with bastions, within which lay the monastic buildings, in some cases with the additional security of a moat and drawbridge. The whole establishment was dominated by a lofty tower, near the entrance, like the keep of a Norman castle, placed under the patronage of the Virgin Mary, St. Michael the archangel, apostles, or saints, to which the inmates might flee for protection when the rest of the buildings had fallen into the hands of the assailants. As examples of these fortified monasteries we may mention the White Monastery in Egypt, which Denon says, with a few pieces of artillery on the walls, could be defended against an enemy—the monasteries around the Natron Lakes, and those on Mount Athos, and at Meteora in Thessaly. In some cases protection was still further secured by the single entrance being made many feet above the ground, only accessible by long ladders, or by a basket raised by a windlass, e.g., at the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, the White Convent in Egypt, the monasteries of Nitria, and those of Mount Athos.

The ground plan of the Eastern monasteries, where the locality permitted, was always rectangular, with the church or Catholicon as the chief object in the midst of the area, and the cells round. These were at first scattered, then in groups, and ultimately ranged side by side and connected by a covered cloistered walk. The monastery of Santa Laura on Mount Athos is a typical example of an Oriental monastery. Its fortified enceinte encloses between three and four acres, comprising two courts, in the centre of which stands the Catholicon, surrounded by an open cloister, from which on three sides the cells open. The refectory, which opens from the west cloister facing the church, and projects into the large outer covert, is a cruciform hall, about 100 feet each way, with an apsidal termination. The Eastern refectories were usually built on the plan of a triclinium, with an apsidal recess on each of their sides. It is so with the existing refectory at Parenzo in Istria (see woodcut, vol. i. p. 377), and the plan of the now demolished dining-hall at the Lateran was of a similar form, but much longer.

A very remarkable monastery of early date, which preserves in the main the plan of the 7th or 8th century, though frequently subjected to hostile attacks, exists at Etchmiadzin, the ecclesiastical capital of the Armenian nation. This was founded A.D. 302 by Gregory the Illuminator, in the reign of Tiridates, who, with his people, embraced Christianity twelve years before the conversion of Constantine. Within a lofty battlemented wall, a mile in circuit, lies a confused mass of buildings of different descriptions, besides some gardens and open areas, comprising almost a little town, with workshops for almost every description of trade—as at the coenobium of Panopolis described above—and a kind of bazaar or market for the sale of the monastic produce. Besides the cells of the monks on the west side of the great court there are apartments for the Armenian patriarch, as well as for the archbishops, bishops, and archimandrites from other monasteries. A separate quadrangle to the south, with a fountain in the centre, is devoted to the reception of guests. There are two refectories, one for summer and the other for winter use. The former is described as a long, low-vaulted room, with one long, narrow table running down the middle between two stone benches. There is a canopied throne for the patriarch, and a pulpit for the reader. The church is cruciform, with exceedingly short transepts, and a small apse, resembling in plan a square with four shallow recesses (Bryce, Transcaucasia and Ararat, p. 303 ff.).

The Coptic monasteries in Upper Egypt are among the earliest and the least altered now in existence. Lenoir gives a plan of one of the smaller monasteries, shewing a quadrangular mass of building, of which a three-aisled church, terminating in three cellular apses, and preceded by a narthex, forms the leading feature. Along the north wall of the church runs a range of cells, opening on either side of a long corridor, approached by a staircase.

The "White Monastery," or Day'r Abon Sherood, on the edge of the Libyan Desert, attributed to the empress Helena, corresponds to this type (Curzon, Monasteries in the Levant, p. 122). It is described as a building of an oblong shape, about 200 feet in length by 90 feet wide, very well built of fine stone. It has no windows outside larger than loopholes, and these are at a great height from the ground; twenty on the south side and nine at the east end. The walls slope inwards, and are crowned with a deep overhanging cornice. There is one doorway on the south side, entered from a narthex. The church was a noble basilica, with fifteen columns on each side of the nave, the apse and transept recesses covered with semi-domes. The monks' cells were contained in a long slip at the side of the church, lit by narrow loopholes. There is no court or open area within the building. The flat roof afforded the place of open-air exercise for its inmates. The desert of the Natron Lakes, which was one of the earliest seats of monasticism, contains some curious early convents. Only four remain entire, but the ruins of many others may still be traced. Those which remain are establishments of the larger type, surrounded by high walls of immense strength, unbroken by window or any other aperture, save the single door of entrance. Even this opening has in later times been not unfrequently built up for protection against hostile attacks, and the only way of admission is through a window furnished with a windlass. The walls enclose a considerable space of ground, including gardens and orchards, and usually contain several detached churches. The monastery Day'r Macarius, called after the celebrated anchorite of the name, contains four churches; the Day'r Syriani, and the Day'r Amba Bishoi, three each; and the Day'r Antonias in the Eastern desert, the largest monastery in Egypt, built over the cave of St. Antony, also contains four churches standing quite detached. The refectories of these monasteries are long, narrow, vaulted rooms, furnished with a stone table down its entire length, and usually with stone benches on either side, and a lectern also of stone. Each of these religious houses is provided with its kas'r or tower, commonly dedicated to St. Michael, a chapel to whom occupies the top story. ("Notes on the Coptic Day'rs," by Greville J. Chester, Archæological Journal, vol. xxx. p. 105 ff.)

The genius of the Western church, more practical and less contemplative, was at first unfavourable to monasticism. The powerful influence of Athanasius prepared the way for its reception in the West, which was secured by the enthusiastic adhesion of Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. Little, however, is known of the arrangements of the early Italian monastic institutions. We learn, however, from the rules laid down by St. Augustine for the guidance of his nuns in North Africa, that the buildings included a wardrobe, in which the nuns' habits were kept, over which were one or two wardrobe keepers, whose duty it was to beat and shake the clothes, and keep them free from moth. There was a library for the "codices," and as there was a "cellerarius" there must have been a cellar (St. Augustine, Regulae pro Sanctimonialibus, 10, 13, 14).

The monastic institutions for males, established by Augustine in North Africa, assumed an intermediate form, corresponding to a considerable extent to the colleges of secular canons of later times. The foundations of such an institution, probably coeval with Augustine, were discovered by Leon Renier, at Tebessa, the ancient Thereste, of which a drawing and description are given by Le Noir (Architect. Monast. ii. p. 483, pl. 553). The plan gives an outer and inner court at different levels, the inner being the higher. The outer court is surrounded by a cloister, and has the domestic offices to the north, and a long narrow vestibule to the south. The inner court forms an atrium before the church, a basilica of ten bays with an apse. The whole church and atrium are surrounded by a succession of rectangular cells, opening on the lower level of the outer court, surrounded by a terrace walk. To the south opening from the church is a large triclinal refectory, a baptistery, and other offices. The whole is surrounded by a wall and towers. Lenoir also gives the ground plan of Strassburg cathedral (ii. 480) as built by Clovis, c. A.D. 496. The church is rectangular and two-aisled, ending square, not apsidally. To the east of the church is an open court, surrounded on three sides by the apartments for the bishop and his clergy, partially embracing the church.

Monasticism in the West, after having been almost crushed out during the migration and settlement of the nations, was revived by St. Benedict of Nursia, c. A.D. 529, by whom the system was reorganised and reduced to order. "The Benedictine rule was universally received, even in the older monasteries of Gaul, Britain, Spain, and throughout the West—not as that of a rival order, but as a more full and perfect rule of the monastic life" (Milman, Lat. Christ. vol. i. p. 425, note x). Not only were new monasteries founded, but those already existing were frequently demolished and rebuilt in accordance with the requirements of the new rule. One leading principle of the Benedictine arrangement was that the walls of the monastery should include within them everything that was necessary for the material wants of the establishment, as well as the buildings connected with their religious, literary, and social life, to do away with the necessity of the inmates going beyond its bounds. It should contain water, a mill, bake-houses, stables, and cow-houses, etc., together with workshops for all necessary mechanical arts (Regulae Sancti Benedicti, 57, 66). The precinct was to be surrounded with a wall with one gate, at which a cell should be built for the gatekeeper, who was to be always on the spot to give an answer to all comers (ibid.). The buildings were to comprise an oratory (52), a refectory (38), a kitchen in which the monks were to serve week and week about (35), a cellar, superintended by a "cellerarius" (31), a dormitory large enough if possible to contain all the monks (22), a wardrobe (55), an infirmary (36), and a guest-house (50).

These rules are illustrated by the very remarkable plan of the monastery of St. Gall, c. A.D. 820, the larger portion of which has been engraved to illustrate the article CHURCH (I. p. 383). Its general appearance is that of a town of detached houses, with streets running between them, forming thirty-three detached blocks of building, all of which, except the church, were probably built of wood, and were generally of one story. The buildings form distinct groups. In the centre is the church and cloister, and the group belonging to the distinctly monastic life; to the east and north the group appropriated to the education of the young, and the care of the sick, with the abbat's house watching over the whole. To the west and north-west lies the group appropriated to hospitality; while the group connected with the grosser material wants of the establishment is placed at the furthest distance from the church to the west and south. By a reference to the plan it will be seen that the quadrangular cloister-court forms the nucleus of the establishment, round which the principal buildings are ranged. The two-apsed church stands to the north, that the cloister might be sunny and warm; the refectory to the south, the side furthest removed from the church that the worshippers might not be annoyed with noise or smell, with the kitchen annexed. From the kitchen a passage leads to the bakehouse and brewhouse, and the sleeping-rooms of the domestics. To the west, closely adjacent to the kitchen and refectory, is a two-storied building, cellar below, and larder and storeroom above. The absence of the chapter-house is perplexing. In all Benedictine houses the chapter-house opens from the east walk of the cloister, and the entire absence of so essential an element of monastic life throws a little doubt on the perfect accuracy of the plan. The east side is entirely occupied by the "pisalis," or "calefactory," the common day-room of the monks, warmed by flues under the floor. The dormitory occupies the upper story of this building, communicating by a staircase with the south transept of the church to enable the brethren to attend the nocturnal services without going into the open air. A passage leads from the dormitory to the "necessarium"—a portion of the monastic building always planned with the most delicate attention to health and cleanliness. Above the refectory is the "vestiarium," where the habits of the monks were kept. The "parlatorium," where the monks might have intercourse with members of the outer world, lies between the church and the cellar, with one door opening into the cloister, and another into the outer court. On the eastern side of the north transept is the "scriptorium" with the library above.

To the east of the church stands a group of buildings comprising two miniature monastic establishments, each complete in itself, the infirmary devoted to the sick monks, and the house of the "oblats" or novices. Each has a covered cloister, surrounded by the usual buildings, refectory, dormitory, etc., and an apsidal chapel, placed back to back. Contiguous to the infirmary stands the physician's residence, with the physic garden, the drug store, the house for blood-letting and purging, and a chamber for the dangerously sick, closely adjacent.

The "outer school," standing to the north of the church, contains a large schoolroom, divided across the middle by a screen or partition, and surrounded by fourteen little rooms termed "the dwellings of the scholars." The head master's house stands opposite, under the north wall of the church. Close to the school to the east stands the abbat's house opposite the north transept of the church, conveniently placed for the supervision of both branches of the educational department, the outer school, and the house of the novices, as well as of the infirmary.

The two "hospitia" or guest-houses for strangers of different degrees comprise a large common chamber or refectory in the centre, surrounded by bedrooms. Each has its own brewhouse and bakehouse, and that for travellers of a higher class is also provided with a kitchen and storeroom, sleeping accommodation for the servants, and stables for horses. There is also an hospitium for strange monks under the north wall of the church.

Beyond the church at the eastern boundary of the convent area to the south is the "factory," containing workshops for shoemakers, saddlers, cutlers, and grinders, trencher-makers, tanners, curriers, fullers, smiths, and goldsmiths, with their dwellings behind. On this side also is the agricultural establishment, comprising the granary and threshing floor, mills, malthouse, ox-sheds, goat-stables, piggeries, sheep-cotes, together with the servants' and labourers' quarters. At the south-east corner is the poultry-yard with the duck and hen-house, and the keeper's dwelling. Close by is the kitchen-garden, and the cemetery, planted with fruit trees. This plan exhibits a Benedictine monastery as a well-organised religious, educational, and industrial establishment, in which every department had its most suitable position, and nothing was neglected which could conduce to the well-being of the institution, and the adequate fulfilment of the purposes of its foundation.

The Irish and early Scotch monasteries of the 6th and 7th centuries, such as that of Armagh and Iona, followed the Eastern model. The monastery proper was enclosed by a rampart and fosse, which, however, was usually circular, not quadrilateral, intended rather for restraint than for the security of its inmates. This "vallum" included the church or oratory, the refectory, with its kitchen and offices, and the lodgings, hospitia, of the community, placed round a court, platea. The hospitia appear to have been originally, as in the East, detached huts, formed of wattles or of wood. The monks slept on lectuli, each provided with a straw pallet and a bolster. The abbat's house in Columba's time, hospitium, stood on an eminence at some little distance from the other dwellings, and was built of beams and joists. Here was the founder's lectulus, here also he sat, and wrote or read, attended on by one brother, who occasionally read to him, or by two, who stood at the door awaiting his orders. The codices belonging to the foundation hung in leathern wallets round the walls of a special apartment, which also contained the waxed tablets and the stiles, the pens and ink-horns. On the arrival of a stranger, if there was no guest-house, which, however, was found in not a few Irish monasteries, one of the huts was specially prepared for him. Outside the vallum were the various agricultural dependencies, the cowhouse, the barn, the kiln needed for drying the corn in that damp climate (canaba), the mill with its pond and stream, the stables, and cart sheds. There was also a smithy and a carpenter's shop, and other appendages of a like kind. Those who desired to follow a stricter life than the ordinary members, had permission granted by the abbat to withdraw to some solitary place in the neighbourhood of the monastery, where they might devote themselves to undisturbed meditation, without breaking the bond of brotherhood. Such a place of retirement was called a desert, from the Latin desertum, a word which is of very frequent occurrence in early Irish and Scotch ecclesiastical literature (Reeves, Life of St. Columba, pp. 357-369).

IV. LIST OF MONASTERIES FOUNDED BEFORE

A.D. 814.—All kinds of monastic communities (often not to be precisely distinguished in the meagre notices of the earliest monasteries) are included in the following list; which, in the absence of any existing work upon these ancient monasteries of a full and general character, has been carefully compiled chiefly from the works of Dugdale, Arckdall, Spottiswood, Kuen, Bulteau, and Migne's Patrology. Still the monasteries here given are a very small proportion of the numbers actually existing, especially in the East, in these early times. An asterisk has been prefixed to houses for nuns. Monasteries of the Benedictine and Augustinian orders are marked respectively O. Ben. and O. Aug.; and where the exact date of their foundation is uncertain, the abbreviations c. for circa, and cent. for century, are used; while a. for ante is prefixed to the date given in many instances as the earliest known time of the monastery's existence. For convenience of reference there has been added a SUPPLEMENTARY INDEX of the names and places of the monasteries, where these differ materially from the alphabetically arranged order of the Latin name in the list itself.

[E. B. W.]

MONASTIC BISHOP, though not entirely unknown in the Eastern church (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. i. vi. c. 34) came into greatest prominence in the Western, in the development of the church's life. According to the Catholic idea of the church, the bishop is supreme in all spiritual things in his own diocese, the visible source of orders, mission, and all sacramental graces (C. Antioch. c. 9). But in different ages this has received various limitations, specially from the principle of patriarchates on the one side and from that of monasticism on the other. The relation of the monastery to the episcopate was at first that of entire subjection (C. Chalch. c. 4; Baronius, Ann. Eccl. A.D. 451, § 25; Bingham Orig. Eccl. ii. c. 4, § 2), even to the appointment of the abbat (Justinian, Novell. v. c. 9). But in course of time this was altered, (1) by papal exemptions, on account, apparently at the outset, of episcopal officiousness (Baronius, ib. A.D. 598, § 3, 601, § 2; Anglo-Sax. Chron. A.D. 675, 963), or by regal, as by King Ina's charter to Glastonbury A.D. 725 (Wilkins, Conc. i. 80), or by conciliar, as by the synod at Herutford, A.D. 673 (Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv. c. 5), and perhaps the third council of Arles, A.D. 455 (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. i. c. vii. § 14), and (2) by the spread of Christianity through monastic agencies beyond the limits of the old Roman empire and hence outside the ordinary means of diocesan organisation.

[ORDERS.] So long as the monastery continued under the entire jurisdiction of the bishop as head and centre of spiritual life in his diocese, he supplied the needs of its members with all episcopal offices. But when the monastery was either withdrawn from his jurisdiction, or was established prior to and practically outside the direct agency of the bishop, the natural relations became inverted, and while the grace of orders remained of necessity with the bishop, the jurisdiction and mission passed for the time to the monastery, and the monastic bishop was under the jurisdiction of the monastic head, the abbat, whether ordained or lay. This is most frequently met with in the Celtic church of Ireland and her offshoots in Scotland and Northumbria, where it presented itself to the venerable Bede as an "ordo inusitatus" (Hist. Eccl. iii. c. 4). It is also met with on the continent. According to ecclesiastical principle the monastery required a bishop for the discharge of episcopal functions to the inmates, and if the chief official was the abbat, the bishop was at least one of the "family," honoured indeed for his sacred office (Adamn. Vit. S. Col. i. c. 44), though under the abbat in jurisdiction and monastic precedence; he was higher in spiritual power (ib. i. c. 36), though lower in local dignity and official, that is, monastic rank.

Monasticism spread rapidly from the Thebaids into the Western church, its great patron in Gaul being St. Martin, the celebrated bishop of Tours (A.D. 371-397), who built monasteries at Poitiers and Tours, and by his authority and exhortation established the monastic system. When and by whom the Gospel was carried across the Channel to Britain and Ireland is unknown to authentic history, but Pelagius introducing monasticism seems a fable (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 291). When the Gospel is met with in Britain it is radiating from monastic centres (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. c. 27, ii. c. 2), and it was not till the 12th century that the monastic church of Ireland had become merged in the diocesan. Accepting the "Catalogus Sanctorum Hiberniae, secundum diversa tempora," supposed to have been written by Tirechan in the 8th century, and first published by Ussher (Brit. Eccl. Ant. vi. 477-479), as embodying a certain amount of truth regarding the condition of the early Irish church, as at one time purely episcopal, then monastic, and finally eremitic, we find monasticism firmly established in Ireland at an early date. St. Patrick, himself a bishop, founded churches and monasteries, ordained bishops and presbyters, and spread the faith as a zealous missionary; yet in his own church at Armagh, while bishops are recorded in an uninterrupted line from A.D. 447 to 535 inclusive, bishops and abbats are mingled from that date to the twelfth century (Four Mast.; Ann. Ust.; Ann. Tig.; Ann. Clonm.; Ann. Inisf.), the obits of eleven bishops and fourteen abbats being given between the years 547 and 811 inclusive (Four Mast.); but in the common lists of prelates these are all alike treated as bishops (Ware, Irish Bishops). So at Kildare from A.D. 519 to 800 inclusive, there are recorded eight abbesses, seven abbats and five bishops, but at Bangor from A.D. 552 to 812 inclusive there is a single line of twenty-nine abbats and no bishops (Four Mast.). From this we may infer either that the obits of abbats and bishops alike, when contemporaneous, were entered in the annals, or more probably that the leading idea was to give the abbatial succession, and that a bishop at times held the abbacy, as at other times he was scribe and anchorite (Reeves, S. Adamn. 365), yet "Affiath, bishop of Ard-Macha, and Aireachtach Ua Faelain, abbat of Ard-Macha, died on the same night" (Four Mast. A.D. 793), and Ware has to count them both as one bishop (Todd, St. Patrick, 20 sq.; Prim. Hist. Ch. Ir. 448, Dubl. 1851).

The first clear instance of an Irish monastic bishop is in St. Brigida's monastery at Kildare, in the end of the 5th and beginning of the 6th centuries. Cogitosus (Vita S. Brigidae) says in the language of probably the 7th century, "Haec ergo egregiis crescent virtutibus, ubi per famam bonarum rerum ad eam ab omnibus provinciis Hiberniae innumerabiles populi de utroque sexu confluebant vota sibi volentes voluntarie, suum monasterium caput penè omnium Hiberniensium ecclesiarum, et culmen praecellens omnia monasteria Scotorum (cujus Parrochis per totam Hiberniensem terram diffusa a mar usque ad mare extensa est), in campestribus campi Liffey supra fundamentum fidei firmum construxit: et prudenti dispensatione de animabus eorum regulariter in omnibus procurans, et de ecclesiis multarum provinciarum sibi adhaerentibus sollicitans, et secum revolvens, quod sine summo sacerdote, qui ecclesias consecraret, et ecclesiasticos in eis gradus subrogaret esse non posset, illustrem virum et solitarium omnibus moribus ornatum, per quem Deus virtutes operatus est plurimas, convocans eum de eremo . . . ut ecclesiam in episcopali dignitate cum ea gubernaret, atque ut nihil de ordine sacerdotali in suis deesset ecclesiis, accessivit" (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 518; Todd, S. Patr. 13 sq.; Smith and Wace, Dict. Christ. Biog. "Conlaedh.") Though not so explicitly yet with sufficient precision we find the same practice to have prevailed in the Columban monastery of Hy. "Habere autem solet ipsa insula rectorem semper abbatem presbyterum, cujus juri et omnis provincia, et ipsi etiam episcopi, ordine inusitato, debeant esse subjecti, juxta exemplum primi doctoris illius, qui non episcopus, sed presbyter extitit et monachus" (Bede, Ecll. Hist. iii. c. 4), and the fourth abbat there, Fergna Brit, is called a bishop (Four Mast. A.D. 622; Mart. Doneg. March 2; Reeves, S. Adamn. 340-341, 372). To Lindisfarne bishop Aidan was sent by the monastery of Hy (Bede, ib. iii. c. 3), and there also the abbat governed and the clergy, with the bishop himself, observed the monastic rule (Bede, Vit. S. Cuth. c. 16). When Fergil or Virgilius, abbat of Aghaboe, became abbat of Salzburg in the 8th century, "dissimulata ordinatione fermè annorum duorum spatiis, habuit secum laboris et coronae participem episcopum comitantem de patria, nomine Dobda, ad persolvendum episcopale officium" (Vit. S. Virg. ap. Messingham, Flor. Ins. Sanct. 331). In S. Columbanus's Irish foundation at Bobio, a slightly different practice prevailed, which points to the jealousy already arising between the monastery and episcopate and ending in the frequent monastic exemptions by the popes; the bishop was invited into the monastery as required, and was specially excluded from all power in monastic affairs (Messingham, ib. 248). At other times a bishop-abbat directed the affairs of the monastery [ABBAT], not in Ireland only but elsewhere (Reeves, Ecll. Ant. 129), and thus was the monastic bishop exercising, pro hac vice, the monastic jurisdiction (Du Cange, Gloss. iii. 108-9).

On the continent, mostly in exempt abbeys and monasteries, the monastic bishop was a recognized official in the 8th century, as in the abbey of St. Denis near Paris, the abbey of St. Martin at Tours, the monastery of Lobes or Laubes in Belgium, and the monastery at Salzburg in Bavaria as above mentioned (Todd, S. Patrick, 48 sq. treating the question fully with authorities; Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. ii. 254-5). Under the Benedictine Rule there was special provision made for him; "igitur ut junioribus praesertim fratribus omnis discurrendi occasio tolleretur ad sacros suscipiendos ordines, ad requirendum chrisma, neve adventu episcoporum in monasteria ad sacras ordinationes explendas, quies monachorum turbaretur, plerique episcopum ad manum semper in monasteriis sive abbatem sive simplicem monachum habere voluerunt" (Martene et Durand, Thes. Nov. Anecd. t. i. Praef. ap. Todd, S. Patrick, 69). In the monastery of Mount Sinai, in the 11th century, the abbat and 500 monks had their own bishop (Todd, ib. 67-8).

But regarding the monastic bishop a further distinction is necessary. Bishops sometimes, in the first zeal of monasticism, lived with their clergy in a quasi-monastic state (Bingham, Orig. Ecll. vii. c. 2, § 8) to assimilate the life in cities to that in the desert: thus St. Augustine of Hippo "factus presbyter monasterium intra ecclesiam mox instituit, et cum Dei servis vivere coepit secundum modum et regulam sub sanctis Apostolis constitutum" (Possidius, Vita S. Aug. c. 6; Opp. S. Aug. t. x. App. col. 260, Venet. 1729). And when he became bishop he had "in ista domo Episcopi meum monasterium clerorum" (Serm. 49 de Diversis, t. x. 519), or bishops demitted their episcopal charges and retired to monasteries for contemplation and prayer. But neither of these were properly monastic bishops. Again, according to Catholic rule, ordination and consecration could only be to definite charges, and not ἀπολειμμένως "at large" (Bingham, Orig. Ecll. iv. c. 6), yet in the Celtic church this rule (Conc. Chalc. c. 6) seems never to have been closely followed, but the episcopate was frequently conferred on persons who were eminent for learning, piety, or other personal qualification, as it was also in the East (Sozomen, Hist. Ecll. i. vi. c. 33-4). Hence, in the Irish annals, we find bishops without local designation, or named only in connexion with the place where they chanced to live at the time without being either diocesan or monastic. Again there were groups of bishops, seven being a favourite number (Mart. Doneg.), and also in single monasteries a large company of bishops under the abbat, as at Louth a hundred bishops under Mochta (Colgan, Acta SS. 729, c. 7). The evident effect of this system was to multiply indefinitely the number of bishops both without and within the monasteries, and to foster that restless spirit which was attempted to be checked by the synod at Herutford (c. 4 in its disputed reading, "Ut episcopi monachi non migrant de loco ad locum," Bede, Hist. Ecll. iv. c. 5), which carried so many Irish bishops across to the continent, especially after the monasteries began to be plundered by the Northmen, and which called for the frequent conciliar enactments against the see-less bishops, the episcopi vagi, vacantes, and vagantes, and the "Scoti qui se dicunt episcopos esse" (C. Cabill. c. 43) [BISHOP V.] both in England and on the Continent. Having been trained under a different system, they came into frequent collision with the diocesan bishops, and even in the 11th and 12th centuries St. Anselm of Canterbury and St. Bernard of Clairvaux could regard the want of diocesan organisation in Ireland as a serious blot on the whole Irish church (Ussher, Brit. Ecll. Ant. iv. 523), a "dissolutio ecclesiasticae disciplinae, censurae enervatio, religionis evacuatio" (S. Bern. De Vit. Mal. c. 10).

MONEY. Introduction.—The appearance of any positive indication of Christian influence on the coins of the Roman emperors has been generally considered to commence under Constantine I. the Great, since during his reign most of the public money bears official marks of the new religion which he embraced. There are, however, a few isolated examples previous to his time, which are of sufficient interest to need special illustration; (1) the representation of the deluge; (2) a symbol like the monogram of Christ; and (3) the legend IN PAGE.*

Rev. ΕΠΙ ΑΓΩΝΟΘΕΤΟΝ ΑΡΤΕΜΑ. Γ. In the exergue ΑΠΑΜΕΩΝ. [Under Artemas, Agonothetes (or judge at the games) for the third time (money) of the Apameans.] Two figures, a male and a female within an ark, on which is inscribed ΝΩΕ, and which is floating on some water. Outside the ark two figures, a male and a female, standing as if in adoration. On the top of the ark a bird perched; in the field above a bird flying toward the ark, holding an olive branch in its claws. Æ. (Fig. 1; Cabinet des Médailles, Paris.)

The remarkable coins giving the representation of the deluge were issued during the reigns of three emperors, (1) Sept. Severus, 193–211, who was at first favourable to the Christians, and whose son Caracalla had a Christian nurse (Tertull. ad Scap. iv.; cf. Spart. in Carac. 1), but who at a later period of his reign, 202, allowed a persecution to prevail (Spart. in Sev. 17; Euseb. H. E. vi. c. 2); (2) Macrinus, 217, under whom the church enjoyed peace, and (3) Philip I. 244–249, whose Christian tendencies have been the source of much discussion (Moniglia, de Relig. utriusque Phil. Aug. Diss. duae, Rom. 4to, 1741; Greppo, Notes hist. biog. etc. concern. les prem. siècles chrét. Lyons, 1841; Milman, Hist. of Christianity, vol. ii.; Lardner, Cred. vol. vii. etc.), and who by many ecclesiastical authors has been considered the first Roman Emperor who was a Christian (Oros. Hist. vii. 20; Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 52; Chron. ed. Mai, vol. viii. p. 646), an honour that more properly belongs to Constantine I. the Great (Lactant. De fals. Relig. c. 1; Sulp. Sev. Sacr. Hist. ii. 33; Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 75; Theod. H. E. v. c. 39).

The type of these coins was by early numismatists and scholars (Falconeri, Froelich, Hardouin, Bryant, Barrington, Milles, etc.) considered to refer to the Greek legend of the flood of Deucalion, in which it is stated that Zeus had resolved to destroy all mankind, with the exception of Deucalion and Pyrrha, whilst the letters on the ark were supposed to have been either added by a forger or altered from ΝΕΩΚ [ἡρώων]. Numismatists, however, of the present century have not failed to recognise that the letters on the ark are certainly ΝΩΕ and that the type refers to the Noachian deluge, the figures both inside and outside the ark representing Noah and his wife, in the latter case holding up their hands in thanksgiving for their safety. It has been suggested (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. iii. p. 137), and with much probability, that the word ΝΩΕ was placed on these coins so that there might be no confusion with the flood of Deucalion, in a similar manner as on the coins of Magnesia in Ionia the word ΑΡΓΩ is put to show that the vessel thereon represented is the ship 'Argo,' in which history makes Jason and his colleagues sail in search of the golden fleece.

It is not difficult to distinguish on these coins the form of the raven from that of the dove, and the Bible gives an account of the presence of only these two birds. In the short description of the flood of Deucalion, by Plutarch (De Solert. Animal. xiii. ed. Didot) there is allusion to a dove, but there is no mention of an olive branch or of another bird. In the Chaldaean accounts of the deluge, as preserved in the fragments of Berosus and Abydenus (Cory, Anc. Frag. 2nd ed. pp. 28–34), some birds were twice sent out to discover if the waters had receded, and the second time they returned with, instead of an olive branch, some mud on their feet; whilst in the Assyrian accounts (G. Smith, Chald. Acct. of Genesis, 1876) it is stated that "a dove, a swallow, and a raven" were sent forth, the two former of which returned to the ship, but the raven did not come back. These statements are

* Professor Churchill Babington has kindly called my attention to the coins of the kings of Edessa, and has sent me the following note respecting them:—"Among the kings of Edessa, Abgar Bar Manu, or Abgar VIII. (who reigned 153–188, according to Langlois) is said to have been 'a holy man,' (ιερός ἄνθρωπος Jul. Afric. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 149, 1); and as he patronized the Christian Bardesanes, and forbade the worship of Cybele, it has been inferred that he was a Christian, and this inference is thought 'to be strengthened by the fact that on the coins of this prince the usual symbols of the old national worship are for the first time wanting and the sign of the cross appears in their place' (Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 111 [Bohn], following Bayer, Hist. Oss. et Edess. ex Num. illustr. lib. iii. p. 171, who figures two coins of an Abgarus, contemporary with Severus, and bearing his head on which a cross appears on the tiara). The cross is formed in one case of five dots (pearls), in the other the central dot becomes oval. The chronology of these kings is doubtful. Neander places Abgar Bar Manu between 160–170, but it seems impossible in any case that these coins belong to him. The cross, however (apparently of five united dots), is found on a coin of Abgarus, having the head of Commodus on the reverse (Langlois, Num. de l'Arménie, pl. iv. No. 7), who may be Abgar VIII. That which is certain about these coins is that on some coins of an Abgar contemporary with Severus a cross occurs on the diadem, while on others we have the crescent surmounted by a star, taken by Bayer and Neander to be the symbols of the old national worship." On a coin of Abgarus and Commodus in the British Museum, there appears to be on the diadem of Abgar a + or X, but I am inclined to think with Professor Babington, that the supposed cross on these coins of Edessa is only a cruciform star or ornament without any Christian significance.

On a coin of barbarous fabric of the Roman emperor Tetricus (267–273), with legend ORIENS AVG (Cohen, Suppl. No. 26), or of Tacitus (275–276), published by Rasche (Lez. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 1098), there is said to be in the field a cross, but in both cases it is probably a star, though it may be that these pieces were issued long after at the epoch of Christianity. A cross is also given by Cohen (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. pl. xv.) in the field of a coin of Constantius Chlorus and Galerius Maximian, but this coin has been incorrectly engraved and described and the object is really a star (Madden, Handb. of Rom. Num. p. 168, 1861, pl. iv. No. 3).

quite contrary to that in Genesis, as also to the subject shown on the coins. A very important feature of this type (Lenormant, Mel. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 199, 1853) is the exactness with which, as regards the raven, it agrees with the Hebrew text, which is quite at variance with the LXX and Vulg. In these latter (Gen. viii. 7) the raven is stated as "not returning until the water had dried from off the earth" (καὶ ἐξελεῖσθαι, οὐκ ἀνέστρεψεν ἕως τοῦ ξηρανθῆναι τὸ ὕδωρ ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς.—Qui egrediebatur et non revertebatur, donec siccarentur aquae super terram), whereas in the Heb. text we read that the raven "went forth to and fro until the waters were dried up from off the earth" (וַיֵּצֵא יוֹנָתָן וַיִּשְׁוֹב וַיָּצֵא יוֹנָתָן מֵעַל הַמַּיִם וַיָּשָׁב וַיָּצֵא יוֹנָתָן מֵעַל הַמַּיִם וַיָּשָׁב). "Et exiit egrediendo et redeundo, donec arescerent aquae desuper terram," Walton, Polygot; Kalisch, Crit. Com.; Patrick, Com. etc.). The expression "to and fro" leaves no doubt that the raven—a bad messenger and Noah chose another, the dove—must have returned at intervals to the ark, and in all probability rested on its top, as indeed it is represented on these coins.

It is also interesting to compare the type of these coins with the representations on early Christian monuments. A painting of the 3rd century, in the catacombs at Rome (Savittien Petit, Mel. d'Arch. vol. iii. pl. xxix. Paris, 1853), shows Noah in the ark and a dove holding an olive branch in its mouth flying towards him; Noah's wife is not represented, nor the raven, but one cannot fail to observe the striking similarity of the shape of the ark, its cover, the figure of Noah and the dove. Though the raven is not found on any of the paintings of the catacombs, it may be seen on a bas-relief found at D'Jemila, in Algeria (De la Mare, Revue Arch. 1849, vol. vi. p. 196), and is here occupied in devouring the carcases.

It now remains to assign a reason, if possible, for this type occurring upon the coins of Apameia. In the first place there was a Phrygian legend of a great flood relating to Annacus or Nannacus, a king who resided at Iconium, and who lived to the age of 300 years. When he died the tradition was that all mankind would be destroyed (Steph. Byz. s.v. Ἰκόνιον; Suidas, s.v. Νάννακος). There is not much doubt that the Old Testament influenced this tradition, and it is perhaps not unreasonable to suppose that there is here a reference to Enoch, the father of Methuselah, who after his son's birth "walked with God 300 years" (Gen. v. 22). Prof. Ewald indeed has supposed (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, vol. i. p. 356) that the city Enoch, which was built by the eldest son of Cain, and called after his name (Gen. iv. 17, 18), refers to the Phrygian city of Iconium, at which Annacus is supposed to have resided. In the second place the curious lines in the "Sibylline Books" (Orac. Sibyll. vv. 247–256, 261–267) may have actually suggested to the Apameians the types for these coins. They are as follows: "But Noah resting some days sent again the dove that he might know whether the Deluge had ceased, but she flying up and down fled away, and descending to earth rested a little her body on the wet earth and returned bringing a branch of an olive tree, a great sign of good news . . . and then presently he sent forth another bird black-winged, and she flew away and remained on the earth. . . . There is on the continent of black Phrygia a high and great mountain called Ararat. . . . Here arise the springs of the great river Marsyas. On its lofty top the ark rested when the waters receded." The term κιβωτός, "an ark," which occurs in these verses is of special interest, for not only was it employed by the LXX (Gen. vi. 14), by the Evangelists (Matt. xxiv. 38; Luke xvii. 27), and by the Apostles (Heb. xi. 7; 1 Pet. iii. 20) for the "ark of Noah;" but Apameia itself was called Cibótos (Strab. xii. 6; Ptol. v. 2), probably on account of the great wealth collected there it being a great emporium next in dignity to Ephesus (Strabo, xii. 8), and κιβωτός signifies "a chest" or "coffer." Moreover that the ark was supposed to rest at Apameia is testified by the line ἔθθα φλέβες μεγάλου ποταμοῦ Μαρσύας πέφυκαν, for the river Marsyas ran by Apameia, and was also itself called Cibótos, as testified by coins struck at the time of Hadrian (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 211, pl. vi. No. 4).

Among the various suppositions which may be brought forward to explain the appearance of this type, whether it be suggested that it may have been produced owing to the semi-generous treatment that the Christians received during the reign of the emperors under which they were issued, it is certain that the type did not emanate from a Christian sect. The deep root which an ancient tradition of the Deluge—shown by the Phrygian legend, probably greatly influenced by the Biblical account and the minute description in the Sibylline books—had taken at Apameia is far more likely to have originated these pieces. At the same time it would be presumptuous to suppose that they might not have been designed by a Christian artist, for the worship of God had long circulated throughout Asia Minor. (For a full account of these coins see Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 173.)

2. Obv. AVT. K. Γ. M. KV. ΤΡΑΙΑΝΟC ΔΕΚΙΟC. Bust of Trajan Decius to the right laureated, with paludamentum.

Rev. ΕΠ. ΑVP. ΑΙ·Ι·ΙΑΝΟV Β. Α✱.

This medallion was issued during the reign of Trajan Decius (249–251) at Maeonia in Lydia.

It will be observed that the engraver has taken care to place the monogram between two A's (A✱A) in the middle of the legend at the top of the coin, as if to call special attention to it.

Suggestions have been made (Lenormant, Mel. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 196) that a Christian moneyer intended to introduce on this coin the mysterious sign of the new Faith, and that though symbols of a similar character to the Christian monogram occur upon other monuments anterior to Christianity (see § xv.), yet in this case the sign is more probably the work of a Christian. Moreover, that the Bacchic emblems, appropriate to the institution of the Eucharist, may also be found on the sarcophagus of St. Constance and on the mosaics which decorate the mausoleum of this princess (Ciampini, de sacr. Aedif. a Const. mag. constr. pl. xxxii. Rome, 1693). This opinion is further sustained by another scholar (De Witte, Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 172), who adds that the title ἄρχων chosen by the artist in which to introduce the monogram of Christ seems to offer a direct allusion to the domination and the reign of the Saviour.

The form of the Φ (·|·) in the words Ἀφφιδίαν and Στεφανήφορον have been also considered to allude to the form of the cross (†), but it would be hazardous to affirm this, as a similar manner of engraving this letter occurs on the coins of the Seleucidae, of Philadelphia in Lydia, and of Sardes, in the latter case on a coin of Salonina, who is supposed to have been a Christian (see par. 3; Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 218); at the same time such a form may be seen on the top of the labarum of certain coins of Constantine the Great to which I shall presently allude (§ vi.).

It must, however, be remembered that under Trajan Decius the Christians were grossly persecuted ("Exstitit post annos plurimos execrabilis animal Decius, qui vexaret Ecclesiam," Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 4). Fabian, bishop of Rome, the first authentic martyr pope, was one of the early victims (Milman, Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 188; vol. iii. p. 329), and many persons were killed throughout the empire. Yet the quiet that the Christians enjoyed during the mild reign of his predecessor Philip, and its effects, cannot have been suddenly stopped even by this attempt to extirpate Christianity, and it is not therefore improbable that a Christian artist here sought surreptitious means of protest against the tyranny of the persecutors of the church.

I may add that Tryphonia or Cephinia, the wife of Herennius Etruscus, son of Trajan Decius and Etruscilla, was probably converted to Christianity with her daughter Cyrilla after her husband's death (De Witte, op. cit.). Of this empress no coins are extant.

3. Obv. CORN. SALONINA AVG. Bust of Salonina to the right on a crescent.

Rev. AVG. [or AVGSTA] IN PACE. Salonina seated to the left holding an olive-branch and sceptre. In the exergue sometimes the letters M S, sometimes P or S, sometimes S I. Billon. (Fig. 3; British Museum.)

The explanation of the remarkable legend on this coin of Salonina (circ. 260–268) was first given by M. de Witte, who in a most interesting memoir published in 1852 (Mém. de l'Acad. Roy. de Belgique, vol. xxvi.; cf. Rev. Num. Belge, vol. ii. 1853; Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. Paris, 1853) traced the origin and names of Salonina the wife of Gallienus—carefully distinguishing her from Pipa or Pipara the concubine;—the character of this empress, and finally attempted to show, and not without success, that she was a Christian.

It has been amply proved, in spite of many objections, that the formula EN ΕΙΡΗΝΗ or IN PACE was exclusively Christian (Cavedoni, Ragg.

dei Mon. delle Art. Crist. Modena, 1849), that is to say, not in vogue among the pagans, though it was used previously by the Jews (Greppo, Not. sur des Inscript. ant. tirées de quelq. tombeaux juifs à Rome, Lyons, 1835). It was moreover a formula of Christian apotheosis, and as such has been treated by M. de Witte, who in the papers above referred to has supposed that these coins are commemorative, and were struck by order of Gallienus, after his wife's death. A few years after, two finds, one in 1855, consisting of some 4000 coins, the other in 1857, consisting of some 25 or 30,000 coins of silver and billon, among which were some of the pieces of Salonina, with the legend AVG. or AVGSTA IN PACE, proved to M. de Witte (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 71) that these coins must have been issued before 265 and consequently during the lifetime of Salonina, an opinion that was shared by the late M. C. Lenormant (Rev. Num. 1857, pp. 243–245), but which has not commended itself to Mr. C. W. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 49 1873), who whilst suppressing all mention of the authority of the two finds speaks of M. de Witte's conclusion as an "unlucky after-thought."

As regards the letters M S in the exergue, Mr. King (op. cit. p. xiv.) is of opinion that they must stand for some title, and that Memoriae Sanctae not merely gives a most appropriate sense, but is supported by the Venerandae Memoriae on the coins of Constantine (§ xiii.). The fact, however, is that other letters occur in the exergue, and the same may also be found on pagani types of the coins of Salonina, and on the coins of Gallienus, so that this hypothesis is out of the question. I am inclined to think that the letters bear some reference to the mintage or place of minting, but I am unable to offer any satisfactory solution.

It must be added that the late Abbé Cavedoni considered (Album. Giornale Lett. vol. xix. Rome, 1852) M. de Witte's suggestion a paradox, and did not admit his interpretation of the legend.

§ i. Chronological and Historical Sketch of the Reign of Constantine.—Previous to commencing the actual description of the coins of Constantine I. with Christian emblems, and for the better understanding of their arrangement and classification, it is necessary to give a brief chronological and historical sketch of the reign of this emperor.

In the year 311, Constantine I., being determined to stop the tyranny of Maxentius, reviewed in his own mind all considerations, and felt it incumbent on him to honour no other than the God of his father Constantius I. Chlorus (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 27). He is consequently said to have prayed earnestly to God, and whilst thus praying with fervent entreaty, a most marvellous sign appeared to him from heaven. About midday, when the sun was beginning to decline, he saw with his own eyes in the heavens the trophy of a cross of light placed above the sun, and bearing the inscription ΝΥ ΤΙΣ ΚΟΝΚΕΡ (ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ). a miracle witnessed by his whole army (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 28).

But doubting in his own mind what the import of this apparition might be, he continued to meditate till night. During his sleep the Christ of God appeared to him with the sign that he had seen in the heavens, and commanded him to make a standard resembling the sign and to use it as a safeguard against his enemies (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 29). So soon as it was day he arose, and calling together those that worked in jewels and precious stones, he sat in the midst and described to them the figure of the sign he had seen, and commanded them to make one like it in gold and precious stones, to which Eusebius adds, "and I also have seen this representation" (Vit. Const. i. c. 30).

The description of the standard of the cross, called by the Romans labarum, is minutely given by Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. c. 31. See art. LABARUM), who says that two letters indicating the name of Christ by means of the first letters were placed on the crown, "the letter P being marked diagonally with X exactly in its centre" (χρῆσις τοῦ πρὸς τὸ μέγαλτον), which would perhaps rather give the form than , and these letters the emperor at a later period used to wear on his helmet. The form of the cross, as employed by the soldiers on their shields, is given by Lactantius (De Mort. Pers. c. 44)—transversa  litera, summo capite circumflexo, i.e. .

Encouraged by these signs, Constantine advanced against Maxentius, whom he defeated on Oct. 27, 312, Maxentius himself being drowned in the Tiber while endeavouring to escape over the Milvian bridge. Constantine thus became sole master of the Western empire.

Shortly after Constantine's entry into Rome, he, in conjunction with Licinius I. his colleague, "having first praised God as the author of all their successes," drew up a full and comprehensive edict in favour of the Christians, and then sent it to Maximin, ruler in the east, who fearful of refusing, addressed a decree^b commencing IOVIVS MAXIMINVS AVGVSTVS, etc. (a title assumed by him after the death of Galerius) to the governors under him, respecting the Christians, as if of his own free will (Euseb. H. E. ix. c. 9).

The whole Roman people received Constantine as their benefactor. The senate who paid adoration to the labarum (Prudent. in Symm. 494-496) decreed him the first rank among the Augusti (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 44), and perhaps offered him the title of Maximus, "quem sibi Maximinus vindicabat," to the great grief and indignation of Maximin. "Cognito deinde senatus decreto, sic exarsit dolore, ut inimicitias aperte profiteretur, convicia joci mixta adversus Imperatorem Maximum diceret" (Lactant. op. cit.). [See under 315.] Constantine erected a statue of himself in the most frequented part of Rome, and ordered a long spear in the form of a cross to be placed in the hands of the statue, and the following inscription to be engraved on it in the Latin language;—BY THIS SALUTARY SIGN, THE TRUE SYMBOL OF VALOUR, I HAVE SAVED YOUR CITY, LIBERATED FROM THE YOKE OF THE TYRANT. I HAVE ALSO RESTORED THE SENATE AND ROMAN PEOPLE TO THEIR ANCIENT DIGNITY AND SPLENDOUR. (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 40; H. E. ix. c. 9.)

In 312-313, Constantine and Licinius were at Milan, where the latter was married to Constantia, the half-sister of Constantine (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 45; Vict. Epit.; Zosim. ii. 17); and here the two emperors issued a second edict giving liberty to the Christians in particular, and to all men in general, to follow the worship of that deity which each might approve, so that thus the Divine Being (Divinitas) might be propitious to them and to all their subjects (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 48; Euseb. H. E. x. c. 5).

In the meantime the impious Maximin Daza, taking advantage of the marriage festivities which were going on at Milan, marched from Syria into Bithynia, and from thence into Thrace. Licinius pursued him, and in a pitched battle at Adrianople defeated him. Maximin fled to Mount Taurus, and thence to Tarsus, where he is said to have given glory to the God of the Christians, and enacted a full and complete law for their liberty (Euseb. H. E. ix. c. 10), but too late, for being seized with a violent disease, he perished miserably (313). Licinius thus became sole master of the East, and on arriving at Nicomedia, he gave thanks to God for his victory (gratiam Deo, cuius auxilio vicerat, Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 48), and repeated the edict in favour of the Christians as issued by Constantine and himself at Milan (Lactant. op. cit.).

^b The original edict is not now extant, but the copy issued by Maximin is given by Eusebius in Greek (H. E. ix. c. 9).

quarrelled, but the latter, being defeated, sued for peace, which was accepted.

In 315 the title of Maximus and the diadem were officially decreed to Constantine.

The title of Maximus is given to Constantine by Eumenius in his panegyric pronounced at Treves in 310 (Paneg. Const. Aug. Dict.), but the statement cannot be accepted as true (Heyne, Cens. xii. Paneg. Vet. in his Opusc. Acad. vol. vi. p. 80). Pagius (Crit. Baron. ann. 311) gives the date as 311 on the authority of a coin having on the obverse MAX. and on the reverse VOTIS V MVLT. X, but Mediobarbus, from whom the description of the coin is taken, is an authority of no value (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 94). Some modern numismatists, on the other hand (Feuardent, Rev. Num. 1856, p. 249; Cohen, Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 89), think that coins with this title were not struck till the end of his reign. The title was probably offered to him in 312 by the senate, as I have previously stated, but it is more likely that it was officially granted to him in 315, when the triumphal arch, to commemorate the victory over Maxentius in 312, was dedicated to him. — IMP. CAES. FL. CONSTANTINO MAXIMO P. F. AVGUSTO S. P. Q. R. etc. (Orelli, Inscr. No. 1075; see § xviii. "False or uncertain coins of Constantine I.") on which it was proclaimed that by the greatness of his own mind and the inspiration of the Divinity (instinctu Divinitatis)^c he defeated the tyrant Maxentius, and this view is confirmed by a genuine brass coin preserved in the "Musée de Vienne," having on the obverse CONSTANTINVS MAX. AVG. COS. IIII and on the reverse the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI (Eckhel, Cat. du Musée de Vienne; Cohen, Méd. Imp. Nos. 467, 468).

It is extremely probable that the senate decreed to Constantine at the same time the diadem (see § xvi. "Coins of Constantine with the diadem"), and it was perhaps on the occasion of these honours that

In 317 Crispus and Constantine II., the sons of Constantine I., and Licinius II. the son of Licinius I., were made Cæsars.

321.

In 321 Constantine enjoined all the subjects of the Roman empire to observe the "Lord's Day," and passed an edict for the solemn observance of Sunday (Clinton, F. R. vol. ii. p. 91), which he called dies Solis (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 18; Sozomen, H. E. i. c. 8).

323.

For nine years there had been peace, but at last, in 323, a second war broke out between Constantine and Licinius. Two battles were fought, and in the second Licinius was utterly defeated and obliged to sue for pardon. His life was spared at the request of his wife Constantia, but only for a brief period, as he was put to death in the next year, 324, at Thessalonica, where he had been placed in confinement (Eutrop. x. 6; Hieron. Chron.; Zosimus, ii. 28; Euseb. Vit. Const. ii. c. 18; H. E. x. c. 9).

By this victory Constantine became sole master of the Roman world (RECTOR TOTIVS ORBIS on a gold coin struck at Thessalonica, Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 48).

On Nov. 8 of this year Constantinus II. was made Cæsar.

About 325 the combats of Gladiators were abolished, but they appear still to have continued till as late as 455 (Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ed. Smith vol. iv. p. 41, note), and perhaps also the punishment of the cross (Aur. Vict. Cæs. c. 41; Sozomen, H. E. i. c. 8).

333.

333. Constans made Cæsar.

337. Constantine now began to feel signs of failing health, and visited Helenopolis, the birthplace of his mother Helena, where he is said to have for the first time received the imposition of hands with prayer, in fact became a catechumen, after which he proceeded to Nicomedia, where he was baptized by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, though he had intended to defer this rite till he could have been baptized in the river Jordan. He soon after died, at noon on the feast of Pentecost (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 61-64;

^c The words instinctu divinitatis have been supposed by some (Guattini, Mon. Ant. di Roma, p. xciv. 1789; Rom. descr. p. 42, 1805; Henzen, Suppl. ad Orell. vol. iii. p. 113) to have been written over the effaced words nutu jovis o. m. or perhaps Diis faventibus, but Garrucci quite sets the question at rest by assuring us (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 245; Rev. Num. 1866, p. 96) from personal inspection that the marble was not lower in the portion where these words occur than in other parts, nor are the letters themselves confused, nor are there any traces of letters to be seen that could have been previously engraved. It may be added that Constantine himself in his oration to the assembly of the saints (ap. Euseb. c. 26) speaks of his services as owing their origin to the inspiration of God (ἐξ ἐμπροίας Θεοῦ).

Socrates, H. E. i. 39; Sozomen, H. E. ii. c. 34; Theodoret, H. E. i. c. 32). Delmatius and Hanniballianus, and other members of the Imperial family, excepting Julian and Gallus, were put to death, and the three sons of Constantine I.—Constantine II. Constantius II. and Constans were declared Augusti.

From these statements it would appear that Constantine the Great was converted to Christianity about the year 312, and that his colleague Licinius I. pretended to embrace the same faith at or about the same period. Still many acts of his reign after this date show that he acted in anything but a Christian spirit. There may be specially mentioned: (1) the murder of Licinius I. in 324 contra jus sacramenti; (2) the murder of his son Crispus, and the young Licinius, a boy of eleven years of age, in 326; and (3) the murder of his wife Fausta in 327.^d For these and other reasons, especially because he had on his coins the inscription Sol Invictus, some have considered (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rom. vol. v. p. 359) that he must have been "a repulsive phenomenon and was certainly not a Christian." Be this as it may, it is during the reign of Constantine that Christian emblems appear in a marked manner on the coins and on the Roman dated tituli.

In the numismatic studies now about to follow, it will be seen whether Constantine the Great ordered to be placed on the imperial coinage, either openly or latently, any Christian emblems from the time when he first professed Christianity in 312, or whether he deferred so doing till 323, after the defeat of Licinius, when as "ruler of the whole world" he could dare, without opposition, to inscribe upon his coins the symbols of the true religion of Christ.

Havercamp). But the Abbé Cavedoni asserts (Ricerche Crit. etc. p. 4, note) that the supposed Monodia on the death of Constantine junior has been proved by Wesseling to have been written on the death of Theodorus Palaologus, about the middle of the fifteenth century (Anonymi Orat. Fun. ed. Frotschero), whilst Manso (Leben Constantins, p. 65) treats the suggestion with contempt. There is, however, a great want of positive proof on this question.

On another example in the British Museum, with reverse legend VICT. LAETAE PRINC. (Fig. 6; British Museum. Another example, published by Garrucci from Tanini, has on the obverse the additional letters FL. CL.)

Cavedoni considered (Ricerche, p. 20) the monograms on coins Nos. 1 and 2 to be more like stars, or monograms composed of the letters I and X, the initials of Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, but they seem to have really the form of .

As to the date of issue of the coins above described it is supposed that some may have existed previous to 323, as there are specimens of the coins of Constantine II. among them, and none of Constantius II. made Caesar in that same year (Cavedoni, Appendice, p. 6; Garrucci, op. cit.). The coin No. 4, bearing as it does the title of MAX. (Maximus), might have been issued in 315, in which year the Senate, as we have seen, granted him that title, whilst the coins of Constantine I. (Nos. 1 and 2) might even be as early as 312, and those of Crispus and Constantine II. (Nos. 5 and 6) as early as 317. They are all probably anterior to 319, and certainly precede the year 323.

The first two coins are interesting as confirming the words of Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. c. 31; cf. Sozomen, H. E. i. c. 8) that Constantine, besides having the monogram placed upon the labarum, was in the habit of wearing it upon his helmet. The helmet is sometimes ornamented with pellets or stars, and the former are no doubt intended to represent gems, according to the account of his panegyrist Nazarius (xxix. 5)—“fulget galea et corusca luce gemmarum divinum verticem monstrat,” whilst according to Philostorgius (H. E. i. c. 6) the holy sign seen in the sky by Constantine was surrounded by stars that encircled it as a rainbow—καὶ ἀστέρων αὐτῶν κύκλῳ περιθεούτων ἵριδος τρόπῳ.

The words VICTORIAE LAETAE may be compared (cf. Cavedoni, Ricerche, p. 16; Disamina, p. 212) to the scriptural expressions “Laetabor ego super eloquia tua: sicut qui invenit spolia multa” (Ps. cxviii. 162), or “Laetabuntur . . . sicut exultant victores capta praeda, quando dividunt spolia” (Is. ix. 3), and to the line of Horace (1 Sat. i. 8)—“Memento cita mors venit, aut victoria laeta.”

Cavedoni would never believe that the supposed monogram was anything more than a star of six rays, or at the utmost the monogram composed of I and X, the initials of Ἰησοῦς Χριστός. From the coins of this series which I have been able to examine (Nos. 8, 9, 10 and 12) it seems perfectly clear that the form is , the vertical line terminating in a globe or a circle. Cohen (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 83, note; Suppl. p. 375, note) agrees with Cavedoni that the sign is a star, which view he considers confirmed by the coin of Licinius II. (No. 11), which has a star of eight rays; but as he allows that the monogram  (?) sometimes appears on the coins of Crispus

(No. 9), there is no reason why it or  or  should not occur upon the coins above described. The piece with eight rays proves nothing, and we have seen that on the helmet of Constantine there was sometimes placed a star of eight rays —  — instead of the Christian monogram. (See under No. 2; Fig. 5.)

I do not myself see any reason to doubt that these signs were intended for the Christian monogram, though at this period of the reign of Constantine expressed on the coinage in somewhat a latent manner.

This series was probably introduced about the year 319. It is anterior to 323, coins of both the Licinii being common to it, whilst those of Constantius II. Caesar, are wanting.

§ v. Coins of Constantine I. with the “Mars Conservator” and “Sol Invictus” types.—? 312—? 323.

It was at one time considered that the coins of Constantine I. with pagan symbols were not entirely excluded till 323, after the defeat of Licinius, but on no safe grounds, as the coins bearing the names and types of Jupiter, Hercules, and Mars never bear the title of Maximus, bestowed upon him in 315, from which it may reasonably be inferred that all these coins were struck previous to 312, when Constantine openly professed Christianity. One coin, however, of the Mars type and the title MAX. has been described from Tanini (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 361), whilst there is a series of coins of Crispus and Constantine II. with the type of Jupiter (Cohen, Méd. Imp. vol. vi. pp. 197, 198, Nos. 83-85; p. 234, Nos. 143, 144), which were certainly issued posterior to 317, in which year they were created Caesars, but the type was not struck in any mint in the dominions of Constantine, but in those subject to Licinius.

Some coins of Constantine I. with the legend MARTI [or MARTI PATRI] CONSERVATORI, having for type the bust of Constantine (?) with the helmet adorned with the monogram, or Mars standing, and in the field an equilateral cross or on his shield ✱, and others with the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI, the sun standing, and in the field ✱, are supposed to be in existence (Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 241 seq.; Rev. Num. 1866, p. 86 seq.), but it is not clearly established that the "monogram" is not a star of six equal rays; or "the equilateral cross" the Latin letter or numerical mark X drawn sideways. On available specimens, from one of which a drawing is given (Fig. 9), there is a symbol which appears to be a cross, but it differs considerably from that on the coins previously described, and may indeed be only a numeral or a letter.

According to Zonaras (Ann. xiii. 3) Constantine placed in the forum of Constantinople the circular porphyry column brought from Rome, and on it he put the brazen statue of Apollo which he set up in his own name, substituting some of the nails of the passion for the rays of the sun, thus assuming with "singular shamelessness" (cf. Von Hammer, Const. und Bosp. vol. i. p. 162) the attributes of Apollo and Christ, from which circumstance Garrucci has found no difficulty in supposing that Constantine "changed the head of the statue," and fully intended to represent himself as Sol upon his coins.

Though Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. c. 43; cf. Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. i.) in the rhetorical language of the time, compares Constantine to the sun rising upon the earth and imparting its rays of light to all, and though in the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI there may be the idea of the ancient Sun-god and the new Sun of Righteousness [see art. CHRISTMAS], it is doubtful whether Constantine would have placed the monogram of Christ beside the image of the Sol Invictus, or have caused himself to be represented under the semblance of the sun together with signs of Christianity.

Should the coins of the Mars and Sol Invictus types be considered subsequent to 312, in any case they must be placed before 323, since coins of Constantian Caesar are wanting in this series, and as to the type of Sol Invictus, as no specimens of the coins of Licinius II. have been discovered, it would seem that it was first struck by the two Augusti, Constantine I. and Licinius I., and secondly by Constantine I. and his sons, after the year 319, when the quarrels between Constantine I. and Licinius I. had probably commenced.

There appears, indeed, to be little doubt that Constantine I., after he had conquered Maxentius in 312, found himself compelled to tolerate for some years on his coins, and on those of Crispus and Constantine II., some of the heathen types, such as the Mars and the Sol Invictus, one specimen of which, with the title MAX. and COS IIII gives the date 315 (see § i.), whilst the coins of Crispus and Constantine II. with these types cannot be anterior to 317, when they were made Caesars. Soon after, the coins with the Sun-type, but with the legend CLARITAS REIPUBLICAE on the coinage of Crispus and Constantine II. must have been introduced and continued in circulation till about ? 317 or 319, when the new coins of Constantine I., Crispus and Constantine II. with the legend VICTORIAE LAETAE PRINC. PERP. (§ iii.) and the coins of Constantine I. and Licinius I. and their sons, with the legend VIRTUS EXERCIT. (§ iv.) became universal.

* About the year 323, after the defeat of Licinius I. there was issued at the mints of Lyons, London and Treves, a series of coins of Constantine I., Crispus, Licinius II. and Constantine II. Caesares with the legend BEATA TRANQUILLITAS and the type a globe on an altar on which VOTIS XX, and above the globe three stars.

On the globe may be seen .:|:|: and ✱, which according to Cavedoni (Ricerche, p. 20) the holy fathers delighted to think was the sign of the cross on the four cardinal points of the globe (S. Maximus Taurin. Homil. L. quae est ii. de cruce; Sedulius Carm. Paschal. l. iii). On some of the coins of the kings of the Bosphorus (Baron de Köhne, Descr. du Mus. du feu le Prince Kotschoubey, St. Pétersbourg, 1857), where Christianity had been early diffused, dating about 324 there has been thought to be a cross (Cavedoni, Appendice, p. 18). In 1853 the Count Ouharoff discovered, near Sevastopol, the pillars and mosaic pavement of a Christian church built in the 4th century, and near the ruins of a temple of Venus (Köhne, op. cit. pp. 447, 448).

Similar coins exist of Crispus and Constantine II.

Of the series of these coins struck at Thessalonica there is no coin of Constantine I., of that struck at London there is no coin of Licinius I. That a coin of Constantine I. of this series was issued at Thessalonica is more than probable, as Illyricum, in which Thessalonica was situated, was added to the dominions of Constantine in 314, after the war with Licinius. Why no coin of Licinius I. should occur in this particular branch of the London series is not so clear, as coins of this emperor were probably struck there up to 321. It may be that the new quarrel with Licinius had commenced, and determined Constantine not to strike any of his colleague's coins at London.

The coins having the top of the staff of the labarum ending in a cross, were admitted in the first instance by Cavedoni (Ricerche, p. 9), who published from the Trésor de Numismatique (P. 131, Pl. lxii. No. 8) a gold medallion of Constantine II. with the legend PRINCIPI IVVENTIVTIS and having in the exergue the letters CONS. (Constantinopoli), and alluded to brass coins with the legend VIRTUS EXERCIT. This example is not specially published by Cohen (cf. Méd. Imp. No. 5), and Cavedoni, apparently forgetting that he had mentioned this medallion, came to the conclusion (Appendice, p. 3) that the supposed cross on the top of the labarum was not in reality a cross, but only had the appearance of one, being nothing more than small pellets indicating the extremity of the cords or holders or other ornaments at the top of the spear.

Garrucci, on the other hand, has stated (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 252; cf. Rev. Num. 1866, p. 107, pl. iii. No. 15) that he has seen a coin of Licinius I. struck at Aquileia, of which the form of the cross is . I have not, however, myself seen any specimens of coins struck at Aquileia shewing such a decided cross, and it is difficult to say in most cases, whether the head of the spear is meant to express a cross or not. On some coins, as on those struck at Treves, Lyons, and Arles, the form appears to be , on others, especially on those issued at Thessalonica, the form becomes more a cross .

1866, pl. iii. No. 11) has a cross with a square top . (See § xv.)

The type of the two soldiers was not introduced till after the death of Crispus. These coins must have been struck before 333, because those of Constans Caesar are wanting.

B. with monogram  in field. Similar types of Constantine I. (Fig. 12; British Museum), Constantine II., and Constantius II., but in the exergue, P. or S. CONST. (Prima or secunda Constantinâ [Arles].) Æ.

This series must have been struck before 333, because the coins of Constans Caesar are wanting.

Feuardent, Cavedoni, and Garrucci would limit the date to 330, supposing that the exergual letters CONST. refer to Constantinople, but it has long been established that these letters should be interpreted Constantina, the name given to Arles by Constantine the Great, probably about 312, after the defeat of Maxentius and Maximin, when he improved the city and made a new town on the opposite side of the river. It is called by Ausonius (Claræ urbes viii.) duplex, and the exergual letters CON. or CONST. (Constantina) are always preceded by a Latin differential letter, or accompanied by OF I, II or III in the field, whilst CON. or CONS. (Constantinopolis) are followed by a Greek numeral in cases where there is a differential letter (cf. F. W. Madden, Handb. to Rom. Num. p. 157; Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. pp. 120, 180; J. F. W. de Salis, Arch. Journal, vol. xxiv.; Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. pp. 326, 327).

It has not been hitherto observed by any numismatist that the letter x of the word EXERCITVS is on these coins placed at the top of the coin exactly between the two standards, whilst on the coins with the same legend and two soldiers standing, between them the labarum, struck at a later date (335-337; § xii.) the letter x is placed in the centre at the top of the labarum. I am inclined to think that the arrangement is not accidental, but was specially intended by the artist.

The coin engraved (B. with ; Fig. 12) gives the earliest example of the so-called Constantinian monogram on the coins of Constantine.

Helena was the mother, and Theodora the mother-in-law of Constantine the Great.

The coin of Helena has been supposed by Cavedoni (Ricerche, p. 16) to have been struck about the year 326, when it is thought that she discovered the cross of our Saviour, and he quotes in proof of his assertion a passage from St. Ambrose (de Obitu Theodosii, 47, 48), but without entering into the question of the "legend of the finding of the cross" [CROSS, FINDING OF], it may be mentioned that Eusebius, who gives an account of Helena's visit to the holy sepulchre, says nothing about the discovery of the cross, a point he was not at all likely to have omitted had such really been the case (Vit. Const. iii. c. 43). But the real fact is that both the coins of Helena and Theodora are "restoration coins," and struck after their death by Constantine the Great, and therefore after 328. It will be noticed that the legend is in the dative case, and that neither of them bear the title of Diva as they were Christians.¹ It has been insinuated that Helena first embraced the Christian faith, and gave her son a Christian education (Theodoret, H. E. i. c. 18; Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ed. Smith, vol. ii. p. 3, note 10), but Eusebius positively asserts (Vit. Const. iii. c. 47) that she owed her knowledge of Christianity to Constantine.

Shortly after Constantine's elevation to the purple he recalled his mother (who had been set aside by his father on his marriage with Theodora), and either before Fausta became his wife or upon the occasion of his marriage in 307, he issued some brass coins with the legends and titles FAUSTA N. F. (nobilissima femina) and HELENA N. F. These coins have on the reverse a large star with eight rays within a laurel wreath.² Constantine always treated his mother with the highest respect, and after his marriage gave her the title of Augusta, striking gold and brass coins in her honour with that title, the former of which are mentioned by Eusebius—χρυσοῖς τε νομισμασι καὶ τὴν αὐτῆς ἐκτυποῦσθαι εἰκόνα (Vit. Const. iii. c. 47; cf. Sozomen, H. E. ii. c. 2).

² This attribution is objected to by Mr. C. W. King (Early Christian Numismatics, pp. 36-39, 304), who would wish to assign these coins of Helena to the wife of Julian, and those of Fausta to some lady who might have been the wife of one of the cousins of Julian, or to the sister (?) of Gallus and Julian, said to be mentioned by the latter in his epistles to the Athenians. I am not, however, prepared to accept Mr. King's conclusions. See my paper in the Num. Chron. N. S. 1877, vol. xvii. p. 267.

These types were introduced at the time of the dedication of Constantinople in 330. The pieces above described were not however issued at Constantinople, but at "Arles" (Constantina; § vii.). The stars on either side of the monogram on the coin with VRBS ROMA recall the words or Philostorgius about the "holy sign surrounded by stars," to which I have already alluded (§ iii.).

Some pieces of the VRBS ROMA type have been published (Eckhel, Cat. Mus. Caes. p. 480, No. 288) with the letters M. OST. (Moneta Ostiâ), but I doubt this reading, as after the defeat of Maxentius in 312, Constantine transferred the mint of Ostia to Rome (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 47; 1865, vol. v. p. 111).

A specimen of this extremely rare and interesting coin, which has been from time to time published by different writers (Baronius, Gretzer, Ducange, etc.), was seen in the cabinet of the Prince de Waldeck, by Eckhel, and was recognised by him as a genuine coin (Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 88). The drawings usually given of it, such as that reproduced after Baronius, by Aringhi (Roma Sott. vol. ii. p. 705), and again engraved by Martigny (Dict. des Antig. Chret. s. v. Serpent), are of such a size as to lead most numismatists to suspect it. But there is no doubt that at least two genuine specimens exist, the one engraved, for the cast of which I am indebted to Dr. Friedlaender, and the example in the "Museum of Prince von Waldeck," published by Dr. Friedlaender (Blätter für Münzkunde, vol. i. p. 149, pl. vi. No. 6, Berlin, 1863).

2. Obv. CONSTANTINVS AVG. Bust of Constantine II. to the right, laureated.

Rev. Same legend and type. Æ. (Fig. 17.)

This rare little piece, of the smallest size, smaller even than the similar coin of his father, which I have introduced here, instead of in its proper chronological place, for better illustration, is in the possession of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, who most kindly sent it to me to see. It was formerly in the Wigan collection, and may be the same as that published by Gaillard (Descript. des Mon. de J. Garcia, p. 304, No. 4929, pl. x. No. 5). It has been published, and an engraving given of it twice the actual size, by Mr. C. W. King (Early Christ. Num. pp. xvi. xliii. and 25 note, engraved on title-page; cf. art. LABARUM), who has allowed himself to be led away, as he says, by the "practised (and what is greatly to the present purpose), the unprejudiced eye of his draughtsman," who reads the word DEO on the labarum, which on examination turns out to be nothing more than three pellets, as on the coins of his father, and which probably represent gems or other ornaments of the labarum, or may be intended for the three stars as represented on the coins with the BEATA TRANQVILLITAS type (see § vi. note).

Both coins bear the mint mark CONS. which can only be interpreted Constantinopoli. This being the case, I may observe that they are the only coins of Constantine I. and his son bearing positive Christian emblems issued at the mint of Constantinople.^b

The coin of Constantine I. was most likely struck in 330 on the dedication of the new capital; that of the son was probably issued after his father's death in 337 or 338, as it is recorded (Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ed. Smith, vol. ii. p. 366, and note 53) that "at the personal interview of the three brothers, Constantine II. the eldest of the Caesars obtained, with a certain pre-eminence of rank, the possession of the new capital, which bore his own name and that of his father." M. Feuardent (quoted by Mr. King) would assign its date to the period of the elevation of Constantine II. to the rank of Augustus, in the last days of his father's lifetime, but I do not know of any authority for such a supposition (cf. Soerat. H. E. i. c. 39; Sozomen, H. E. ii. c. 34; Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 63, 68).

The type of these pieces and the inscription—though the legend is by no means a new one, occurring as it does from the time of Commodus (Cohen, Suppl. p. 484)—indicate how "the public hope" (cf. Euseb. Vit. Const. ii. c. 29; iv. c. 9) was centered in the triumph of the Christian religion over the adversary of mankind—"the great dragon, that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2)—and we are told (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. c. 3) how Constantine had a picture painted of the dragon—the flying serpent—beneath his own and his children's feet pierced through the middle with a dart and cast into the depths of the sea (βέλει πεπαρμένον κατὰ μέσου τοῦ κύτους; cf. Euseb. Const. orat. ad Sanct. Coetum, c. 20).

The spear-head on these coins ends in the monogram of Christ; on those struck at Thessalonica, Aquileia, London, and other mints, it ends in a cross (§ vi.).

^b On certain coins of Constantine I. struck at Constantinople, his head bears the nimbus (see § xvii.), whilst on the magnificent gold medallion of Constantius II. Caesar, also struck at Constantinople (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 21, from Musée de Vienne) weighing 3920 grains or 56 solidi, Constantine I. is represented standing between his two sons Constantine II. and Constans, whilst a hand from heaven crowns him with a wreath (§ xiii.). This piece must have been issued between 323 and 337, as Constantius II. is Caesar, and perhaps in 336 on occasion of his marriage. There is also the gold medallion of Constantine II. with spear-head ending in a cross and exergual letters CONS. (see § vi.).

Rev. VICTORIA CAESAR NN. Victory; in field to right LXXII; to left *. In the exergue S. M. AN. N. (British Museum.)

These gold coins were probably issued about the same time. They cannot have been struck before 333, in which year Constans was made Caesar, and perhaps not till 335, when Constantine celebrated his tricennalia, and divided the empire between his sons and nephews. The mint of Antioch was in the dominions of Constantius II., and the form P instead of R is that specially employed in the East (see § xv.). The figures LXXII signify that 72 solidi were coined to the pound, Constantine I. having reduced the aureus about the year 312.

It was at Antioch that the name of Χριστιανός was first used (Acts xi. 26) about the year 44.

§ xii. Coins of Constantine I., Constantine II., Constantius II., Constans, and Delmatius—335–337.

This coin was attributed by the late Mr. de Salis to Constantine II., but a comparison with the coins of this Caesar, as also with those struck at Lyons and Siscia when he became Augustus, make this attribution doubtful, an opinion also held by Mr. Grueber of the British Museum (see § xix.).

Similar coins occur of Constantine II. and Delmatius. Those of Constantius II. and of Constans were no doubt issued, but no specimens are in the British Museum.

B. with R on labarum.—Coins of Constantine I., Constantine II., Constantius II., Constans, and Delmatius exist. (British Museum.)

The coin of Constantine I. engraved (Fig. 20; British Museum) was also attributed by the late Mr. de Salis to Constantine II., but with even less reason than in the former case.

These two series were not issued before 335, as the type is found on coins of Delmatius, who was made Caesar in this year, and it continues to the death of Constantine I. in 337. (See § vii.)

§ xiii. Consecration coins of Constantine I.—337–338.

✠. Æ. (Fig. 21; British Museum.)

Varieties of this coin occur with either ✠ or ✠ or X struck at Lyons and at Arles. They must have been issued shortly after the death of Constantine in 337, or at latest in 338. Cavedoni has suggested (Disamina, p. 222) that this type represents the statue set up by Constantine in the forum of Constantinople (see § v.).

Other consecration coins were struck having the legends DV [Divus] CONSTANTINVS AVG. [or PT. AVGG. Pater Augustorum], and IVST. VEN. MEM. [Iusta venerandae memoriae] IVST. VENERAB. or VN. MR. [venerandae memoriae], and especially a coin of which the following is a description:—

Obv. DV. (rarely DIV.) CONSTANTINVS PT. AVGG. Bust of Constantine to the right, veiled.

Rev. No legend. Constantine in quadriga to right, holding his hand to another hand which descends from heaven to receive it; above, a star. In exergue S. M. AN. ε. (Signata moneta Antiochid 5.) Æ. (Fig. 22; British Museum.)

Mr. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 53; cf. Rev. J. Wordsworth, Dict. of Christ. Biog. vol. i. p. 649) speaks of these coins as issued at "Alexandria, Antioch and Carthage alone," but no coins were struck at Carthage at so late a date. They are found with the mint marks of Horacleia, Alexandria, Constantinople, Cyzicus, Nicomedia and Antioch. On some specimens there is no star.

With reference to the word Divus, the system of "consecration" seems to have obtained even after the time of Constantine I. among his Christian successors; Constantius II. "meruit inter divos referri" (Eutrop. x. 15); Jovian "inter divos relatus est" (Eutrop. x. 18); Valentinian I. was consecrated by his son Gratian "divinis honoribus" (Auson. ad Grat. act. c. 8), to which may be added the name of Valentinian II., as appears from a marble of Chiusi in Tuscany (Cavedoni, Cimit. Chius. p. 45, Modena, 1853). No coins, however, bearing the title of Divus are known of any of these emperors.

The coin engraved (Fig. 22) is especially mentioned by Eusebius as representing Constantine I. in the act of ascending to heaven (Vit. Const. iv. c. 73). The type was probably suggested by the biblical account of Elijah taken up to heaven in a chariot and horses of fire (2 Kings ii. 11; cf. vi. 17). The star is doubtless the comet alluded to by Eutropius as appearing after his death ("denunciata mors ejus etiam per crinitam stellam," &c. Hist. x. 8), and which reminds one of the stella crinita which blazed for seven days after the death of Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. Caes. 88; cf. Plin. N. H. ii. c. 25; Dion. Cass. xlv. 7; Plut. Caes. 69), and which is represented on his coins (Cohen, Méd. Imp. Nos. 20, 21). The star was originally a pagan symbol, but pagan symbols for long after the time of Constantine were mixed with Christian ones. There may be specially mentioned the phoenix, occurring first on the gold consecration coins of Trajan as an emblem of Eternity (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 95), on a gold coin of Hadrian representing Trajan (?)

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

holding a phoenix within the zodiac (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 49), on an Alexandrian coin of Antoninus Pius with ΑΙΩΝ (aeternitas, Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. iv. p. 69), and again reappearing on the brass medallions of Constantine I., with the legend GLORIA SAECVLI VIRTVS CAES., and probably struck after 315, as they bear the title of MAX. (Cohen, No. 164), and on coins of Constantius II. and Constans when Augusti (Cohen, Méd. Imp.; see § xix.).

The "hand from heaven" occurs on the gold medallions of Constantius II., to which I have already referred (§ x. note); and Eusebius (de Laud. Const. c. 10) speaks of the Almighty King extending his right hand from above and giving Constantine I. victory over all his enemies.

§ xiv. Coins of Constantine I. and II. with cross, not previously alluded to.

There are certain coins of Constantine I., some gold with legend GLORIA EXERCITVS (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 17, from Tanini), some silver with PAX AVGVSTORYM (Cohen, No. 76, from Musée de Vienne), and of Constantine II. Caesar (brass) with BEATA TRANQVILLITAS (Cohen, No. 86, from Ducange) having a cross either in the field, or on the standard, or on the helmet, but of what form it is impossible to say. The first mentioned may have been struck between 326 and 333; the second, as it does not bear the title of Maximus, perhaps before 315, though this rule cannot be considered as absolute, as coins of Constantine I. were certainly struck after 315 without it (§ iv.); and the third about 323 (§ vi.).

§ xv. Remarks on the Forms of the Crosses adopted by Constantine I.—There is not much doubt that Constantine did not invent the forms of the cross or monogram which appears on his coins. The monogram ✠ may be seen on the coins of Alexander Bala, king of Syria (B.C. 146), and on those of the Bactrian king Hermaeus (B.C. 138–120), and also occurs on the coins of Trajan Decius (A.D. 249–251), forming part of the word Α✠ (ἀρχοντας) to which I have already referred (see Introduction), whilst the complete form of the labarum ☩ may be found on the coins of the Indo-Scythian king Azes (B.C. 100), and on those of the Bactrian kings Hippostratus the Great (B.C. 140–135) and of Hermaeus (B.C. 138–120), which monogram has been interpreted Ortospana, another name for Kabul (Gen. Cunningham, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 203, pl. vii. Mon. No. 46, &c.; E. Thomas, Num. Chron. vol. iv. pl. viii. No. 3). The ✠ may have sometimes signified ΧΡΥΣΑΙΠΟΣ.

It was used as an abbreviation for ΧΡΗΣΤΟΝ, since a collection of passages so marked might make up a χρυστομαθία. It also stood for ΧΡΥΣΟΣ and ΧΡΩΣ (Liddell and Scott, s.v. X), but it eventually became the Christian monogram composed of x and p, the two first letters of the name of ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ.

The form with the vertical line ending in a circle or a pellet (✠ ✠) may be compared with the monogram ✠ supposed to signify ΧΙΛΑΡΧΟΣ, to that occurring on the coins or the Ptolemies—, , , , to the  on some (though rarely) of the coins of the kings of the Bosphorus, and to the star or comet above the heads of Julius Caesar and Augustus (Letronne, Inscript. de l'Egypte, vol. i. p. 433; Mionnet, Suppl. vol. ix. p. 22, No. 122; Koehne, Mus. Kotschoubey, vol. ii. p. 309; Cohen, Méd. de la Répub. Rom. pl. xv. No. 30).

The form  occurs on the coins of Tigranes, king of Armenia (B.C. 96–64); on coins of Arsaces X. XII. and XIV. (B.C. 92–38) forming ΤΙΓΡΑΝΟΚΕΡΤΑΣ or Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia (Mionnet, vol. v. p. 108, No. 939; Cunningham, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 196); on the coins of the Jewish king Herod I. (B.C. 38), and on the coins of Chios of the time of Augustus (Madden, Jew. Coinage, pp. 83, 85, 87, 244). This form seems to have been that exclusively used in the East, and Letronne states (La Croix ansée in Mém. de l'Acad. vol. xvi.) that he never found the  on any of the Christian monuments of Egypt. Its adoption was doubtless from its affinity to the crux ansata. It is the only monogram in the Vatican Codex (4th cent.), in the Codex Bezae Cantab. (5th or 6th cent.), and in the Codex Sinaiticus (4th cent.), where it occurs in four places, at the end of Jeremiah, twice at the end of Isaiah, and in the middle of the word ΕΣΤΑΥΡΩΘΗ in the 8th ver. of chap. xi. of Revelation (Martigny, Dict. p. 416).

It was on the coins struck at Antioch (§ xi.) that Constantine first introduced the , about the year 335, though the same form occurs on the coins struck after his death at Lyons and (?) Arles (§ xiii.).

The earliest example of the equilateral cross  may be seen on the breast of or suspended from the neck of one of the kings on the slabs brought from Nineveh (Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, pp. 333, 414; cf. p. 303). At a later date its form was  (De Witte, Mon. Céram. vol. i. pl. xciii.), sometimes accompanied by globules , as on vases, both of which symbols may have had their origin in the sign , which occurs on the coins of Gaza—frequently called the “monogram of Gaza”—on monuments and vases of Phœnician origin, on Gallo-Celtic coins, on Scandinavian monuments called “Thor’s hammer,” and on Indian coins called “the Swastika cross” (Rapp, Das labarum, etc., in vol. xxxix. of the Vereins v. Alterthumsfreundern im Rheinlande, 1865; Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 242).

The three principal forms of crosses in antiquity are (1) the cross  called decussata, (2) the cross  called commisata, and (3) the cross  called immissa. [CROSS.]

The form  was doubtless an abbreviated monogram of the name of Christ. Julian the Apostate, in speaking of his hostility against Christianity in his satire against the people of Antioch, writes (Misopogon, Jul. Op. p. 111, Paris 1583). “You say I wage war with the Chi and you admire the Kappa” (καὶ ὅτι πολέμῳ τῷ Χι πόθος δὲ ὑμᾶς εἰσείσι τοῦ Κάππα); and again (Op. cit. p. 99), “They say that neither the Chi nor the Kappa ever did the city any harm; it is hard to understand the meaning of this wise riddle of yours, but we happen to have been informed by some interpreters of your city that they are initial letters of names, the one denoting Christ, the other Constantius” (τὸ Χι, φησὶν, οὐδὲν ἠδίκησε τὴν πόλιν, οὐδὲ τὸ Κάππα δηλοῦν δ’ ἐθέλειν τὸ μὲν Χριστὸν τὸ δὲ Κωνσταντιόν).

The cross  is in the form of a Tau and appears to be a variety of the crux ansata, or “cross with a handle” found on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. It was sometimes used in the same manner as the  in the middle of the name of the deceased, as may be seen on a marble of the 3rd century in the Callixtine cemetery with the legend Ι Ρ Ε  Ν Ε.

The cross  has been generally supposed to be the kind on which our Lord was crucified, which seems further corroborated from the fact that the title of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin was placed above his head (Matt. xxvii. 37) or over him (Luke xxiii. 38; cf. Mark xv. 25) or over the cross (John xix. 19) and so would have a form like .

De Rossi has shown (De Christ. tit. Carth. in vol. iv. of Spicil. Solesmense, ed. Pitra, 1858) that no Christian monument of certain date before the 5th century gives examples of the crux immissa, or of that which has been called the Greek —

. On the other hand an epitaph, which from its consular date is earlier than the reign of Constantine, proves that the Christians had a monogram composed of the letters I and X (Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός), thus formed  (De Rossi, Inscript. Christ. vol. i. p. 16, 1855).

The most ancient and most correct form of the monogram of Christ occurs upon a monument of Sivaux in France, which is considered by De Rossi (Bullet. Arch. Christ. p. 47, 1863) earlier than the time of Constantine, having the arms of the cross of great length . [INSCRIPTIONS, I. p. 856, where it is engraved.] This was not long afterwards modified, and it is at the time of Constantine that the  occurs for the first time on the Roman dated tituli. There has been discovered (De Rossi, Bullet. p. 22, 1863) a monument of the year 323, which is precisely the year of the defeat of Licinius, having on it the monogram . De Rossi has also published (Inscr. Christ. vol. i. No. 26) a fragment with the inscription [VI]XIT . . .  . . . GAL. CONSS. which he thinks might perhaps be of the year 298, when Faustus and Gallus were consuls, adding that if he could only find the missing portion and it bore the name of Faustus, auro contra et gemmis cariorum aestimaret. It is, however, more than probable that the Gallus in this inscription was consul at a much later date; indeed it has been suggested that this inscription refers to the emperor Constantius II. and Constantius Gallus Caesar, who were consuls in 352, 353, and 354 (Edinburgh Review, vol. cxx. 1864, p. 229). Other marbles of the years 331, 339, 341, and or the Greek  take the place of the monograms, so that after 405 the  (at Rome at least) especially on epitaphs is entirely eclipsed, and the plain cross is found on all monuments (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 416) excepting on coins.

The form of the cross on some of the coins of Constantine struck at Aquileia is  This has been supposed by Cavedoni (Nuove Ricerche, p. 3) to be not the Latin but the Alexandrian or Egyptian, an opinion not acceded to by Garrucci (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 259), and it may be noticed that Garrucci has published a coin with a square instead of a rounded top (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. pl. No. 11; Rev. Num. 1866, pl. iii. No. 11; see § vii.). It is certainly very doubtful if the cross on the coins of Aquileia is the crux ansata, and even Borghesi did not know what the rounded extremity could have in common with the handle of the Egyptian cross, for the cross called ansata has not a round but an ovoid top, into which the hand might be introduced, as may be seen on existing monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, 1841, Suppl. pl. 20, 21, etc.).

As to the rounded top, Garrucci suggests (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 261) that it may have been meant to allude to the sacred head of the Redeemer, which was thus intended to be represented projecting above the cross, an idea considered by Cavedoni (Rivista, p. 216) a "whimsical fancy," as "everyone," he says, "knows that that most sacred head rested below the beam of the cross itself." But Cavedoni is decidedly wrong, as the following earliest examples of the crucifix show the head above the cross beam; (1) crucifixes on a cornelian and an inlaid ivory of the 5th century (Garrucci, Diss. Arch. p. 27); (2) crucifix of the Syrian codex in the Laurentian library at Florence, dated 586 by its writer the monk Rabula (Assemani, Bibl. Laurent. Medic. Cat. pl. xxiii. Florence, 1742); (3) the pastoral cross and reliquary of Theodolinda, Queen of Lombardy, who died in 628 (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 191); (4) crucifix of the cemetery of St. Julius or St. Valentinus (Botari, Sculture, etc. vol. iii. 192; Rome, 1737-1754); to which may be added the curious graffiti, giving a caricatured representation of the crucifixion drawn at the end of the 2nd or the beginning of the 3rd century (see art. CRUCIFIX).

Without entering into the history of the introduction of the diadem at Rome, by the emperors, it is certain that Constantine I. was the first to unhesitatingly adopt it, as testified by his coins, and indeed he is said to have always worn it. ("Habitum regium gemmis et caput exornans perpetuo diademate." Aurel. Vict. Epit. 141.)

It has been supposed (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 80) that Constantine adopted the diadem, wishing to liken himself to Alexander the Great, on whose coins an effigy of a very similar character may be seen, but according to the authority of St. Ambrose (de Obitu Theod. 47, 48) the empress Helena, at the time when she is supposed to have discovered at Jerusalem, about 326, the fragment of our Saviour's cross, together with two of the nails (one of which was used for the bridle of his horse, the other for his diadem), sent to her son Constantine a diadem studded with gems, which has been identified with the iron crown of Lombardy at Monza cathedral [CROWN]; moreover the senate is said (Anonym. Paneg. viii. 25; Tillemont, Const. note 33)—probably in 315 when he was decreed the title of Maximus (see § i. under 315)—to have specially granted a diadem to Constantine.

The coin engraved (Fig. 23; British Museum) shows Constantine with the diadem, and with his head represented looking upward towards heaven, and Eusebius states (Vit. Const. iv. c. 15) that "he directed his likeness to be stamped on the gold coins of the empire with the eyes uplifted as if praying to God," adding that "this money became current throughout the whole Roman world." It was doubtless to this coinage that his apostate nephew Julian sneeringly alludes in his "Caesars" when he speaks of Constantine being enamoured of the moon, upon whom he kept his eyes constantly fixed, and from the style of his hair and face leading the life of a female hairdresser. Constantine also had his full-length portrait placed over the entrance gates of his palaces with the eyes upraised to heaven and the hands outspread as if in prayer (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 15),¹ though this form of adoration likewise obtained among the pagans (Virg. Aen. i. 93; Demosth. adv. Mucart. 1072).

The diadem also may be found on the coins of all Constantine's sons Caesars, and Eusebius says (Vit. Const. i. c. 18) that it was a special distinction of the Imperial Caesars.

§ xvii. Coins of Constantine I. and his Family, with the Nimbus.

Several coins and medallions of Constantine I., of his wife Fausta, and of his sons Crispus, Constantine II., and Constantius II. with the nimbus, some of which were issued at Constantinople, are given by Cohen, but very few are now in existence. The absurd brass medallion of Crispus, with legend SALVS ET SPES XPPVBLICAE (sic) and Christ seated facing, holding a cross, etc., and in the exergue s. p. Sanctus Petrus! (Cohen, No. 27), is evidently an altered piece, the "XP-PVBLICAE" being substituted for "REIPVBLICAE," "the cross" for "a globe," and "the figure of Christ" for "Constantine with nimbus seated facing," as may be seen on a genuine medallion of Constantine; s. p. should certainly be s. r. (Secunda Româ). After Constantine's death his sons continued striking coins representing their father with the nimbus (Cohen, Constans, No. 3, No. 34), and they very soon frequently adopted it, a custom continued under their successors, and especially on the splendid gold medallions of Valens preserved at Vienna (Cohen, Nos. 1, 6, 8, and 10).

Some of the coins of the Roman emperors earlier than the time of Constantine, are decorated with this symbol, notably those of Claudius, Trajan, and Antoninus Pius (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 34), so that its presence gives no direct proof of the Christianity of Constantine, though it was doubtless adopted in this sense.

§ xviii. False or uncertain coins of Constantine I. and II.

(1) Silver medallion representing Constantine holding standard on which ☩, and in the exergue R. P. (Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 248, from Caronni); (2) the brass medallion with legend IN HOC SIN. (sic) VIC. and monogram ☩; above a star; totally remade from a large brass coin of the time between Trajan Decius and Gallienus (Cohen, Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 119 note); (3) the brass medallion of the contorniate style, having for legend the entire inscription on the arch of Constantine, placed thereon to commemorate the defeat of Maxentius in 312. Its authenticity was vindicated by the compiler of the Pembroke Sale Catalogue (p. 297), but whether it sold as a genuine piece I am unable to say; see § i. under 315; (4) the gold coin with the legend

VICTORIA MAXVMA and type A ☩ ω published by Garrucci and accepted as genuine by other modern writers (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 458; see Art. A and Ω); it is not published by Cohen; (5) the coin with legend BAP. NAT. supposed to refer to the baptism of Constantine, but which by the alteration of one letter becomes B. R. P. NAT. (Bono Reipublicae NATO); (6) coins with the monogram ☩ on the helmet, and ☩ or ☩, tracé en creux on a pedestal supporting a shield, on which VOT. R. R., originally published by Garrucci (Num. Cost. 1st ed. Nos. 13 and 16), and now considered by him to be false (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 253; Rev. Num. 1866, p. 110). To which may be added the silver piece of Constantine II. Caesar, described incorrectly as a gold coin from Tristan, by Garrucci (Num. Cost. 1st ed. No. 10), with the legend VICTORIA AVGG. and in the field +, a piece which has been in all probability confused with the coins of Constantine III. (407-411) with the legend VICTORIA AAAVGGGG.

§ xix. Coins of Constantine II., Constantius II., and Constans Augusti—Introduction of A and Ω on coins.

After the death of Constantine I. the type of the two soldiers and the legend GLORIA EXERCITVS was continued by his three sons.¹ The cross on the labarum is of three forms:

(1) ☩. (Fig. 24.)

(2) ☩. Of this series I have not seen any coin of Constantine II., but it doubtless exists. That attributed by the late Mr. de Salis I have restored to Constantine I. (see § xii.). The coins of Constantius II. and Constans of this series are in the British Museum.

(3) ☩. (Fig. 25.)

On some coins all three emperors have the title of Maximus. The coin engraved (Fig. 25) was struck at Siscia, but similar pieces with the title MAX. were issued at Lyons. They are erroneously attributed by M. Feuardent (Rev. Num. 1856, p. 253, pl. vii. No. 2) to Constantine I. the Great.

The same type continues for a short time after the death of Constantine II. in 340, but only with the symbols ☩ and ☩ on the labarum,² but many other types were introduced, among which may be noticed the FEL. TEMP. REPARATIO (Felix temporis reparatio), bearing on the labarum all the three forms—☩, ☩, ☩ (Fig. 26).

The "happy reparation" did not however extend to the softening of manners, for the types of the coins as a rule represent scenes of the grossest cruelty. At the introduction of Christianity artistic style seems to have perished, and the coinage of this and later periods, to quote M. Cohen's expression (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 264, note), can be summed up in two words—"monotonie dans les types, lorsqu'ils ne sont pas barbares, barbarie lorsqu'ils ne sont pas monotones."

It is during the reign of Constantius II. that the brass coins with the inscription HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS are first issued (Fig. 27), a legend which is repeated on the coins of Vetricano (350) and of Constantius Gallus (351-354).

The most important innovation of this period was the introduction of the letters A and Ω. I have already pointed out (§ xviii.) that the coin of Constantine I. with these letters cannot be relied on, and I have now further to state that many numismatists and others (Garrucci, Martigny; see art. A and Ω) have accepted as genuine a gold coin of Constantius with the ¹ For the classification in this section of the coins of the sons of Constantine with the legend GLORIA EXERCITVS, which is fully developed in my paper in the Numismatic Chronicle, (N. S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 23), I am indebted to the labours of the late Mr. de Salis.

² On some of the coins of Constans and Constantius II. the letter M occurs on the labarum, which M. de Witte has suggested (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 197) may be the initial letter of the Virgin Mary, and Mr. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 43) of Magnentius, commander-in-chief under Constans, but neither of these theories is worthy of serious thought. Moreover the letters O, C, G, I, S, T, or V, also occur on the labarum, and how are these to be interpreted? I cannot explain the letters.

A   which turns out to have been described originally by Banduri (vol. ii. p. 227) as A  Q; but the authenticity of the piece is very doubtful. These letters do however occur upon the second brass coins of Constantius II. (Fig. 28), struck about (?) 350–353, and also on a rare silver medallion of Constans in the 'Musée de Vienne' (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 28), on which are represented four military standards, on the second the letter A. on the third . and above , and issued at Rome. It has been suggested (Cavedoni, Appendice, p. 15) that Constans in striking this medallion at Rome wished to testify his adherence to the Catholic dogma of the divinity and eternity of the Incarnate Word, in opposition to the Arian heresy favoured by his brother Constantius, and it may have been struck soon after the council of Sardica in 347. Though the letters A and  were probably employed perhaps even as early as the council of Nice in 325 (art. A and ) it was not till about 347 that they commenced to come into general use in any case on coins. As to the form  instead of , Garrucci asserts (Hagioglypta, p. 168) that the  nowhere occurs on any authentic Christian monument, and condemns, as also does De Rossi, a ring published by Costadoni on which is a dolphin between the letters A and .

§ xx. Coins of Nepotian, Vetricio, Magnentius, Decentius, Constantius Gallus, and Julian the Apostate.

Nepotian made himself master of Rome in 350, and issued gold coins with the legend VRBS ROMA and the type Rome seated holding a globe surmounted with  (), but was killed after a reign of twenty-eight days. Vetricio, on hearing of the death of Constans and the revolt of Magnentius, had himself proclaimed emperor at Sirnium, and produced a new legend SALVATOR REIPUBLICAE with the type of himself holding the labarum, on which . He also repeated the coinage with the legend HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS. The usurper Magnentius (350–353) and his son Decentius struck coins with the A   at Ambianum (Amiens), a mint that was suppressed soon after his death by Constantius II. On the coins of Constantius Gallus Caesar (351–354) the HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS again, and for the last time, occurs. Some coins of this prince with the Isis reverse shew that he to a certain extent must have embraced the pagan opinions of his brother Julian.

Immediately on the accession of Julian the Apostate (355–363) all Christian emblems were abolished, and pagan customs and worship were re-established. In consequence most of the coins of this emperor bear the image of Apollo, Jupiter, the DEVS SANCTVS NILVS, and of many Egyptian deities, Anubis, Serapis, Isis, etc., several of them giving representations of himself as Serapis, and his wife Helena as Isis. It is then hardly to be expected that any coin of this prince would be in existence bearing Christian signs, and yet one has been published—a bronze medallion—representing Julian holding a standard, beneath which is  (Cohen, Méd. Imp.

No. 51, from Wiczay). The only point in its favour is that it shews Julian as bearing the title of Caesar, and if really authentic must have been struck immediately on his appointment to that honour in 355. I cannot however say that the medallion is above suspicion.

§ xxi. Coins from the Accession of Jovian (363) to the death of Theodosius the Great (395).

Under Jovian, the successor of Julian the Apostate, although a few coins bearing pagan types with the legend VOTA PVBLICA occur, and which continue to circulate during the reigns of Valentinian I., Valens, and Gratian, Christian emblems again re-appear, and the labarum terminating in a cross together with the monogram or the simple labarum are of common occurrence (Cohen, Méd. Imp. Nos. 17, 21). The coin of Jovian which has been published by some (Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. i. pp. 34, 58; Martigny, Dict. p. 460; King, Early Christ. Num. p. 84), as struck at Ravenna, cannot be genuine, as Ravenna was not established as a mint till the reign of Honorius (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 181; 1862, vol. ii. pp. 60, 253; Handb. of Rom. Num. p. 159).

Under Valentinian I. the most notable introduction is that of the form  which is generally carried at the top of the sceptre held by the emperor (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 20), but sometimes occurs in the field of the coin (No. 25). Similar emblems, as also the labarum adorned with the  or  continue on the coins during the reigns of his brother Valens, the usurper Procopius, of his sons, Gratian and Valentinian II. and Theodosius I. the Great.¹ The coins both of gold and brass of Aelia Flaccilla, the wife of Theodosius I., who was much esteemed for her piety, also exhibit interesting Christian emblems, among the most striking of which is the type of victory seated inscribing on a shield the  (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 1), a reverse that occurs frequently afterwards on the coins of other empresses; whilst the coins of Magnus Maximus, usurper in Britain and Gaul, and of his son Victor (BONO REIPUBLICAE NATI) and of Eugenius, usurper in Gaul, shew more or less the same symbols.

¹ The form COMOB which may be explained Constantinae [Arlès] Moneta 72, or Obyrza "pure gold," appears for the first time on the gold coins under Valentinian II. and Theodosius I., and is exclusively a Western mint mark; the form COXOB Constantinopoli 72, occurs only on the coins of Constantinople and for the first time under Gratian, Valentinian II., and Theodosius I. (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. pp. 123, 124), and they both continue till about the time of Justinian I., when COXOB is used throughout the empire on the Byzantine gold. I am inclined to think with Messrs. Pinder and Friedländer (Ältere Münzkunde, 1851; cf. De la Sign. des Lettres OB, Berlin, 1873) that the letters OB stand for "72 solidi," coined from one pound of gold (Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 177; vol. ii. p. 240), but the late Mr. de Sails considered (Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. p. 327), that M. de Petigny (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 115) gives most convincing arguments for reading Obyrza "pure gold."

§ xxii. Division of the Empire (395). A. The West to end of Western empire (476). B. The East to the time of Leontius (488).

A. The West.—After the death of Theodosius I. the empire was divided between his two sons Arcadius and Honorius,^m the former taking the Eastern, the latter the Western provinces. About this time the type of Victory, holding a globe surmounted by a cross, is introduced (Arcadius, Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. i. p. 404; Honorius, Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 24), and the Greek cross may be seen on the exagias solidi of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius II. (Cohen, No. 6, Sabatier, pl. iii. No. 9). On a gold coin of Honorius struck at Ravenna, in the collection of Dr. John Evans, the emperor is represented holding a spear, surmounted by , on the head of an animal which appears like a lion with a serpent's or dragon's tail.

On certain coins of Aelia Galla Placidia, wife of Constantius III., the colleague of Honorius for a few months, the  or a cross, is represented on her right shoulder, whilst the  is within a wreath on the reverse (Cohen, Nos. 1-16), and the hand from heaven crowning the empress is introduced (Cohen, Nos. 2, 10, 11), as had also been the case on the coins of Eudoxia in the East.

The usurper Priscus Attalus seems to have dropped Christian emblems, and Rome having been sacked by Alaric who placed him on the throne, he dared to strike silver medallions twice the size of a five-shilling piece, and gold and silver coins with the presumptuous legend INVICTA ROMA AETERNA (Cohen, Nos. 1, 3-5). The usual emblems occur on the coins of John, proclaimed emperor in 423.

Valentinian III. appears to have been the first emperor who wore a cross on his diadem, if the gold medallion is genuine (Cohen, No. 1, from Banduri), and on other coins (Cohen, No. 11), holding a cross and a globe on which Victory,

^m During the reign of Honorius some brass medals were issued representing in most cases the head of Alexander, but sometimes that of Honorius, and on the reverse an ass suckling her young, accompanied by the legends D. N. IHV. (sic) XPS DEI FILIVS or IOVIS FILIVS or ASINA, or as on a large medallion of the contorniate class, the monogram . The effigy of Alexander the Great seems to have been considered as a "protection" (Treb. Poll. "xxx tyr." 14). John Chrysostom (Homil. ii. No. 5; cf. Montfaucon, Op. Chrys. vol. ii. p. 243) reproached certain bad Christians of his time for wearing as amulets on their heads or feet medals of bronze with the head of Alexander the Macedonian (νομισμάτα χαλκὰ Ἀλεξάνδρου τοῦ Μακεδόνος ταῖς κεφαλαῖς καὶ τοῖς ποσὶ περιδεδυμέντων). These medals were thought by Eckhel (Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 173) to be symbolic representations made by the Christians, but Tanini appears to have been of opinion that they were satirical pieces fabricated by the Pagans to turn into derision the name of Christian, whilst Cavedoni (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 314), thinks that "they are the work of certain evil Christians or the Gnostics or Basilidians, who employed these medals as 'pierres astrifères' to circulate among the people their false and detestable doctrines." [See MEDALS, below.]

he changes the ordinary captive trampled under foot to a human-headed serpent, a custom followed by many of his successors. The type of the emperor holding the mappa or volumen and a long cross was also introduced (Cohen, No. 21). His wife Licinia Eudoxia also bore the cross on her diadem on her coins struck in Italy (Fig. 29; Cohen, No. 1). A very rare gold coin of this empress (De Salis, Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. pl. viii. No. 1) has the  surrounded by a circle and the legend SALVS ORIENTIS FELICITAS OCCIDENTIS. It was struck on the occasion of her marriage in 437, and she was so called because Theodosius II. had no son, and the Eastern empire seemed likely, as well as the Western, to become the inheritance of his eldest daughter's issue (De Salis, op. cit. p. 206). Some coins of his sister Justa Grata Honoria bear the legend BONO REIPVBLICAE (Cohen, No. 1).

The usual types occur on the coins of Petronius Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Anthemius, and his wife Eufemia, but on one coin of this emperor representing Anthemius and Leo, there is between them a tablet (surmounted by a cross) on which is inscribed the word PAX (Cohen, No. 9). On the accession of Olybrius he dared to introduce the legend SALVS MVNDI, engraving on his coin a large cross, though he only enjoyed a reign of about three months and thirteen days. The coins of Glycerius, Julius Nepos and Romulus Augustus (Fig. 30), the last emperor of the Western empire, offer the usual symbols.

B. The East.—Under Arcadius, as already pointed out, the type of Victory holding a globe surmounted by a cross was introduced. Coins with the legend NOVA SPES REIPVBLICAE and the type of Victory resting on a shield were struck (Sabatier, Mon. Byz. No. 17), matching the coins of his wife Eudoxia, with the legend SALVS REIPVBLICAE, (sic) and the type of Victory inscribing on a shield the  (Fig. 31; Sabatier, No. 3), a type that was already in vogue at the time of her mother-in-law Flaccilla. The question of the attribution of the coins bearing the names of Eudocia and Eudoxia was for a long time involved in great obscurity till set at rest by the late Mr. de Salis (Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. p. 203); and many coins bearing the name of Eudoxia with the , given by Sabatier to the wife of Theodosius II., are now attributed to the wife of Arcadius.

Theodosius II. issued coins with the legend GLORIA ORVIS (sic) TERRAR. representing himself holding the labarum and a globe cruciger, and all the coins with the name EVDOCIA belong to the wife of this emperor (Fig. 32).

In 451 Marcian was proclaimed emperor owing to the influence of Pulcheria, the sister of Theodosius II., whom he married, and who was at this time about fifty years of age. A gold coin was struck by Marcian to commemorate this event, bearing the legend FELICITER NPBTIS (see Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 47, and "Addenda," p. 199) representing Marcian and Pulcheria, both with the nimbus, standing joining hands; in the middle, Christ, with the nimbus cruciger, standing and placing his hands on their shoulders (Fig. 33). This piece, which is one of the most interesting examples of Christian Numismatics, is preserved in the Hunter Museum, Glasgow, and I am indebted to Prof. Young, M.D., Curator of the Museum, for sending me an impression of it (cf. Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 191; Sabatier, No. 2). The coins of Pulcheria bear similar types to those of the other empresses.

Some coins of Leo I. shew the  in the field (Sabatier, pl. vi. No. 24), and represent him holding the mappa and long cross (No. 19), as on the coins of Valentinian III. previously alluded to, but the type of the coins of his wife Verina, as well as those of Leo II. and Zeno (with the exception of the brass coins of the latter with INVICTA ROMA and S. C. Senatus-consulto), his wife Ariadne, of Basiliscus, his wife Zenonis, and son Marcus, and of Leontius, do not exhibit any novelty of type.

§ xxiii. Coins of the Empire of the East from the time of Anastasius (491) to the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II. (1453).

The true Byzantine type of coinage commences under Anastasius (491-518), who instituted a monetary reform. During his reign, as well as during that of Justin I. (518-527), the types of the gold and silver coins are principally the usual Victory holding a globe, on which is a cross, or else a large cross, or a staff surmounted by the

, whilst the , , or  are of frequent occurrence. The A   or   may be found on the small silver coins of Justin I. (Sabatier, Mon. Byz. pl. ix. Nos. 25, 26), a type likewise appearing on those of Justinian I. (Sab.

pl. xii. Nos. 12, 15, cf. A   on $\mathcal{A}$ coins, pl.

xvii. Nos. 36-38) and Mauricius Tiberius (Sab. pl. xxiv. No. 14). The copper coinage now under Anastasius for the first time bears an index of its value, which generally occupies the whole of the field, almost always accompanied by crosses. One specimen shews the emperor Justin I. wearing the  on his breast (Sab.

pl. x. No. 1), or the  on his head (No. 2).

In 527 Justinian was associated to the empire by his uncle Justin, and coins were struck of gold and copper bearing both their portraits. On a very rare copper piece, formerly in the collection of the late Mr. de Salis, and now in the British Museum, the word VITA appears for the first time (Fig. 34; Sab. pl. xi. No. 22), a form employed afterwards by Justin II. and Sophia (Sab. pl. xxi. Nos. 10, 12, 13), and Mauricius Tiberius (Sab. pl. xxiv. No. 20), signifying, according to the late Baron Marchant and M. de Sauley, "Sit longa vita," but which the Abbé Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 464) thinks may refer to the sign of the cross as the source of true life. In favour of the first interpretation M. Sabatier mentions (vol. i. p. 170) the words VINCAS or NIKA on the contorniates and the legend Ne percat (but probably Noster Perpetuus) on the brass coins (Sab. pl. xxvii. No. 26) of Focas and Leontia (602-610), as also the letters P. A. MVL. or P. A. MVL. on the coins of Theodosius III. (716), Leo the Isaurian (716-741), and Constantine V. and Leo IV. (751-755), these being interpreted Per Annos MVLTO [vivat], but Mr. de Salis, who states that the legend MVLTVS or MVLTVS ANNIS occurs for the first time on the coins of Justinian II. without the letters PA, considered (Rev. Num. 1859, p. 441) that these letters signified PATHR or PATHR AVGVSTI, an opinion that M. Sabatier seems to have adopted in other parts of his work (vol. i. p. 74; vol. ii. p. 46). It may be mentioned that the Abbé Cavedoni preferred to read Perpetuus Augustus MVLtoties or MVLtimodis (Rev. Num. 1859, p. 399); but this interpretation is doubtful.

On the death of his uncle, Justinian I. succeeded to the throne (527-565), and about his twelfth year introduced his portrait full-faced on the copper coinage, adding the word ANNO together with a number marking the year of his reign. The  (reversed) is also fixed on the breast of this emperor (Sab. pl. xii. No. 22), set as it seems on a plate surrounded by gems (Fig. 35), and the form  occupies the whole of the reverse of some of the small copper coins (Sab. pl. xvii. Nos. 2 and 9).

The coins of the Ostrogoths in Italy, commencing at the overthrow of Romulus Augustus (476-553), which generally bear the portraits of Anastasius, Justin I., and Justinian I., and many of which carry on the farcical legend of INVICTA ROMA, as well as the coins of the Vandals in Africa (428-534), do not require any special allusion in connexion with the present subject.

The reign of Justin II. (565-578), with the exception of the pieces of himself and wife Sophia with the inscription VITA, to which I have already alluded, offers no new types.

Under his successor Tiberius II. Constantine (578-582) the cross is placed on four steps (Sab. pl. xxii. No. 13), or on a circle or globe (Sab. pl. xxii. Nos. 17, 18), types that become especially common under Heraclius, whilst on some of his coins he is represented holding the volumen, and a sceptre surmounted by an eagle, above which a cross (Sab. pl. xxii. No. 15; xxiii. Nos. 1, 2, and 13), a type occurring on the coins of Mauricius Tiberius (582-602), who also issued a very rare solidus (of which a woodcut is given by Sabatier, vol. i. p. 238), representing himself holding the volumen and long cross, and on the reverse Victory holding a long sceptre terminating in , and a cross on a globe (see the description of a coin of Leo I. § xxii.). The coins of Focas (602-610) are of the usual type.

Heraclius (610-641), who issued coins of himself and sons Heraclius Constantine, and Heraclionas, with the title of Consul, an office that was not definitely abolished till the reign of Leo VI. (886-912), produced the legend DEVS ADIVTA ROMANIS (Fig. 36; Sab. pl. xxix. No. 23) on his silver coins, a legend which continued on the coins of his successors down to the time of Justinian II. (685). Some of his copper coins present an entirely new feature, in that the legend is completely Greek, instead of the curious mixture of Greek and Latin, and also reverts to the Constantinian legend EN TSTO NIKA (Sab. pl. xxviii. No. 26), which appears in the form EH ZOVZΩ HICAZ or HICAZE on the coins of Basil II. and Constantine XI. (Sab. pl. xlviii. Nos. 15, 16), and EN TOVTΩ

NIKATE on those of Michael VII. and Maria (Sab. pl. li. No. 11).

The late Dr. Finlay has suggested (Greece under the Romans, p. 544) that the copper coins of rude fabric with the EN TΩTO NIKAI legend were probably coined by Heraclius for the use of the troops and provincials during his Persian campaigns, to which theory, with the exception of the words "rude fabric," as these coins are no ruder than the rest of the copper currency, the Hon. J. L. Warren assented, adding "that such a type would be peculiarly appropriate in a war against the crescent and the infidels, thus readopting the labarum motto, translated, however, and thereby shewing how essentially Greek the empire had become" (Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 229). The same type was copied by Constans (641-668), and an interesting account of some coins of this emperor and his sons, discovered in the island of Cyprus, has been written by Mr. Warren (op. cit. p. 42). During the short reign of Theodosius III. (716) some small silver coins were struck (Sab. pl. xxxix. No. 3) bearing the legend AMENITAS DEI (the loving-kindness, i.e. the grace of God) within a wreath of myrtle.

During the reign of Constantine V. Copronymus, and his son Leo IV. (751-775), the hand "descending from heaven" occurs on the gold coinage (Sab. pl. xl. No. 22), and the form in which the hand is held is supposed to express the sacred letters IC-XC (DICT. OF CHRIST. ANTIQ. I. p. 199). The hand also occurs on the coins of John I. Zimisceus, Michael IV., Michael VI., Alexius I. Comnenus, John II. Comnenus, Manuel I. Comnenus, Isaac II. Angelus, John VIII. Palaeologus, and on those of the emperors of Trebizond. The legend IHSYS XPISZYS NICA, with the type of a large cross on three steps, first appears on his silver coins (Sab. pl. xl. No. 25), though on a copper coin with the effigies of Leo III. (dead), Constantine V., and Leo IV. (Sab. pl. xl. No. 17), the letters x n for Christus Nica may be found. Sometimes the

letters are triplicated, x-n as on coins of Irene

x-n

(Sab. pl. xli. no. 13). This legend was continued on the silver coins of Leo IV. (775-780), and of Constantine VI. and Irene (780-797), but Nicephorus I. Logothetes struck it on a gold coin (Sab. pl. xli. No. 14), and it is generally found on the silver till the reign of John I. Zimisceus (969-976), on whose coins the face of the emperor is represented within a circle surrounded by the letters

Ι Α
Ω Η

(Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 19). On some of his brass coins (Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 6), as also on those of Alexius I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 18, 19), and Andronicus IV. Palaeologus (Sab. pl. lxiii. no. 1), the legend is

Ι C | Χ C
Ν I | Κ Α

Alexius I. was the first emperor who was really Greek, and Latin legends are after his time no longer to be found on the Byzantine coinage. It was on the coins of Michael I. Rhangabe (811-813), with the legend IHSYS XPISZYS NICA (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 3), that the words BASILIS ROMAIOH were first introduced, "a sad acknowledgment of a rival Romanorum Imperator" (Sat. Review, June 1, 1861); and Theophilus (829-842) on some coins of the same legend and type (Sab. pl. xliii. No. 10), calls himself ΘΕΟΦΙΛΟΣ ΔΟΥΛΟΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ ΠΙΣΤΟΣ ΕΗ ΑΥΤΩ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥ ΡΟΜΑΙΟΗ, whilst on some of the same type he inscribes CVRIE ΒΟΗΘΗ ΤΟ ΣΟ ΔΟΥΛΟ Χ Κ Ε Κόριε βοήθει τῷ σῷ δούλῳ (Lord protect thy servant).

The principal Christian types on the Byzantine coinage may be classified in the following manner:—

A. CHRIST.—During the reign of Justinian II. (685-695), who had been deposed on account of his cruelties in 695 and banished to the Chersonese by Leontius with his nose cut off, and hence his name of Rhinotmetus (ῥινότμητος), but who was restored to the throne together with his son Tiberius in 705, many innovations were introduced, the most notable of which is the bust of Christ holding the gospels and giving the benediction, with the legend ΔΝ. ΙΗΣ. ΧΗΣ. REX REGNANTΙΩΝ, and on the reverse the emperor holding a long cross with the title of ΣΕΡΓ. ΧΡΙΣΤΩ adopted by himself. On some of the coins the emperor holds a globe (on which is the word PAX), surmounted by a cross (Fig. 37; Sab. pl. xxxvii. No. 2). The former legend is generally found on the gold coins, but it sometimes occurs on the silver and copper, and it is always accompanied by the type of Christ represented in the four following ways:—

(1) Bust of Christ facing on a cross on the coins (Fig. 37) of Justinian II. Rhinotmetus (685-695) and on his coins, with his son Tiberius IV. after his restoration (705-711). From the reign of Leo III. the Isaurian (716-741), the first of the Iconoclasts, to that of Irene (797-802), all images of Christ, the Virgin, and Saints were abolished, though the legend IHSYS XPISZYC NIKAI without any image, as I have above shewn, was introduced during the reign of Constantine V. and his son Leo (751-775). The bust of Christ facing on a cross was again produced (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 1) on the coins of Michael I. Rhangabe (811-813), and after another interval of about 30 years, on those of (Sab. pl. xlv. No. 7) Michael III. and his mother Theodora (842-856), and on those of Michael III. (Sab. pl. xlv. No. 12) when reigning alone (856-866), but with the legend

IHSYS XPISZOC * . On a brass coin of Michael VII. Ducas (1071-1078; Sab. pl. li. No. 8) the bust of Christ on the cross occurs between two stars but without any legend.

(2) Bust of Christ facing on a cross with nimbus, from the reign of Constantine X. and Romanus II. (948-959) to that of Isaac I. Comnenus (1057-1059). The nimbus is generally adorned with gems. [Sab. pl. xli. No. 18; xlvii. Nos. 10-12, 17; xlviii. Nos. 10, 19, 20; xlix. Nos. 3, 5; l. No. 1.]

(3) Christ with nimbus cruciger seated facing, sometimes holding the right hand raised, from the reign of Basil I. and Constantine IX. (869-870) to that of Manuel I. Comnenus (1143-1180). [Sab. pl. xlv. No. 22; xlv. Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6, 12; xlix. Nos. 2, 4, 16, 17; l. Nos. 2, 6, 10; lvi. No. 3.] It was on the coins of this type (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 17) that Isaac I. Comnenus changed the type of the gold coinage of the empire, and impressed on it his own figure with a drawn sword in his right hand, thereby, as the Byzantine writers pretend, ascribing his elevation to the throne, not to the grace of God, but to his own courage (Finlay, Hist. of Byz. and Greek Empires, vol. ii. p. 12).

(4) Christ with nimbus cruciger standing facing on the coins (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 13) of Theodora (1055-1056). See Types of Virgin (j).

On a gold coin of Romanus I. Constantine X. and Christophorus (920-944), Christ is represented with a cross at the back of his head, standing crowning the emperor Romanus I. (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 10).

The type of Christ also occurs in the following various types, accompanied by the letters $\overline{\text{IC}}-\overline{\text{XC}}$ (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός):—

(5) Bust of Christ facing on a cross with nimbus.—The letters $\overline{\text{IC}}-\overline{\text{XC}}$ and this type first appear on the brass coins of John I. Zimisce (969-976), but with the addition in some cases of the word EMMANOVHA , and on the reverse + $\text{IHVS XPISTVS BASILEY BASILE}$ (Fig. 38; Sab. pl. xlviii. Nos. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8), and the attribution of these anonymous coins to John I. Zimisce is founded on a passage of Seylitzes and of Cedrenus, where it is said that "this emperor ordered to be placed upon the coins the image of the Saviour, which had not been done before, and on the other side Latin letters forming the sentence, $\text{IESVS CHRISTVS REX REGVM}$ " (Sab. vol. ii. p. 143), but this statement can only refer to these copper coins, as the bust of Christ occurs (as I have shewn (1)) on the coins of other metals of earlier dates. The same letters are sometimes connected with the word

6; lii. Nos. 18, 19; lviii. No. 18; lxiii. No. 1), a form of legend also occurring on the copper coins of Romanus IV. Diogenes (1067-1070), but here representing the bust of Christ without the cross or nimbus, and with three globules on either side of His head (Sab. pl. li. No. 3).

The type continues from the time of Theodora (1055-1056) to that of John VIII. Palaeologus (1423-1448). On some of his coins (Sab. pl. lxiii. Nos. 19, 20), as well as on those of his predecessor Manuel II. (Sab. pl. lxiii. Nos. 7, 9, 10), the bust of Christ is surrounded by stars or crosses with the legend $\overline{\text{OYXAPITI BACIAEC TΩ PΩMEΩN}}$ "By the grace of God, King of the Romans,"—equivalent to the Dei gratiā on our own coinage. It is sometimes accompanied by the legend KEROHOEI for Κυριε ΒΟΗΘΕΙ , as on the coins of Alexius I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. liii. No. 10), and Manuel I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lv. Nos. 5 and 10; lvi. No. 5).

(6) Christ with nimbus cruciger seated facing, on a brass coin of John I. Zimisce (969-976; Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 4) having on the reverse $\text{ISXS BASILE BASILI}$, and on a very rare brass coin of Constantine XIII. Ducas and Eudocia (1059-1067; Sab. pl. l. No. 9), and from the time of Michael VII. Ducas (1071-1078) to that of Andronicus IV. Palaeologus (1371-1373). [See under C. SAINTS and Fig. 41.]

The words KE. ROHOEI are sometimes added on the coins of Alexius I. and John II., whilst on some of Andronicus II. Palaeologus and Andronicus III. (1325-1328) the legend is in full KVPIE BOHOEI (Sab. pl. lxi. Nos. 14, 15).

On some of the coins of Michael VIII. (1261-1282; Sab. lix. Nos. 3-6), Christ with nimbus cruciger or nimbus is seated blessing the kneeling emperor, who is generally accompanied by the Archangel Michael.

(7) Christ with nimbus standing facing, sometimes crowning or blessing the emperor or emperors, on coins from the time of Michael VII. (1071-1078) to that of Andronicus II. and III. (1325-1328). [Sab. pl. li. Nos. 5, 18; lii. Nos. 16, 17 [with KE. ROHOEI], 20; liii. No. 18; lv. No. 2; lvii. Nos. 4, 5, 11; lx. Nos. 1-5, 13, 14; lxi. Nos. 7-9, 13.]

The letters $\overline{\text{IC}}-\overline{\text{XC}}$ occur on some coins of Alexius I. (Sab. pl. lii. No. 22) and Manuel I. (pl. lvi. No. 8), having for type a six-rayed cross on three steps.

B. THE VIRGIN.—The Virgin Mary is represented on the Byzantine coinage in various postures, generally accompanied by the letters $\text{MR}-\overline{\text{OY}}$ (Μήτηρ Θεοῦ);—

(a) Bust of Virgin veiled facing and hands raised, on coins of Leo VI. (886-912). In this instance we have the name MARIA in full as well as the letters $\text{MR}-\overline{\text{OY}}$ (Fig. 39; Sab. pl. xlv. No. 11).

(b) Bust of Virgin with nimbus facing and hands raised, first occurs (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 9) on the brass coins of Theophano (963) and on those (Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 9) of John I. Zimisce (969-976), and may also be found on the coins of many emperors down to the time of (Sab. pl. lxi. No. 5) Andronicus II. and Michael IX. (1294-1320).

On a coin of Constantine XII. Monomachus (1042-1055; Sab. pl. xlix., No. 12) the Virgin of Blachernae [M. PΛΑΚΕ6NITICA sic] is represented. Blachernae was a suburb of Constantinople, which was taken into the city under Heraclius, and the empress Pulcheria is said to have erected a temple to the Virgin called Ædes Blachernianae, which Justin I. restored. On account of the many miracles said to have been performed here, the temple and image were held in high esteem (Chron. Alex. ad ann. Heracl. xv. and xvii.; Ducange, Const. Christ. lib. i. c. xi.; Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. vol. xviii. p. 207; pl. vii. No. 10).

(c) Bust of Virgin with nimbus facing, holding a medallion of Christ on her chest, from the time of (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 18) John I. Zimisce (969-976) to that of (Sab. pl. li. Nos. 7, 9) Michael VII. Ducas (1071-1078), and sometimes accompanied by the legend OKE BOHOEI (θεοτόκε βοήθει, mother of God, help). In some cases the medallion rests on her chest whilst the hands are raised as on the coins of (Sab. pl. li. No. 17) Nicephorus III. (1078-1081), of (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 9-11, 21) Alexius I. Comnenus (1081-1118), and of (Sab. pl. liv. No. 14) John II. Comnenus (1118-1143). On the coin of John Zimisce there is the legend $\text{MEROY-DEDOEASM-OEISSEEL-PIZWHOY-CANOZ'K'}$, which appears to be $\text{Μήτηρ Θεοῦ δεδοξασμένη ὁ εἰς σε ἐπίζων οὐκ ἀπορεύεται Κυρίω, ὁ glorified mother of God, he that trusteth in thee shall not fail of the Lord.}$ (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. vol. xviii. p. 209; pl. vii. No. 11.)

(d) Bust of Virgin with nimbus within walls, on the coins of (Sab. pl. lix. No. 3) Michael VIII.

Palaeologus (1261-1282), of (Sab. pl. lx. Nos. 1-4) Andronicus II. Palaeologus (1282-1328), and of (Sab. pl. lx. Nos. 13, 14) Andronicus II. and his son Michael IX. (1294-1320).

The walls are those of Constantinople, and the type commemorates the restoration of the Greek emperors at Constantinople after it had been under the sway of the Latins for nearly fifty-eight years. Pachymer of Nicaea, who flourished during the reign of Michael VIII., records that "Michael, after the taking of Constantinople, changed the type of the old coins, engraving instead a representation of the city," but at the same time he debased the standard of the mint, and issued coins containing only 15 parts of gold and 9 of alloy (Pachymer, ii. 343; Finlay, Hist. of Byz. and Greek Empires, vol. ii. p. 436). The obverse type on his coins represents the emperor, presented by the archangel Michael, kneeling to Christ seated, or the emperor in prostration before Christ standing, or the two emperors blessed by Christ. [Types of Christ, (6), (7).]

(e) Virgin with nimbus seated facing, on coins of John II. Comnenus (1118-1143) but with the hands outspread (Sab. pl. liv. No. 13), of (Sab. pl. lv. No. 6; lvi. No. 4) Manuel I. Comnenus (1143-1180), and of (Sab. pl. lix. No. 5) Michael VIII. Palaeologus (1261-1282). (Sab. pl. lixiv.-lxvi.)

(f) Virgin with nimbus seated, holding medallion of Christ, from the time of Michael VII. Ducas (1071-1078) to that of Andronicus II. and Michael IX. (1294-1320). [Sab. pl. li. No. 5; lii. No. 1; liii. No. 18; liv. No. 1; lv. No. 11; lvi. No. 14; lvii. No. 15; lx. No. 16.]

(g) Virgin with nimbus standing, hands raised and medallion of Christ on her chest, on the coins of (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 8, 12) Alexius I. Comnenus (1081-1118), of (Sab. pl. lviii. No. 4) Andronicus I. Comnenus (1182-1185), all with ΚΕ. ΡΗΘΗΙ, and of (Sab. pl. lvii. No. 20; lviii. No. 5) Isaac II. Angelus (1185-1195). On some of the coins of Andronicus II. the Virgin holds the medallion with both hands (Sab. pl. lviii. Nos. 5, 11).

(h) Virgin with nimbus standing on a cushion holding the infant Christ, with nimbus cruciger, in her arms, on the gold and silver coins of (Sab. pl. i. Nos. 14, 15) Romanus IV. Diogenes (1067-1070). On these coins the legend ΠΑΡΘΕΝΕ COI ΠΟΛΥΑΙΝΕ OC ΗΛΠΙΚΕ ΠΑΝΤΑ ΚΑΤΟΡΘΟΙ (O glorious Virgin, he that trusteth in thee prospers in all things) forms an hexameter line. (Fig. 40.)

(i) Virgin with nimbus standing facing and hands raised or arms folded, from the time of (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 11) Constantine XII. Monomachus (1042-1055) to that of Alexius I. Comnenus (1081-1118). [Sab. pl. i. No. 7; li. No. 6; lii. No. 7.] On the coin of Constantine XII. there is the legend ΔΕΣΠΟΙΝΑ ΩΖΟΙC ΕΥΣΕΒΗ ΜΟΝΟΜΑΚΟΝ (Lady mayest thou preserve the pious Monomachus). On some specimens the words ΘΚΕ. ΡΗΘΗΙ occur.

On other coins the Virgin is represented side-faced as on those (Sab. pl. lvi. Nos. 12, 13) of Manuel I. Comnenus (1143-1180).

(j) Virgin with nimbus standing crowning emperor, sometimes half-length, on coins of (Sab. pl. lviii. No. 17) John I. Zimisce (969-976), on which, in addition to the letters ΜΘ above her head, there is added the legend ΘΕΟΤΟC. 6ΟΗΘ.

Ω ΔΕSP (mother of God help the Lord John) [A. CHRIST, No. 2], and from the time of Romanus III. Argyrus (1028-1034; Sab. pl. xlix. No. 2) to that of (Sab. pl. lv. Nos. 7, 12; lvi. Nos. 2, 3) Manuel I. Comnenus (1143-1180).

On gold coins of (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 12) Nicephorus II. Focas (963-969), and of (Sab. pl. lxvii. No. 1) John Angelus Comnenus, emperor of Thessalonica (1232-1234), the Virgin is represented half-length presenting a long cross to the emperor; on some of Michael VIII. Palaeologus (1261-1282; Sab. pl. lix. Nos. 10, 11) she is represented half-length holding the labarum on which

✠; and on a brass coin of (Sab. pl. lxii. No. 17) John V. Palaeologus (1341-1391), the Virgin and Emperor are shaking hands. On another (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 13) of Theodora (1055-1056), to which I have already alluded [A. CHRIST, No. 4], she is standing full-length with Theodora, both holding the labarum.

C. SAINTS.—The figure of a saint (generally standing) was first introduced by Michael VI. (1056-1057). The following are the saints and angels represented—St. Alexander, on a gold coin of Alexander (912-913; Sab. pl. xli. No. 3); St. Michael, on coins of Michael VI. (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 16) and of Isaac II. Angelus (Sab. pl. lvii. Nos. 15, 16, 17) and other emperors; St. Constantine, on coins of Alexius I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 16, 17); St. George, on coins of John II. Comnenus (Fig. 41; Sab. pl. liii. No. 15, [A. CHRIST, No. 6]), and other emperors; St. Theodore, on coins of Manuel I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lv. No. 2), &c.; St. Demetrius, on coins of Manuel I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lv. No. 9), &c.; St. Andronicus, on coins of Andronicus II. and III. (Sab. pl. lxi. No. 17); St. Eugenius, on the coins of the emperors of Trebizond (Sab. pl. lxvii.-lxx.; some on horseback); St. John, on the coins of John I. Axouchos, emperor of Trebizond (Sab. pl. lxvii. No. 9, bust facing; No. 10 standing); and some unknown.

The winged head or body of a seraph occurs on the brass coins of Andronicus I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lvii. Nos. 9, 10), of Andronicus II. and Michael IX. (Sab. pl. lx. No. 19; lxi. No. 11), and John III. Ducas emperor of Nicaea (Sab. pl. lxiv. No. 15) very similar in form to the seraphim engraved in the article ANGELS AND ARCH-ANGELS (§ 14).

On some coins of Romanus I. and II., Constantine X., Nicephorus Focas, John Zimisce, Basil II., Manuel I. Comnenus, and Alexius III., the initial letters of the names of these emperors are so placed as to form a cross (Sab. pl. i. Nos. 54-60, 63, 68, 69), in some cases, as on the coins of Romanus I. and II., taking the form of an anchor, whilst on those of Romanus IV., Alexius I. Comnenus, and Baudouin (Nos. 65, 67, 71), the initials are figured around a Maltese cross.

There are yet one or two curious pieces to which I must allude. During the reign of John I. Zimisce (969-976) some brass coins or tokens were issued (1) having on the obverse the bust of Christ with nimbus and the letters IC-XC, and on the reverse the legends ΩΤΔΝ - ΕΙΖΕΙΤΟΝ - ΣΠΕΝΗΤΑC - ΟΤΡΕΦΩΝ, and (2) on the obverse ΔΑ - ΝΕΙΖΕΙ - ΘΕΩ, and on the reverse ΘΕΛΕ - ΩΝΠΤΩ - ΧΟΝ, which may be interpreted Θεῷ δαυέλει τοὺς πένυτας ὁτρέφων and Δαυέλει Θεῷ ὁ ἐλέων πτωχόν (He that hath pity on the poor lendeth unto the Lord). Both are translations of the same Hebrew verse (Prov. xix. 17), and the latter is the exact translation of the LXX. These pieces have been published by Dr. Friedlaender (Num. Zeitschrift, vol. ii. Vienna, 1870); the first is in the collection of Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg, the second in the museum of Basle. Dr. Friedlaender remarks that "it is curious that the coins of smallest value are always those which remind the possessor to give them to the poor."

Another brass coin or medal with the legend ANACTACIC has also been attributed to this reign, but the piece is not above suspicion. (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 191.) [See MEDALS below.]

To the time of John II. Comnenus (1118–1143), according to the late Baron Marchant (Mé. de Num.), or to that of John V. Palaeologus (1341–1391), according to the late Mr. de Salis, and with greater probability, a most remarkable piece is attributed, of which the following is a description:—

Obv. The emperor with nimbus standing facing, holding cross and labarum (surmounted by cross) on which X.

Rev. The Magi worshipping and making offerings to the Virgin Mary, who holds a child in her lap. The Virgin wears the nimbus and is seated, raising her right hand. Between the Magi and the Virgin the letters ΕΥΛΟ ΑΕ. (Fig. 42.)

This piece, which is in the British Museum, is considered by Mr. Grueber to be undoubtedly genuine. The shape of the labarum is uncertain, but appears to be . The inscription is perhaps ΕΥΛΟΓΕΙΤΕ, or rather ΕΥΛΟΓΗΜΕΝΗ, which is not improbable, as the Virgin Mary was hailed by her cousin Elizabeth as "Blessed among women, and blessed the fruit of her womb" (εὐλογημένη σὺ ἐν γυναιξί, καὶ εὐλογημένος ὁ καρπὸς τῆς κοιλίας σου, Luke i. 42).

Another specimen of very similar reverse type, but having on the obverse the bust of Christ facing with nimbus and the legend EMMANVHL (sic) was formerly in the Pembroke Collection, and passing into the cabinet of the late Mr. Wigan, is now in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, who has published and engraved it in the new illustrated edition of Dr. Farrar's Life of Christ (p. 21, ed. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin). Mr. Lewis kindly sent me the piece to see, and I must confess that I am not altogether favourably impressed with its appearance. I may observe that Mr. Burgon the author of the Pembroke Sale Catalogue (p. 324) classed it among "early fabrications in copper bearing imaginary types," and stated that "the composition can hardly be regarded as genuine, but as the metal and surface are antique, it must (if false) have been produced by means of a punch and an engraving tool, principally by the former. The workers in Niello in Italy in the 15th century used their tools in a manner which is almost inconceivable." If, however, there is no doubt about the authenticity of the piece in the British Museum, we can hardly reject this one as spurious only on account of its composition.

The two birds (doves?) in the exergue of the reverse, Mr. Lewis (op. cit.) suggests may "delicately symbolise the purification." [See MEDALS, below.]

It may be, as Martigny has suggested (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 383), that medals or medallions of this description were frequently struck for suspending round the neck, as was done with some of the verres dorés with the same subject (Garrucci, Vetri, iv. No. 9).

The representation of the adoration of the Magi on both these pieces, especially on the latter, is somewhat similar to that on a fresco of the cemetery of Callistus engraved by Martigny (op. cit. l. c.), or to that on a fresco in the cemetery of St. Marcellinus, engraved by the Rev. W. H. Withrow (Catacombs of Rome, p. 306. 1877.) (Compare p. 1299.)

In conclusion I must record my thanks to Mr. H. A. Grueber, assistant in the Department of Coins and Medals, British Museum, for the trouble that he has had in superintending the casting of most of the coins here engraved, and for the readiness with which he has answered my numerous queries.

Passing from the Eastern Empire to Western Europe, we find that, from the reign of Honorius downwards, the gradual loss of territory to the Roman empire is marked by the introduction of new coinages issued by the barbarian invaders in place of that which proceeded from the imperial mints. In most cases, however, these new issues begin as mere imitations of the Western or Eastern imperial coins, and it is not till long subsequent to their acquisition of a country that the barbarian nations institute distinctly recognisable series of coins. The fact is, that the imperial coinage had been so long the coinage of the Roman world that it was only gradually that the Teutonic invaders conceived the possibility of substituting a separate coinage of their own. The length of time which often elapsed between the settling of these invaders in Roman territory and their first issue of a coinage on which the name of the emperor is replaced by that of a barbarian king, is exemplified in the case of the Visigoths, who under Astaulf in 410 established a kingdom in Aquitania, but who did not begin a national coinage until the reign of Leovigild (573), the first king of all Spain. Indeed Procopius complains of the audacity of the Frankish king (Theodebert), who for the first time ventured to strike gold coins "bearing his own portrait, not that of the emperor as was [heretofore] the [universal] custom;" and adds with slight exaggeration: "the king of the Persians, indeed, used to strike silver money of his own; but it was not lawful either for him or for any other barbarian king to make his gold coins with a portrait of the ruler." (Bell. Goth. iii. 33.) This was about the year 544.

It is obvious that this long period of imitation must have had a great effect upon the symbols of all kinds which appear upon coinages of the West, and accordingly we find that the Christian symbols upon these coins are generally taken directly from the money of Constantinople. We may divide the barbarian coinages of Western Europe from the accession of Honorius to that of Charlemagne into six distinct classes, struck respectively by:

(1) The Vandals in Africa from Huneric to the defeat of Gelimir at Trikameron, that is from 477 to 533.

(2) The Visigoths in Spain from Leovigild to the defeat of Roderic at the battle of Guadclata, from 573 to 711.

(3) The Ostrogoths in Italy from Theodoric, 493 to the battle of Mons Lactanus, 553. These were followed by:

(4) The Lombards, who include not only the Lombard kings at Pavia, but likewise the dukes of Benevento and Spoleto, who struck coins. The coinage of Pavia and Lucca lasted from the time of Aripert, 653, down to the conquest of the kingdom of Italy by Charles in 774; the coinage of Benevento continued till the death of Radechis in 955.

(5) The Merovingians, who began to strike coins about 544, under Theodebert, king of Austrasia, and continued their issue until a new coinage was introduced by the Karling dynasty.

(6) The English, who may have brought a coinage with them into this country, but who cannot with certainty be credited with a national issue until the time of Peada, a king of Mercia, about 655.

On the first and third of these six classes, the coins of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths, Christian symbols are curiously conspicuous by their absence. On the Vandal money none appears save upon some copper coins of doubtful attribution; on the money of the Ostrogoths the only exception is found in the large cross which appears upon the embroidered robe on the bust of Theodahat as displayed upon his copper coins, and in the crosses upon some nameless copper coins struck at Rome during the time of Ostrogothic rule, but not necessarily by the authority of the barbarians themselves.

Yet if we were inclined to attribute this want of Christian symbols to the Arian proclivities of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths, we should find that our conclusions were defeated by the money of Leovigild, the last Arian king of Spain. He seems to have adopted three types for his money, which, with little change, run through the whole series of the coinage of this dynasty. The first presents on the obverse the rude representation of a head or bust; on the reverse a cross haussee, or raised upon three steps, a type which was first introduced by Tiberius II. (574-582), and was probably adopted by Leovigild about the period of the second date. The engraved coin, which is one of Chintila, struck at Narbonne, will give an adequate idea of this type, for it is the peculiarity of this series that the style and fabric of its coins varies scarcely at all during the whole period of nearly a century and a half during which they continued to be struck. The obverse reads + CHINTILA REX; the reverse, NARBONA PIV[s]: the name of place of minting, Narbonne (Fig. 43).

This type of the cross haussee is the only one which can be distinctly recognised as Christian. But it is curious that the cross is not adopted upon the coins of Leovigild's catholic son San Hermengild. He adopts Leovigild's second type, which is also an imitative one, copied from the Victoria Augusta coins of Rome and Constantinople. The reverse represents a winged figure (Victory) walking to the right, and holding in her right hand a wreath. Around the usual Roman legend VICTORIA AVG is replaced by the name of the king, or an attempt at the legend INCLYTUS REX. (See Heiss, Mon. des Rois Wisigoths d'Espagne, pl. i. Nos. 1-3, and pl. ii. Nos. 1-3.) Now, though this coin is undoubtedly, as far as the origin of its type goes, of a pagan character, it is equally certain that it is impossible in the history of Christian iconography to separate accurately the Angel from the Victory or Niké of the Romans and Greeks; and there can be little doubt that the figure upon the Visigothic coins would have passed in these days and in popular estimation for an angel. The third characteristic type of the Visigothic coinage represents simply a rude bust on either side, and is devoid of any attempt at symbolism. In addition to the Christian types, we have on one coin of Leovigild the letters A ω, and on one of St. Hermengild the legend Regi A Deo Vita, an almost unique instance of pious instruction upon a Visigothic coin.

The Lombards may lay claim to more originality than the Visigoths, in that, upon their pieces, a most undoubted angel is portrayed, with a legend shewing that he is intended to represent the Archangel Michael. The engraving

The later Lombardic coins abandon the type of St. Michael and adopt for their reverses either a flower pattern, or else the cross potent, having one limb longer than the other three. Those of the dukes of Benevento, who form a lesser branch of the Lombards in Italy, imitate more closely the contemporary coinage of Constantinople, generally displaying on the obverse the bust of the duke facing, and on the reverse the long cross potent and haussee upon three steps, known under this form as the Byzantine cross. (See Fig. 53.) The coins likewise bear not infrequently the legend SAN MICHALIS, although only in one instance do they display the image of the archangel.

We now turn to the coinage of the Franks, which, as has been said, begins with Theodebert, the second king of Austrasia, the son of Thierry, and grandson of Clovis. Dating from an earlier period than the last two series, the imitative character of the Frankish money is much more apparent than that of the Visigothic or Lombardic coinages. All the types of Theodebert are borrowed directly from Constantinople with no change but the substitution of the Merovingian's name upon the obverse. The most common, as also the most Christian, type is that given in the engraving (Fig. 45), and is taken from the contemporary coinage of Justinian. It affords a good example of a Victory which has just passed through the transitional stage and become an angel, while the legend on the reverse VICTORIA AVGGGA still remains to betray its origin. The attitude of the figure upon these coins, or on those of Justinian, may be compared with that of an angel which is carved in ivory upon a beautiful consular diptych of this epoch, now in the British Museum.

As time went on a change takes place in the Merovingian money, which is not paralleled in that of any other country of Europe. Not only does it depart more and more from the imperial type, but a coinage bearing the name of no king, only that of the moneyer who struck it, and of the town where it was minted, is introduced alongside the regal issue. It seems probable that the Frankish kings never asserted the right of exclusive coinage; but, on the contrary, that it was within the faculty of almost any local goldsmith to strike these coins for particular or local purposes. There is no reason to believe, as has been thought by some, that this non-regal money was issued by the authority of a religious see or order. Most of the later Merovingian coins, whether royal or not, are of the kind known as trientes or tremisses, one-third, that is, of the solidus aureus. Their type generally displays a head upon the obverse, and on the reverse a cross of some sort. Two coins of the royal issue with rather peculiar symbols are engraved beneath, Figs. 46 and 47. The first which was struck by Charibert II. (630-631) reads:

Obv. TEVDOSVS (Theodosius?) MONETA. Bare head to right.

Rev. CHARIBERTVS RE. Figure, probably a chalice surmounted by a cross (Conbrouse, Monnaies Nationales de France, pl. 22). The second is a coin of Clovis or Chlodvig II. (638-656).

Obv. CLOTHOVICHVS R. Helmeted bust to right.

Rev. MONETA PALAT I. Cross haussee, and terminating in open chrisms. On either side of cross ELI GI (Conbrouse, Mon. Nat. de France, pl. 18). The Eligius, whose name appears upon this rare and interesting piece, is St. Eloi, the treasurer of Dagobert I. and Clovis II., who before his elevation to this post had been a goldsmith and moneyer under Clotaire II. (See Life of St. Eloi, by St. Ouen in D'Achéry's Spicilegium, vol. ii. p. 76.)

A great variety is observable in the symbols displayed upon the Merovingian coins, though they are nearly always of a religious character. The most common device is a short square even-limbed cross, which rests sometimes upon a step or ball. The Christian monogram appears, but is not common. The two unusual and interesting types given here (Figs. 48 and 49) represent a Calvary, on either side of which a man is standing, and a monstern raised upon three steps. They are taken respectively from a silver coin of Le Mans and a gold triens of Angers (Conbrouse, o. c. Types Mérov. pl. iv. Nos. 16 and 24).

Of the coinages whereof we have been speaking, the Vandalic and Ostrogothic belong to the period which preceded the introduction of the genuine barbaric gold coinage into Europe, and are—with the exception of a few coins which display the monogram of Theodoric—coinages in silver and copper only. The money of the Visigoths, the Lombards, and the Franks, which are more distinctly national and barbarian issues, are almost as exclusively coinages in gold; for when the invaders obtained full possession of a Roman province they seem nearly to have discarded the use of silver coins. In our own country, on the other hand, and probably also in the region of the Lower Rhine, a silver coinage was almost the only currency, and if some of the gold tremisses—or, as they were called here, thryms—found their way across the Channel, their appearance must be regarded as quite exceptional. This fact forms a marked contrast between the coinage of England and that of the greater part of continental Europe. The silver coins which were in use in England before the rise of the Karling dynasty were the scattas, small and thick pieces, weighing some nineteen or twenty grains: in the north however, that is, in the countries of Bernicia and Deira, a copper coin, the styca, supplied the place of the sceatt. Some few of the sceattas bear the names of known sovereigns, and in that case their date is of course determinable. The earliest piece of this description bears in runic letters the name of Paeda, a son of Penda, king of Mercia, who reigned about 655. The greater part of these early coins however are without intelligible legend. They bear a few letters of the Roman character, which seem to have been nothing but rude and ignorant copies of the legend upon some imperial coin. Their types are so numerous that a detailed description of them is impossible; but the reader may consult the plates in Ruding's Annals of the Coinage, and in Hawkins's English Silver Coins, 2nd ed. A great majority of these sceattas have one or more crosses upon the field, and this fact has led numismatists to infer that those pieces upon which no such symbol occurs were struck before the conversion of the English to Christianity. M. Dirks (Revue de la Num. Belge, 5th series, vol. ii.), who has devoted special attention to this class of coins, has gone further than this, and signalled some types as bearing a distinctly heathen character, the head of Wodin, the Fenriswulf, the sea monster Jormundgandr, &c. On this point it is difficult to pronounce with certainty. It is extremely probable that most of the sceattas were copies, more or less remote, of Roman coins; Mr. Hawkins in his Cuerdale Find has given an instance of an undoubted copy separated by a distance of nearly five hundred years from its original; therefore neither the presence nor absence of Christian symbols upon these nameless pieces can be taken as conclusive evidence of the time at which they were first issued.

The earliest known coin among the stycas merits particular notice. It was struck by Egfrith, king of Northumbria (670-685), and bears upon the reverse a radiate cross, with the legend + LVX or, as we may perhaps read it, LVX x (Lux Christus, Christ is [my] light). (See Silver Coins of England, 2nd ed. No. 99, and Ruding, Annals, vol. iii. pl. 28 ap.) This king, who is called "rex religiosus" by the biographer of St. Wilfred, appears to have been in his earlier days a great friend of religion and of the archbishop of York. The types of the subsequent Northumbrian stycas is a small cross on one or both sides enclosed by the legend, without further ornamentation or symbolism.

Towards the end of the 8th century, and after the rise of the Karling dynasty upon the continent, pennies superseded the sceattas in the central and southern districts of England, while stycas and some sceattas continued to be coined in the north. The penny usually displays a cross upon the reverse, and this cross is treated in curious ornamental devices; but the coin is without any other religious symbolism. Types of the early English penny may be found in the works of Hawkins and Ruding.

Beside the royal money, coins were struck by the archbishops of York and Canterbury, by the former stycas, by the latter pennies. The earliest of these episcopal coins seems to have been struck by Egberht, archbishop of York, from 730 to 766, conjointly with his brother Eadberht, king of Northumbria. One side reads

ECGBERHT[AR?]. Figure standing between two long processional crosses. The figure seems to wear a sort of three-cornered hat, which may very probably be intended for a mitre. The other side reads EOTBERHTVS, and represents a figure standing (Hawkins (102), p. 67, and Ruding, iii. 3; the engraving in the latter, however, is very faulty).

The other archbishops of York of whom we have coins are, Eanbald, 780 to 796; Vigmund 831 to 854; and Ulfhere, 854 to 895. These coins, which are stycas, follow in type those of the contemporary Northumbrian kings, as described just now.

The archbishops of Canterbury, whose pennies resemble in type those of the kings of Kent, and subsequently those of the kings of England, are Jaenberht, 763 to 790; Ethilheard, 790 to 803; Wulfheard, 803 to 830; Ceolnoth, 830 to 870; Ethered, 871 to 890; Plegmund, 891 to 923.

We have said that when the Karling dynasty came into power it introduced a new coinage of silver to supersede the old Merovingian gold money; and the latter began from that time rapidly to disappear. Pepin the Short struck denarii or pennies of a new pattern and fabric, bearing no resemblance either to the current gold coinage or to the older denarii of Rome. In 781, we find a decree of Charles the Great ordering that the new denarii shall be current throughout the Frankish kingdom; and from this time it would appear that the coining of gold almost ceases in western Europe. The types of this money of Pepin and Charles are as rude as they are original. All attempt at a face or bust is for the most part abandoned: sometimes nothing but an inscription is given on either side, but generally the name of the king is displayed in a monogram disposed round the four limbs of a cross, somewhat like the monogram of the word Roma in the figure 51. Generally, too, a cross occupies the centre of the reverse, a cross of a somewhat new shape. It is the cross pattée which from this time becomes almost universal upon European coins, a small even-limbed cross slightly broadening towards its extremities. "We must observe the position of the cross. It has its limbs of equal length, and they are slightly patté at the ends; the cross is aloisé, and detached, its limbs not touching the circle which surrounds the field and separates the legend. A cross of this description only appears quite accidentally upon the Roman money of the preceding centuries; it appears occasionally on the Merovingian coins; it became common, and at length indispensable on those of the Carolingians, and no other sort was used" (Lelewel, Num. du Moyen Age, tom. i. p. 87; see Fig. 13). After his conquest of Italy, and for the use of that country, Charles seems to have struck coins bearing his bust, represented like that of the Roman emperors. He also introduced a very important type, which became common upon the coins of many succeeding emperors. It represents, probably, the front of the basilica of St. Peter with the legend XRISTIANA RELIGIO (Fig. 50). Fig. 51 a coin engraved by Conbrouse, which is supposed to have been struck either to commemorate the restitution of Adrian I. to his rights and the assumption by Charles of the titles king of Italy and patrician of Rome, or else to commemorate Charles's crowning as emperor on the famous Christmas of 800, is of doubtful authenticity. Both these coins are silver denarii (Combrousse, pl. 162). Fig. 52 also represents a type which is peculiar to Charlemagne (Lelewel, i. 88). The double triangle is of course a Christian type, the triangle being a symbol of the Trinity. But it is also, as Solomon's seal, a type frequently in use among the Arabs, and is to be met with upon coins of the 'Abbāsee dynasty as early as 783 (Tiesenhausen, Mon. des Khalifes Or. p. 108, No. 997).

In the time of Charlemagne we have also to notice the beginning of a papal coinage. The rare coins of Adrian I. were probably struck subsequently to the overthrow of the Lombardic kingdom in 774. They are denarii, and represent the bust of the pope, facing, in a style copied from the coinage of Constantinople (Fig. 53). The legend is HADRI ANVS P* P*; on either side of head, I B.

REV. VICTOR IA DNN. Long cross haussée on two steps, and having three limbs potent, called also a Byzantine cross; on either side R (M); in exergue CONOB. (See Lelewel, o. c. tom. i. p. 116.) The above is probably the oldest papal coin. Lelewel attributes one uncertain piece to Deodatus as early as the 6th century; and Fig. 54 has by some numismatists been considered the proof of a coin of Gregory II. (715-731). In spite of the GRE II, however, this attribution is extremely doubtful. With the exception of these rare papal coins, and of the coins which continued to be struck by the dukes of Beneventum down to the middle of the 10th century, Charlemagne's denarii formed the coinage of western continental Europe (Fig. 55). In our country the introduction of these denarii was followed by the substitution of the penny for the scætt, whereby, with a change of form and a slight change of weight, the coinage of England was brought into harmony with that of the continent. The shape of the cross is approached to that on the money of Charlemagne, that is to say it is now generally an even-limbed cross occupying the centre of the coin, and rather a definite part of its structure than a mere symbol. In fact, from this time forward throughout Europe the general tendency of the coinage is to assume an architectural design, and following the same impulse, the cross upon it becomes architectural rather than pictorial. [C. F. K.]

It is probable that the earliest coins of Venice belong also to this period. In the Numismatica Veneta, o serie di monete e medaglie dei Dogi di Venezia (Venezia, Giuseppe Grimaldo tip. calc. editore), 1856, indeed accounts and figures are given of the coins of ten doges who ruled in Venice from A.D. 697-827; but many of these earlier pieces are admitted by the author to be forgeries, and all labour under grave suspicion. The type of the coins published as genuine is, in nearly every case, a cross sometimes neatly, sometimes rudely formed, the limbs of which are nearly equal, being occasionally of the Maltese type. It occurs either at the head of the legend, or in the centre of the coin, or in both one and the other on the money of Paoluccio Anafesto (697-717), Marcello Tegalliano (717-726), Teodato Ipato (726-737), Galla Gaulo (755-756), Domenico Monegario (756-764), Giovanni Galbajo, false, (787-804), Obeleiro Antenoreo, false, (804-810), Angelo Partecipazio (810-827). Some deniers attributed to the last-named doge are, however, undoubtedly genuine. They are of the temple type of Fig. 50, bearing upon one side a cross with an obscure legend, PSCV SERVA ROMANO IMP, of which no interpretation is proposed by the editor, possibly standing for Perpetuum securum serva Romanorum imperium; and on the other side a temple, as on coins of Charlemagne and Louis le Débonnaire, with legend, XPE (Christe) SALVA VENECIAS. This money (of which there is a specimen in the British Museum) is believed to have been struck at the time when the Venetians concluded a peace with Charlemagne, after the discomfiture which they inflicted on Pepin, A.D. 810.

Coins with the legend CRISTUS IMPER, and of a degraded form of the temple type, though ascribed by Schweitzer (Serie delle monete e medaglie d'Aquileja e di Venezia, Trieste, 1848) to the very beginning of the 9th century are, almost without doubt, of a much later date.

MEDALS.

Medals, as the word is commonly used by English writers,^a designate objects in metal which resemble coins in general appearance, but which were not made to pass as money. More usually they bear devices on both sides, but occasionally on one side only (plaques). Medals may commemorate events or persons, or may be used for purposes of devotion, or as charms, or be employed for ornamental purposes, being inlaid in Christian ecclesiastical furniture of various kinds. But as they are commonly classed under Numismatics, this article would not be complete without some notice of the few Christian medals which have come down to us from the period embraced in this work. The following are the principal subjects represented:—

(1) Christ as the Good Shepherd. A bronze medallion ($4\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter) of rough work (di rozza maniera) has this most ancient subject of Christian art on both sides. On the obverse the Shepherd (without nimbus) is turned to the left, dressed in a tunic, with buskins on his legs, the feet bare, his right hand placed on his head, his left hand resting on a staff upon the ground; his right heel leans on his left instep. On either side is a tree, considered by Buonarrotti to be a palm, by Perret (with perhaps better reason) to be an olive; in the middle a sheep (of small size). The Shepherd is here sad, going in search of the 'lost sheep, intended to be represented in the distance. The reverse has two trees nearly as before, but the Shepherd (turned to the left as before) now holds no staff, but the sheep (of much larger size) across his shoulders, holding two of its legs by either hand. This medal has been gilt.

Found in the Catacombs of Rome. Described and figured by Buonarrotti, Osservazioni sopra alcuni frammenti di vasi antichi di vetro, pp.

^a Gibbon however often speaks of coins as medals; so also the French writers in general style them médailles. English and French writers alike use medallion for either a coin or medal of large size.

24-28, tav. iv., and after him by Perret, Catacombes de Rome, vol. vi. p. 118, and vol. iv. pl. xvii. nos. 5 and 7. Perhaps of the 3rd or 4th century.

There are other bronze medals exhibiting Christ as the Good Shepherd. One, now in the Vatican Museum, having a design on one side only, gives him (without nimbus) standing to the right beneath a tree (mistico olivo, De Rossi); a dog near his feet looking up: in the landscape at different heights are seen seven sheep, standing, lying down, feeding or playing; another tree halfway up the landscape on the other side. Diameter $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches, with a ring for suspension. Considered by De Rossi to be not later than the 3rd century (Bullett. Arch. Crist. 1869, p. 42, tav. n. 1). He quotes (p. 39) Marini's MS. description of another most interesting medal of this class, formerly in the collection of Cardinal Stefano Borgia, but which he has in vain endeavoured to trace. "Velitris in Museo Borgiano in orbiculo aereo incuso in antica parte capita se invicem respiciens SS. Petri et Pauli et litterae PETRVS PAVLVVS, supra ✠, infra duae aviculae bibentes: in postica stat pastor dextra innexus pedo, sinistra ostentans fistulam, ad pedes canis dominum respiciens, hinc inde oves et inscriptio—

as."

A variety of scenes from the Old and New Testament is combined in the following thin bronze plaque, which Buonarrotti suspects was intended for a processional cross; it would be suitable enough for insertion into a pastoral staff; but was probably made for neither the one nor the other in the first instance; a casket is at least as likely to have had it thereon. Christ, as the Good Shepherd, in the centre bearing a sheep, two other sheep are at his feet. About him, in four compartments, are the following nine subjects taken from the Old Testament, having (or supposed to have) some connexion with the Saviour (see Buonarrotti, u. s. pp. 1-3).

In the first one: (a) Adam and Eve; (b) Noah in the Ark, welcoming the dove; (c) Jonah resting under a gourd.

In the second: (d) The Sacrifice of Abraham; (e) Daniel in the Lions' Den.

In the third: (f) Moses striking the Rock; (g) Samson bearing the gates of Gaza.

In the fourth: (h) Jonah swallowed up by the whale; (i) Jonah vomited up by the whale.

Diameter, $1\frac{1}{4}$ inch. Found in the cemetery of St. Pontianus; first published by Ciampini, De duobus Emblem., p. 4, Rom. 1691, then by Buonarrotti (u. s. tav. 1), from which an enlarged copy is given in Perret, Catacombes, vol. vi. p. 120 and vol. iv. pl. xx. n. 7. It does not appear where this most interesting monument now is. To judge from the figures it would seem to be very ancient, perhaps even as early as the 3rd century (Fig. 56).

The Good Shepherd appears in fine (as it would seem) on one side of a medal described below.

(2) Portraits of Christ.—These are not found upon coins till the reign of Justinian Rhinotmetus (685-711), and it is by no means clear that all the medals which have them are not later still. The earliest in all likelihood, and certainly the most important, is a massive plaque of gold, on one side of which the face of the Saviour in low relief is represented in the centre, the eyes being formed by garnets or by pastes in imitation of them. Around it in six compartments is the chrisma formed of X and R (not P), and from the transverse bar of the cross are suspended α and ω . "Ces lettres sont découpées à jour." Ornaments in the centre are formed of enamel, cloisonnés. Reverse plain. Diam. 63 mill.; weight 39 grammes. Acquired in 1855 for the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, having been found a few years previously at Linon in the department of Puy-de-Dôme. Referred to the Merovingian period by M. Chabouillet (Catal. des Camées, &c., n. 2711, p. 402). Three holes in the margin shew that it had been used for insertion into some piece of ecclesiastical furniture.* See under n. 3.

(3) Infant Saviour adored by the Magi.—Three medals on which this subject is represented are known, and there has been much controversy about the age of one of them; none of them can be earlier than the 5th century, and all may probably be much later, perhaps even lower than the period embraced in this work.

(a) Obv. Bust of the Saviour, with circular nimbus, between two stars (i. e. seen in heaven), holding a wreath in each hand, crowns two saints (without nimbus) in long drapery, each holding a long cross in one hand, and holding up the other towards another larger long cross between. On one side of this cross is α , and on the other ω . A boy, holding a candle (an oblate) on the left, approaches one of the saints: folds of drapery on each side the coin indicate a ciborium in the apse of a church in which the scene is placed. Rev. The Virgin (without nimbus) seated on high chair to right, a stool before her; on her lap the infant Saviour (with circular nimbus), before them three magi standing in short drapery, each holding a round object in his hand; above the Saviour is a short cross (approaching in form to the Maltese); higher up a dove holds a branch; above the middle magus is a star. $\mathcal{A}$ $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch; figures in intaglio. Space below exergual line on both sides empty. In the Vatican. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 55, tav. n. 9.) The composition of the Saviour crowning the saints is compared by De Rossi to that in the apse of the church of SS. Primo and Feliciano in Rome (A.D. 645), figured by Ciampini; he inclines to place the medal in the 6th or 7th century.

work. In the Vatican. The composition of the obverse is compared by De Rossi with that of a mosaic of St. Michael in Ravenna, A.D. 545; he thinks it earlier than the 8th century, from which time he finds no medals with figures in intaglio (u. s. pp. 55, 56, tab. n. 10). This and the preceding were referred to the age of the Comneni by Marangoni, who wrongly considered them as money (see De Rossi, u. s.), but he may perhaps not have erred greatly as to their age. A coin, having an emperor on one side, supposed by Mr. Madden to be John Comnenus, or John Palaeologus, is described and figured in the Num. Chron. 1878, p. 194, pl. x. n. 10, which has a similar reverse with the adoration of the (three) magi, but they are here kneeling; the Virgin alone has a circular nimbus [p. 1295].

(c) Obv. EMMANVIL (sic). Bust of the Saviour, full faced, draped, with cruciform nimbus; each limb of the cross double, enclosed in a circle. Rev. Virgin seated to left, the Child on her lap: star above; three magi standing before them with offerings; below exergual line two birds (doves?) (E. nearly 1 inch). Collection of Rev. S. S. Lewis, formerly in the Pembroke Cabinet (Catal. Pemb. Coll. [by Burgon], p. 324 (1848). Figured in Pemb. Plates, iii. t. 115 (1746); Farrar's Life of Christ, p. 21 (reproduced here, fig. 57); Num. Chron. 1878, p. 194, pl. x. n. 11. An example of this medal was formerly in the possession of Pasqualini, who corresponded in 1601 with Peirese about it; the latter thought it no older than John Zimisce, and regarded it as a piece of his money, being herein followed by Ducange, Banduri, and Eckhel.² Pasqualini perceived that it was a medal, and placed its antiquity much higher. It came into the Kircherian Museum, but has been since lost; but a drawing by Ménétrier made in 1629 (which we now perceive to be about three times the size of the original), was reproduced in 1869 by De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, n. 5. The latter considers the piece of the second half of the 5th century, or of the first half of the 6th. He thinks that the money ascribed to John Zimisce (969-976), which bears so great a resemblance to this medal on the obverse,³ was derived from an earlier prototype; if so, it may have been taken from this very medal. But on the whole it seems much more probable that the medal belongs to the same general period as the copper money of Zimisce, who first placed the portrait of the Saviour thereon; the nimbus on both (cruciform with double limbs enclosed in a circle) seems to be more artificial and later than that which surrounds the Saviour on the money of Justinian II., in whose reign it appears for the first time upon the gold coinage. This later nimbus, however, is somewhat earlier upon coins than Zimisce, being found on the gold money of Constantine X., of Romanus I. and Romanus II., of Nicephorus II. (Focas), and of Basil II. (Sabat. Monn. Byz. pl. xlvii. nos. 4, 6, 12, 18; pl. xlvii. 10, 12). For other notices of this medal, see Mamachi, Orig. et Ant. Christ. tom. i. p. 237, tab. i. fig. 9 (Ed. Matranga, Rom. 1846); * and Martigny, Diet. Ant. Chrét. s. v. Mages, who also refers to a plaque of bronze nearly like it, published in the Athénée Française (Févr. 1856, p. 9), by M. Edmond Le Blant. This precious disk, of repoussé work, used as an inlaid ornament, is now in the Christian Museum of the Vatican Library (De Rossi, u. s. p. 37).

(4) Portraits of Apostles.—The heads of Peter and Paul occur facing on a famous bronze medal, said to have been found by Boldetti in the Catacombs, which has commonly been thought to be very ancient* (see under PETER

* The example seen by Hardouin was in the possession of Card. Boncompagni; Mamachi does not say where the medal which he saw was preserved.

In connexion with this medal two others of bronze, formerly in the Vettori Museum, may be named, about whose age little can be said with confidence, except that both are late. They may probably be later than the 9th century, and if so, do not concern the present work. Yet a short notice may not be unwelcome under the doubtful circumstances. Both have on the obverse the full face of the Saviour with cruciform nimbus enclosed in a circle, which is of the same general character as that on the coins of John Zimisce. One has on the reverse the legend ANACTACIO and a building with a dome, the door open, on either side of which is a soldier asleep ($\frac{1}{4}$ inch). Figured in Mamachi (Orig. et Ant. Christ. t. i. p. 287; Matranga's edition, after Vettori, Numm. aereus Vet. Christ. p. 47). Tanini, who describes this piece from a specimen in the collection of Card. Borgia, places it after the coins of Constantine (Suppl. ad Band. p. 280), and thinks it may have been struck when Constantine built the basilica of the Anastasis on the site of the Holy Sepulchre. But the style of work renders this supposition impossible; Eckhel (D. N. V. t. viii. p. 251) is disposed to class it to John Zimisce. De Rossi (u. s. p. 58) thinks it is struck for pilgrims as a memorial of their visit to the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. For the controversies to which this medal has given rise, see De Rossi, u. s. and Madden, Num. Chron. 1878, p. 192. The other has on the reverse the baptism of Christ by John in the Jordan, who standing on the bank pours water on His head as He is immersed in the river up to the middle; above is the dove; the legend around is REDENTIO FILII HOMINVM. with IORDA in exergue. 1 inch. Figured after Vettori by Mamachi, u. s. t. i. p. 240, who regards it as a vetus monumentum; "quo tamen tempore elaboratum fuerit, ne suspicari quidem possum." De Rossi, having examined this specimen, now in the Vatican Library, is unable to form "un giudizio sull'età e sull'arte di questa medaglia," and is inclined to suspect its genuineness.

There are two unimportant tokens referred to the reign of Zimisce, one of which has the bust of Christ as before on the obverse, accompanied by IC XC, and on the reverse ΘΩΔΑΝΙ | ΕΙΖΕΙΤΟΝ | ΣΠΕΝΗΤΑC | ΙΟΤΡΕΦΩΝ (Prov. xix. 17). The other has on obverse ΔΑ | ΝΕΙΖΕΙ | ΘΩ, and on the reverse, ΟΕΛΕ | ΩΝΠΤΩ | ΧΟΝ, which is exactly the rendering of the same passage in the LXX. These pieces have been published by Dr. Friedländer (Num. Zeitschrift, vol. ii. Vienna, 1870), and from him by Mr. Madden (Num. Chron. 1878, p. 193).

* The beautiful figure given by Brownlow and Northcote led the writer (see vol. i. p. 733, note) perhaps too hastily to suspect that it was of the age of the Renaissance, as it bears little resemblance to any medallion of ancient Roman art which he remembers to and PAUL). Another bronze medal with the same heads inscribed with their names and various accessories is mentioned above under n. 1. A third of the same metal in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, (2½ inches) engraved by Perret, bears the same heads, but in a different style, having the chrisma between them (Catacombes, vol. ii. on title-page). A small oblong medal or plaque in the Vatican of rude work, having a neck-like loop pierced for suspension, gives the head of St. Paul in intaglio with legend SCS PAVLVVS (De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, with figure). Age uncertain, probably late (id. p. 56).

(5) Representations of other Saints.—Among the few of this class which can be recognised is St. Laurence (Fig. 58), who is represented as being broiled on a gridiron, with his feet held by an executioner behind; in front sits a Roman officer bearing a staff, with an officer standing at his feet; above the head of the saint is the chrisma (P), and above his body is seen his soul rising upward in human form (see Martigny, Dict. s. v.; Anc. ed. 2, 1877). It is crowned by the hand of God appearing above, between Alpha and Omega. The reverse has an oblate (?) bearing a candle, approaching a cancellated structure, arched, but open above, which is probably intended for the tomb of St. Laurence. The legend SVCCESSA VIVAS occurs on both sides, she being the person for whom the medal is made; it has a loop above, shewing that it was intended for suspension. This lead medal, formerly in the Vettori Museum, now in the library of the Vatican, is in intaglio (1½ inches); it is a cast from a bronze, probably of the 5th century, described by Ménétrier (De Rossi, u. s. pp. 33–37, tav. n. 8). Other medals are found with figures of saints either at full length or the bust only, about which little can be said with certainty. One (perforated) has a head seen in front on the obverse, the reverse bearing the ordinary chrisma with α and ω in the angles. Probably of the 4th or 5th century. Bronze, nearly 1 inch (De Rossi, u. s. p. 41, n. 6). Another has the Saviour at length with circular nimbus between two other figures (Peter and Paul?), one of which has a staff on his shoulder terminated by the chrisma with legend ZOSIME VIVAS; the other side has a shepherd between trees, with staff, dog behind. Æ. 1½ inches (Id. u. s. tav. n. 4). De Rossi is probably right in thinking that the Saviour here commissions the two great apostles to preach the gospel; he holds something (perhaps a volume) in one hand towards one of them (see De Rossi, u. s. pp. 43–45). Probably about the 5th century. Another (p. 45, tav. n. 2) gives two figures (a woman with uplifted hands talking to a man, the chrisma above, and on the other side three men. Æ. 1½ inches. These are suspected by De Rossi to be intended for St. Felicitas and her seven children, martyred along with her; and to have been struck in Rome in their honour. Perhaps about the same age as the preceding.

have seen or read of. A tin-foil impression obtained at his request by the Rev. H. R. Bailey from the original by the courtesy of M. De Rossi, was unfortunately much injured, and does not enable him either to confirm or remove his suspicion. The diameter of the medal is 3 inches.

above, n. 5. A small piece (described by Marini) with reversed chrisma (X) in circle on one side and VINA | NTII in two lines on the other. Æ. ⅝ inch (De Rossi, p. 43, tav. n. 6), the other side blank. Another (perforated) found in a locus in Aringhi's time, has the ordinary chrisma. Æ. 1 inch (De Rossi, u. s. p. 43, engraved at p. 44, n. 3). Another, a plaque with loop for suspension, has the chrisma between Γ and Λ , LEO being in a line below (i. e. in Christo Leo). Æ. 1½ inches. In the Kircherian Museum (De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, n. 6, and p. 39). These pieces may probably be of the 4th century or a little later.

(7) Cross.—A bronze piece (perforated), irregular in form, about 1 inch in diameter; has on one side a Latin cross, at the feet of which are the α and ω in silver, incised and worked in niello (incise e niellate in argento). Museum of the Vatican. Not earlier than the 5th century, perhaps much later (De Rossi, u. s. p. 43, engraved p. 44, n. 4). Crosses of various forms are also figured as accessories on other medals, see under n. 3.

From the Old Testament we have a few scenes, such as the following:—

(8) Sacrifice of Abraham.—A plaque, representing Abraham and Isaac on the top of Mount Moriah, between trees; an angel looks down from heaven. An animal (meant for a ram) behind Abraham. The style is peculiar, apparently very ancient. 1½ inch, bronze. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 40, tav. n. 3.) The same subject is repeated on a badly preserved bronze medal, which has a loop for suspension, where Isaac kneels before Abraham, who holds a knife; a ram is behind him; the legend above (now remaining) is VREICVS. The other side represents a male figure in long drapery, presenting a chalice before an altar on which are three lights, the slab being supported by spiral columns on a frame; behind him an oblate; the legend is GAUDENTIANVS. De Rossi explains the medal thus: Urbicus devotes his son Gaudentianus to the service of God or one of the saints, possibly to St. Laurence; Abraham would resemble Urbicus in offering his son to God. He thinks the medal was struck about A.D. 400. (De Rossi, u. s. pp. 49, 50, tav. n. 5.)

(9) Daniel in the Lions' Den.—A plaque with this device is figured by Venuti among the medallions of the Albani Museum (Ant. Num. Mus. Mod. Mus. Albani, t. ii. p. 119). Now in the Vatican. De Rossi regards it as an ornament for furniture (u. s. p. 37). See also under n. 1, where this and other subjects from the Old Testament are figured as accessories.

Of the preceding medals those which bear the figure of Christ as the Good Shepherd are in all likelihood the oldest; and these (or some of them) may probably be earlier than Constantine; the greater part perhaps of the others may be referred to the 4th and 5th centuries; all those, however, that bear the portrait of Christ with cruciform nimbus are later, perhaps very much later.

M. De Rossi, who above all others has contributed to the knowledge of Christian medals, quotes a passage from the Acts of St. Germanus of Auxerre, in which it is said that after Geneviève had consecrated herself to God in perpetual virginity (circa A.D. 429), the saintly bishop suspended a bronze medal (nummus aereus), bearing a cross, "quasi quoddam pignus religiosi muneris, atque ut perforatus collo ejus inhaereret indixit" (Bolland. Acta SS. 1 Jan. p. 143, in De Rossi, u. s. p. 57; see also Chiflet, Anast. Child. Regis, pp. 184, 185, 276). No other clear allusion to Christian medals of devotion has hitherto, it is believed, been adduced from ancient authors.

But the fathers, SS. Athanasius, Augustine and Chrysostom, condemn the superstitious use of amulets, which prevailed in their age among some Christians; the last of whom mentions that bronze medals of Alexander of Macedon were attached to the head and feet as charms (Ad illuminand. Catech. ii. 5); now De Rossi (who refers to these authors) mentions a bronze medal, published by Vettori, preserved in the Vatican Library, bearing on the obverse the head of Alexander (reading ALEXANDER) covered with the lion's skin (as on his silver coins), and on the reverse the chrisma (✠) enclosed in a circle.

He appears to be right in thinking that this and the following are the kind of charms against which St. John Chrysostom protests. Paciaudi in 1748 first published a medal having the head and name of Alexander as before on the obverse, but bearing on the reverse an ass's colt sucking its mother, accompanied by the astrological scorpion and the legend D.N. IHS XPS DEI FILIVS (De Rossi, u. s. p. 61, MONEY). He mentions in fine (p. 62) a copper plate (lamina di rame), perforated for suspension, in the possession of Signor Lovatti, a dealer in antiques at Rome, reading on one side as follows:—In the centre an owl; about it DOMINVS and seven stars; in a circle near the circumference, BICIT TE LEO DE TRIBVS IYDA RADIS DAVIT. (The Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David hath overcome thee.) On the reverse, IESV ✠ STVS | LIGABIT TE BRA | TIVS

TURNA | NON BALEAS AD | ANIMA PVRA ET |
SVpra QVIS | VIS SIS. Jesus Christ hath bound thee, the arm of God and the seal of Solomon (have bound thee). Bird of night, mayest thou not prevail to approach the pure soul and to get over her, whoever thou beest. No speculation is made by De Rossi concerning the age of this document. There is a very similar medal of red copper (Fig. 59), meant for an amulet pierced for suspension, which was found at Keff, anciently Sicca Venerea, in Tunis. It is now in the King of Holland's Cabinet at the Hague, and is rendered by Reuvens, at the end of his second letter to Letronne (pp. 29–32), as follows; the doubtful conjectures are also his.

Obv. Invidia invidiosa nihil tibi ad (adimat?), anima pura et munda, Quiriace (for Cyriace): sata malina (maligna) non tibi praevalcat (sic). Ligabit te Dei brachium Dei et Christi et (sic) signum et sigillum Solomonis ✠ PAXCACA (Abraxas?).

Rev. Owl: legend round it in two circles. Id non praevalcat (sic: praevalcat?) inf. (infaustum or infanti?). Ligabit te brachium Dei. Quiriace, in Deo vivas. (Reuvens, Lettres à M. Letronne sur les Papyrus bilingues, &c., Leide, 1830, who gives an enlarged figure; from this and from an impression kindly sent by Dr. Vollgraff the present figure of the size of the original is taken. The original proper name, which can hardly now be read, has evidently been cancelled, and Quiriace written in its place.) The learned author regards the medal as late, but without saying how late. In all likelihood it was not struck too late to be embraced in the present work. For the Sigillum Salomonis, see Reuvens, u. s. and Smith's Dict. of Bible, iii. 1534, note: in this case the name of Solomon itself appears to constitute the seal (see SEAL). It is worthy of note that the word Abraxas here seems to occur on a tolerably ancient monument which is undoubtedly Christian. [See GEMS, p. 720, note.] [C. B.]

MONIALIS. [NUN.]

MONICA, mother of St. Augustine; commemorated May 4 (Boll. Acta SS. May, i. 473).

[C. H.]

MONICIA, martyr; commemorated in Achaia Ap. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

[C. H.]

MONITIO (1). According to a decree of a council of Orleans, quoted by Ivo (Decret. p. ii. c. 120), the priest after the sermon, which is preached in the Mass, is to admonish the people to pray to the Lord for their several necessities, for the king, for the bishops and rulers of churches, for peace, for the sick, for those who have lately departed, &c.; at each of which petitions the people are silently to say the Lord's Prayer, while the priest says—apparently also silently—the prayers which are to accompany the several admonitions (monitiones).

(2) After sermon the priest also gave notice of such things as the days to be observed specially in the ensuing week. Thus St. Augustine (Serm. 3, s. fin.) begs the people to observe on the next day the anniversary of the ordination of Aurelius at the basilica of Faustus (Martene, de Rit. Eccl. I. iv. 5, § 7). Such notices were called monitiones. [C.]

MONK (μοναχός, monachus). It is obvious that in the first instance the word μοναχός designated a solitary, an anchorite or HERMIT. And it was in fact applied originally to those who passed their lives in solitude (μόνα(σ)τρος), in deserts, or in "dens and caves of the earth" [MORTIFICATION], and who were thus distinguished from ascetics, who might carry on their ascetic practices in the midst of a town. But when the rage of persecution passed away which had driven many into the wilderness (Sozom. H. E. i. 12), and the scattered hermits came to dwell in villages of huts or cells [LAURA], and even when they came to live in regularly organised communities [COENOBIVM; MONASTERY], they still retained the title which they derived from their original solitary life. So that in almost all the languages of Europe a word derived from solitude has come to designate one who is emphatically a member of a community; and a word which originally designated the solitary retreat of a hermit has come to designate a house crowded with organised life, though the cell of the individual monk is still a μοναστήριον in the stricter sense of the word. [C.]

MONKS (IN ART). It is as difficult to distinguish the monastic dress from the ecclesiastical, as in many cases to tell the ecclesiastical from the civil. As St. Anthony's first organisation of the monastic life, as distinguished from the eremitical, dates from the latter half of the third century, no representation of monks can be expected much earlier than the fourth. Bottari, however, at the beginning of his 3rd volume, in a picture of the burial of St. Ephrem, represents three coenobites of the East, one in prayer, the other two occupied in basket-making; indicating, of course, the rule of devotion and labour which St. Benedict afterwards adopted for the Western monasteries. (See woodcut.) Martigny (Dict. p. 407) says that he knows no more ancient representation of the monastic habit. It is to be observed that the nun-like habit usually represented as worn by the Blessed Virgin, is later than the mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore (circ. 431), where she is represented bareheaded, and richly dressed (Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, vol. i. p. 64, pl. 21). Her dress has a decidedly monastic appearance in the Pentecost of the Laurentian MSS. of Rabula (Assemani, Catal. Biblioth. Medica Laurent. tav. xxvi.), and monks are certainly represented at tav. xxv., though the apostles in the former plate wear togæ with clavi. See also tab. iii. iv. vii. and indeed passim. This MS. is dated A.D. 583.

Monks. From Martigny.

The dress of saints in the mosaics up to the 11th century is rather ecclesiastical than monastic, though of course many are represented who were under monastic vows. This appears to be the case even in the 9th century Greek Ménologium of the Vatican (D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xxxii. xxxiii.). The writer can find no distinctively monastic dress in Professor Westwood's Irish and Anglo-Saxon MSS. up to that of St. Dunstan, 11th century, plate 1. The dark colours would be objectionable in illuminations; but the black Benedictine robe and tonsure are unmistakable. A monk, apparently in glory, has a pink habit and the tonsure. [R. St. J. T.]

MONNUS, martyr; commemorated at Rome at the cemetery of Praetextatus May 10 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MONOBAMBYLUM (μονάμυλλον), the candlestick holding a single taper, carried before a patriarch of Constantinople on ordinary occasions. On the day when he received the pastoral staff from the emperor he was honoured with a candlestick with two sockets, diabambylum, διαμύπουλον (Pachymeres, Hist. ii. 28). [C.]

MONOGAMY. [DIGAMY; MARRIAGE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

MONOGRAM, an abbreviation of the name Jesus Christ. The Christian public or official use of this symbol is involved in nearly the same chronological difficulties as that of the cross. [See CROSS.] The term Chrisma is frequently applied to it. Its original form was certainly that of the X, the initial letter of our Lord's name, with the letter P across the intersection of its limbs. It was subsequently altered by enlarging the central P into the form Ɀ. A further modification, which turned the X into the Egyptian T, brought the monogram into the form of the penal cross thus Ɀ. It is suggested under CROSS, that though we can produce few or no instances, before Constantine, of the public use of the monogram of the name of the Lord, or the cross which symbolized His person and His death, both the letters and the symbol were then in private use: so as to be fully understood as representing Him. The distinction must be observed that the monogram, as an initial, is only a phonetic or letter-symbol; whereas the Cross is a graphic symbol or hieroglyph, and appeals to memory and a train of associations connected with the Lord's person, and indeed the manner of His death, the nature of His sacrifice, and His whole church as a system and a kingdom.

The modification into the penal, the Egyptian, or Tau-cross surmounted by the P, seems to date from about the time of Constantine, and may have been produced by either or both of two causes. At that period it became safe, and it may have been thought both right and necessary, for Christendom to avow the Lord's death as a malefactor: the reproach of the cross would then be no longer intolerable to fresh converts, and the manner of His death had to be remembered in attestation of His perfect humanity. Hence the penal cross of His death was raised as a standard. But this later T-form of the monogram seems to have been especially popular in the East, and in Egypt almost exclusively used (Garrucci, Vetri, p. 104, and Letroune, De la Croix ansée Égyptienne, p. 16). It is quite possible that it may have become more popular under Alexandrian influence, especially after the appearance of Athanasius at the council of Nicaea. Garrucci is decidedly of opinion that the monogram and the cross were both adopted, simultaneously and from the first, by Constantine, and considered in fact as the same symbol. In some cases the upright cross was added to the oblique one so as to form an eight-rayed star ✠, but the Ɀ monogram and the Greek cross appear alike on coins of Constantines, published in the "tavola d'Aggiunta" at the end of Garrucci's Vetri. [MONEY.] He says it is certain that the Ɀ monogram represented the σταυρός or cross in the Coptic church, and quotes a curious passage from St. Ephrem, which gives the reason for attaching the letters A and ω to the opposite limbs of the upright symbol, and then identifies it with the Rho-monogram P . (Opp. v. iii. 477, ed. Assemani.) Διὰ τὴν ἱστοροῦμεν ἐν διαφόροις τοίοις ἐκ (τῶν πλευρῶν) τοῦ σταυροῦ A καὶ ω ; The answer follows:—“Ὅτι ἀρχὴ καὶ τέλος ὁ σταυρωθεὶς ἐν αὐτῷ ὑπάρχει, τὸ δὲ ἐπάνω P σημαίνει βοήθεια, ψηφίζομενον ἑκατόν.” Martigny remarks further, that the P is the only form of the monogram found in the Alexandrine Bibles, as in the Vatican MS., that of Mount Sinai published by Tischendorf, and that at Cambridge.

Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimiteri, etc. pp. 336–347) gives a series of examples of the monogram from the catacombs and cemeteries of SS. Agnes, Praetextatus, Calixtus, Cyriaca, Gordianus, Pontianus, Lucina, Helena, Calepodius, and Hippolytus. All except two in the two last-named cemeteries are of the P or P form.

[INSCRIPTIONS, pp. 847 ff.] The latter may have been adopted simply because it is easier to write. But few have the A and ω ; and this may be taken as some indication, at least, that they are antecedent to the Nicene council. [A and ω , i. 1.] In the annexed example the Greek P is used as a Roman P for the better arrangement of its inscription on the sigil or stamp. The universal employment of the Greek letters is another illustration of the observations of Dean Milman in his History of Christianity, that the Roman church, for the first two centuries at least, was essentially a Greek body.

The A and ω are sometimes hung by small chains to the branches of the cross, or thus represented. (See Boldetti, pp. 338 and 345, and Bottari, tav. xlv.) The first of these examples is somewhat rare, as representing these letters attached to the P monogram. They are given with another example of the same form in a mosaic on a tablet of terra cotta from the cemetery of St. Cyriaca (see infra). The former of these may be the same as that quoted by Martigny from De Rossi (Inscr. Christ. Rom. t. i. No. 776), which he says is unique according to his experience.

The monogram is sometimes (and almost always in Gallic inscriptions) surrounded by a wreath of palm or other leaves, in sign of the Lord's victory; and there is an analogous use of placing the upright monogram in the letter N thus for $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$ NIKA. [Cross, p. 498.]

In Aringhi, vol. i. p. 605, there is a copy of a sepulchral inscription from the cemetery of Priscilla, by Victorina to her dead husband Heraclius, which ends with the palm-branch, and is headed by the upright monogram with the A and ω , all inscribed in a triangle. This is said to be very uncommon, but Martigny, in his article on 'Triangle,' gives three other forms of its combination with the monogram: the two first from Lupi (Severae Epitaphium, fol. Palermo, 1734), the other from a letter by M. de St. Antoine, canon of the cathedral of Lyons, which gives account of fifteen inscriptions on various monuments. It is dated 14th April, 1631, and was discovered by De Rossi in the Barberini library, and published by E. Le Blant (Inscr. Chrétiennes de la Gaule, t. i. p. 107). The monogram is often placed on the forehead of the portrait of our Lord. (See Boldetti, p. 60, and Martigny, Dict. 334.) It is found thus on the Good Shepherd and the Lamb (Mamachi, iii. 18; Bottari, tav. xxi.; GEMS, p. 718; and in the NIMBUS [p. 1393]; see also Allegranza's Sacri Monum. antichi di Milano, tav. i.). It appears on a glass representing the miracle of the Seven Loaves (Garrucci, vii. 16, and Buonarrotti, tab. viii. 1), and on an altar, between St. Peter and St. Paul, or other saints (Buonarrotti, xiv. 2).

These latter are all in the P form, which seems to have kept its hold on Christian use from the fact that the X alone, as an initial, represented the venerated name. Julian speaks of the X and the K in his Misopojon, pp. 94, 5, ed. Par. 1566, as representing Christ and Constantine, Ἐδιδάχθημεν ἀρχὰς ὀνομάτων εἶναι τὰ γράμματα; θελοῦν δ' ἐθέλειν τὸ μὲν Χριστὸν, τὸ δὲ Κωνσταντῖον; and again (pp. 106–7) of the two reproaches made against him in Antioch, ὡς ἐκ τοῦ πῶγονός μου πλέκειν δεῖ σχοῖνια; καὶ ὅτι πολεμῶ τῷ χι.

It seems difficult to imagine, as is sometimes contended, that the monogram was unknown or rarely used before the days of Constantine. The habitual use of the Cross in his time is proved by Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. 3, quoted under Cross. It may have been used privately or unofficially from the first, though perhaps unsatisfactory to Hebrew brethren or Roman catechumens. It is remarkable, however, that the monogram or cross is not mentioned in Clement's list of permitted symbols on rings at Paedagog. iii. 11, p. 246 D. A certain use of symbolism was allowed by the synagogue, though the use of the cherub-forms probably ended with the ancient temple. Still a Christian society in which the Greek element altogether predominated for 300 years cannot have gone on long without the use of emblematic or specially significant forms; especially where secrecy was often an object. The passages in Apoc. vii. 2, xiv. 1, where the sign of the Son of God is spoken of, compared with Ezek. ix. 4, 6, suggest the idea that the monogram is there intended, and though the speculation is not one to be pursued far, it is excusable. Whatever the subjective reality of Constantine's vision may be, it is clear that he saw, or thought he saw, or said he thought he saw, some emblem or sign whose meaning he and his followers well knew. There is no reason for supposing that the form of the Labarum was revealed to Constantine for the first time, never having existed before. In Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. 24-26) his vision is spoken of as a dream; and it is consistent with the mysterious admixture of the natural and the providential, which constitutes what we call divine interference, that a well-known form should be for ever invested, in his mind, with divine meaning, rather than that a new one should have been invented. In fact, had the labarum been believed to be a new revelation of a divine sign of the Son of Man, it would everywhere have taken the place of the cross, on the authority of Constantine, as the man privileged to see it; and might have prevented the use or worship of the crucifix. The change to the upright cross in the labarum may have proceeded naturally from the cruciform vexillum of the Roman cavalry [LABARUM,

* P is the numeral for 100; and the letters which make up βοήθεια, taken as numerals, also amount to 100. [C.]

p. 11]. But the earlier ☩ or ☩ continued in use even on that ensign; and it is certainly found, in most instances without Christian meaning, on ancient coins and medals, as in the Lydian or Mæonian medal quoted by Martigny, s. v. "Numismatique," p. 454, where the letters X and P, which form part of the legend, are united so as to form it thus ☩ . See M. Ch.

Lenormant, Signes de Christianisme sur les Monum. numismatiques du troisième Siècle, in Mélanges d'Archéologie, t. iii. [MONEY.] In this matter, as in every other which concerns the monuments of Christian Rome, we have to lament the effects of relic-removing, collecting, and devout interpolation. Inscriptions are collected in museums, arranged and re-arranged according to tastes or theories, and crosses and monograms of secondary date are everywhere found inscribed on more ancient tablets after the peace of the church, and thus the monuments will vitiate each other's evidence to the end of time.

Until lately the earliest certain Chi-monogram was supposed to date A.D. 331, omitting the mutilated and doubtful fragment which is thought to present date 298. (De Rossi, Inscr. Christ. t. i. p. 29, and p. 38, No. 39.) But an earlier example than the former—as far back as 323—has been found under the Constantinian basilica of St. Lawrence in Agro Verano. We have already speculated on the greater importance and more frequent use of the symbol after the council of Nice. But this year is also the date of the death of Licinius, from which time the symbol begins to be engraved on coins (De Rossi, Bullett. 1863, p. 22). In 355 it is for the first time joined to the A and ω . Other forms appear about 347, the upright cross being first added to the Chi-rho so as to form a kind of star; then the X is withdrawn and the ☩ remains. To the 5th century the old and new forms go on together, ☩ and ☩ ; but early in the 6th the P disappears, and the Latin or Greek cross takes the place of the monograms. Martigny gives a very curious and interesting instance of the final transition into the cross as symbolic not only of Christ's name but of His death. The monogram ☩ is used in the Sinaitic Bible four times: once at the end of Jeremiah, twice at the end of Isaiah, and in Apoc. 11. 8, in the middle of the word ΕΚΤΑΤΡΩΩΗ (De Rossi, Bullett. 1863, p. 62.) However in the Western world the use of the ancient letter-symbol continued to the end of the 5th century. It was revived for a time by Charlemagne, and used by councils held under him, and even on sepulchral inscriptions. For the former, see Mabillon, de Re Diplomatica, l. v. tav. liv. lv. lvi., ed. Nap. p. 468 sqq.

On a larger scale the monogram occurs on the exteriors and interiors of ancient churches and basilicas. See Boldetti (Cimet. etc. p. 338), where a rude example of it with the A and ω is given. It continued visible to his day sculptured over the Latin Gate of the walls of Belisarius. He found it more frequently in the tile-mosaic in the cemeteries of Cyriaca and Priscilla, and in the tomb of Faustina, Callistine cemetery (Boldetti, p. 339) it is enclosed in a wreath, which may represent a crown of palm. This is carved on a marble slab. But the sign occurs frequently in the mosaics which adorn the apses or arches of triumph in the churches of Rome and Ravenna; as in SS. Cosmas and Damian in the former place (Ciampini, Vet. Monum. ii. p. 60), or in Galla Placidia's chapel at Ravenna (ib. vol. i. tab. lxx. lxxi.). So also on the inner walls and veil of the sanctuary (Mabillon, de Re Diplom. bk. ii. c. 10, p. 110). The earliest example on a sacred building is now preserved in the Hôtel de Ville of Sion, and dates from A.D. 377. It was probably often used in baptisteries; Martigny gives a woodcut from Bottari (tav. xxxiv.; Airinghi, vol. i. p. 319) of a round or octagon building of this kind from a sarcophagus in the Vatican, which bears the monogram in the centre of its low roof. An interesting engraving, as recording a very early adoption for Christian purposes of that form; of which the Tower of the Winds, or Horologium, Athens, is one great example, and San Giovanni at Florence the chief one of the first Etrurian renaissance.

On sarcophagi and funereal monuments the monogram may be said to occur passim; often, as of old, standing as signum Domini or signum Christi, representing simply the name and person of our Lord (Boldetti, pp. 273, 345, 399).

"In  Aurelio Marcellino Deposito, in  vii. Idus Martia," the first of these examples, may stand for the others also. At p. 338 (Boldetti) there is a woodcut which is here reproduced (see below) of a tile, or ancient and thin brick, which was once used to close up a loculus in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca. In a painting of the Adoration of the Magi, recently discovered after a fall of earth outside of this place, the monogram takes the place of the star; perhaps with some reflection of the Lord's prophecy of the appearance of the sign of the Son of man in heaven.

For examples on sarcophagi, there is a very rich one in Bottari (tab. xxvii.), Aringhi, i. p. 325, and at Bottari, tav. xxx., Aringhi, i. p. 311, it is attended (as representing our Lord) by the twelve apostles. On the bases of columns and pilasters see Bottari, tav. cxxvi.

Some reference has been made above to the works of Buonarrotti and Garrucci for the use of the monogram on glasses and cups. It is represented alone, or between St. Peter and St. Paul, or other saints, or on marriage cups with the wedded pair. We add an example of a lamp from Aringhi

(vol. ii. p. 371), which, he says, is of early date, "longe ante Constantini tempora." [LAMPS, pp. 921, 923, 924.] There are several examples on rings in Boldetti (p. 502), with or without the palm-branch. On encolpia and amulets [ENCOLPION, p. 611]. In Hagioglypta, p. 225, there is an instance of the X in the mystic word IXΘΥC, which has the loop of the P added to it. Compare the use of the P, both in its Greek and Roman meaning, Boldetti, p. 336.

A small bronze figure of St. Peter bearing the penal cross-monogram, of excellent workmanship, is given by Martigny, p. 539.

Count Melchior de Vogüé found the sign of the cross or monogram on many ancient houses in the mountain villages of Syria, which were probably anterior to the Mussulman occupation; and St. Cyril of Alexandria (Contra Julianum, lib. vi.; Migne, vol. lxxvi. p. 796) shews that this was customary (τὸ χρῆναι δὴ πάντας ἐγχαράττειν ἀεὶ καὶ οἰκίαις καὶ μετόποις τὸ σημεῖον τ. τιμίου σταυροῦ).

For the use of the monogram on medals and coins, see LABARUM and MONEY. On furniture and utensils Martigny refers to a wooden "pupitre," or faldstool, now preserved in the monastery of St. Croix at Poitiers, and shewn as originally the property of St. Radegund, wife of Clotaire I., son of Clovis. The monogram is roughly carved on it within a crown, between two crosses or cruciform symbols. (See Cahier and Martin, Mélanges d'Archéologie, t. iii. p. 156.) In Garrucci (Vetri, etc. pp. 104, 5) reference is made to a poem of Publilius O. Porphyrius to Constantine, in which the emperor is addressed as pilot of the ship of the state, and the cross-monogram is his helm. The object of the work is to request permission for the author's return from exile, and he has shewn his ingenuity by disposing the verses in which he compares the emperor to the world's helmsman in the form of a ship thus symbolically directed. For vessels, see Le Blant (Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, t. i. pl. 41, No. 244). Bottari (t. i. p. 102) mentions a strigil which Pignorio had seen marked with it in the midst of the name of the owner. So in sepulchral inscriptions. (De Rossi, Inscr. Christ. p. 111, No. 221. A PCRIGE.) Again, on the collars worn by fugitive slaves. (See Giorgi, p. 39; Fabretti, iii. 385.) One in particular seems to have belonged to a serf of the ancient basilica of St. Clement at Rome, being inscribed A DOMINICV CLEMENTIS. It appears from Pignori (Epist. xxiv., Spon. Miscell. 301), that the use of these collars dates from Constantine's time. It had been originally the custom to brand runaways on the forehead; and the wearing the collar was a Christian usage of mercy, which probably lasted long into the Middle Ages. (See Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, of Gurth and Wamba.) In any case, in these early times, the monogram was engraved on the plate of the collar, perhaps, as Martigny says, to remind the slave that severe punishment had been spared him in the name of Christ; perhaps with allusion to the text, "One is your Master, even Christ."

Other uses of the monogram seem to have been that it was placed at the head of episcopal letters; was used as a mark by readers for specially important passages; employed as a symbol of initiation and text for exhortation for catechumens before their baptism. In this capacity it was the custom in Milan to paint it on a large cloth and exhibit it in the church. (Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Script. vol. iv. p. 66.) In short till the crucifix took its place, its use seems to have been coextensive with that of the cross, and to have had the function of uniting the symbolical with the individual devotion of personal religion.

Thus much for the true or original monogram in which the initials of the Lord's title of Anointed, and the symbol of His person, life, and death were formally united, at or before the time of Constantine. A later monogram seems to have been constructed on the same principle from the first three letters IHC of the name Jesus. It seems to have been derived from Byzantine usage. The usual Lower Greek abbreviation for the Lord's name is IC, and one may give calligraphers and miniaturists credit for developing it by adding the H and perpendicular stroke, so as at length to form the IHS of later times. Martigny says that St. Bernardin of Siena (d. 1444) was one of the first who used it, and this is confirmed by a passage in his Life in Alban Butler (May 20), in which he is said during one of his sermons to have exhibited the name of our Lord beautifully carved on a gilded panel, and incurred some suspicion in consequence. Martigny closes his article on this subject with one or two curious examples, of ancient date, where the R and IHC monograms seem both to have been in the mind of the inscriber or sculptor. One is in Lupi's Epitaphium Severae, p. 137, and bears the anchor-mark, which may indicate great antiquity, with both monograms, thus IHR. The other (p. 420) is from the chapel of St. Satyrus in St. Ambrogio at Milan, where St. Victor bears a cross in one hand and the annexed symbol (see above) in the other. It seems intended to combine the ancient Christa or Chi-Rho monogram with the initials IH, if not IHC, and the cross, so as to join both initials and symbol in the words IHCOTC XPICTOC.

MONTH. The month-reckoning used by the church in the first century, in Palestine, was doubtless that which was followed by the Jews, such as we find it in Josephus, especially in the Wars. Writing for Syrian Greeks, he constantly substitutes for the Jewish (Babylonian) month-names those of the corresponding Macedonian lunar months, which names were introduced into the East in the track of Alexander's conquests.

The corresponding lunar months in the Jewish, Syrian, and Macedonian nomenclature are as follows:—

Jewish.	Syrian.	Macedonian.
Tisri . . .	First Tisri . .	Hyperberetæus.
Marchesvan	Second Tisri . .	Dius.
Kisleu . . .	First Kanun . .	Apellæus.
Tebeth . . .	Second Kanun	Audinaeus.
Shebat . . .	Shebat . . .	Peritius.
Adar . . .	Adar . . .	Dystrus.
Nisan . . .	Nisan . . .	Xanthicus.
Ijar . . .	Ijar . . .	Artemisius.
Sivan . . .	Hasiran . . .	Dæsius.
Thamuz . .	Thamuz . . .	Panemus.
Ab . . .	Ab . . .	Lous.
Elul . . .	Elul . . .	Gorpiæus.

The intercalary month is inserted, when necessary, between Adar and Nisan. The months are usually of 29 and 30 days alternately.

Later, throughout Syria, these Macedonian months were absolutely assimilated to the Roman months, in dimensions and epoch. Thus Hyperberetæus is identical with September, Dius with October, etc. But no month-dates, lunar or other, occur in Christian writings earlier than the middle of the second century.* When such do occur, they are constantly Julian-Roman, or in terms of a Julianized calendar, usually in both together. From Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. Epidem.; Opp. Hippocr. et Galen. ix. 2, p. 8) we learn that in his time (circ. A.D. 150), "as the Romans, so the Macedonians, our own Asiatic (Asia Procons.), and many other nations, had adopted the solar year," the cardinal points of which (as he goes on to describe) were taken as fixed by Julius Caesar, and, consequently, the Macedonian months, Dius, Peritius, Artemisius, and Lous made to begin at, or near, Sept. 24, Dec. 25, March 25, June 24 respectively. But the names and sequence of these months are not everywhere Macedonian, neither are the epochs the same. The requisite information on these points, laboriously gathered in by Ussher (de Macedonum et Asianorum anno Solari Dissertat., app. to his Annal. V. et N. Test.), and by Noris (de Anno et Epochis Syromacedonum; Opp. t. ii. 1 sqq.), confirmed by two "Ἡμερολογίαι διαφόρων πύλεων, since brought to light, will be found in Ideler (Handbuch, i. 393 sqq.).

* Assemani, indeed (Bibl. Orient. ii. 486), describing a Syriac MS. of "a Gospel" preserved in the Vatican, gives from its epigraph (Syriac) the following startling date—which, however, he receives unquestioned—"Ab-solutus est iste liber feria quinta die 18 Canun prioris anno Græcorum 389"—which year (Aera Seleuc.) began in the autumn of A.D. 77. Of course there is some error here. At any time to which the epigraph can be referred the Syrian months were identical with the Julian: the "former Canun" was Syro-Macedonian Apellæus, identical with December. Now as in A.D. 77, Sunday letter E, the 18th December did fall on a Thursday, the simplest explanation is to say that there is an error in the centuries; for 389 read 1089; of A.D. 777 the Sunday letter is of course E, as of A.D. 77, and 18 Dec. Thursday.

The Macedonian names of the months, when a solar year was adopted, run as below in the Ephesian arrangement; the "Asian" names—i. e. those used in proconsular Asia—are different, though, as will be seen, the arrangement of the year is very nearly the same.

In bissextile, Lenaeus has 30 days in the Asian calendar, Dystrus 30 days in the Ephesian. (Browne, Ordo Saeculorum, § 402, p. 463.)

We give here a few month-dates, some with concurrent week-days. The martyrdom of St. Polycarp (Mart. Polyc. c. 21, in Patr. Apost.; Hefele, p. 220, ed. 1842; comp. Euseb. H. E. iv. 15) gives as the date of the martyrdom 2 Xanthicus = vii. Kal. Mart. (but Vet. Lat. vii. Kal. Mart.), σαββάτου μεγάλη—a statement beset with difficulties, discussed by Ussher, in l.; Vales, in l. Eus.; Noris, u. s.; Pagi, a. 167; Ideler, i. 419; Ordo Saeculorum, § 417; Clinton, Fasti Rom. a. 166. The like difficulties attach to the date given in the Mart. S. Pionii, c. 2 (Ruinart, Acta Mart. p. 140), where the Natale of St. Polycarp is also placed on the "Great Sabbath," and this is said to have fallen in the year 251, on iv. id. Mart. the second day of the seventh Asian month (Ordo Saecul. § 478). The latter date belongs to a generalised calendar, in which the months are numbered, not named. In this the first month corresponds to Dius, and therefore the seventh to Artemisius. It continued in use long afterwards—as may be seen in a paschal discourse included among the Spuria Opp. St. Chrysost. t. viii. 284 (A.D. 672–5, explained by Ussher). In Eusebius, de Martyr. Palaest. app. to H. E. viii., are nine double dates, some with concurrent week-days; these, also attended with difficulties, are discussed in Ordo Saecul. § 479. Here the calendar is that τῶν Ἑλλήνων, ἡτοι Σύρων, in which the Macedonian months are absolutely identical with the Julian:

24 Dystrus, ix kal. Apr. [= 24 Mar.]

2 Xanthicus, iv. non Apr. [= 2 Apr.] ἡμέρα παρασκευῆς.

20 Dius, xii kal. Dec. [= 20 Nov.] προσαββάτου ἡμέρα.

2 Xanthicus, u. s. ἐν αὐτῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ.

This mode of reckoning is of frequent occurrence, especially in connexion with the Era of the Seleucidae. Thus, in the heading of the acts of the Council of Nice stands "year 636 from Alexander [= Ae. Sel.], in the month Daesius, 19th day, the xiii. Kal. Jul." [i. e. 19th June, A.D. 325]. Evagrius, the ecclesiastical historian, uses it, as does John Malala, historian of Antioch, and also the Paschal Chronicle; and, as may be seen in Assemani (Bibl. Orient.), it constantly occurs in dated epigraphs to Syriac MSS. In Epiphanius (Haer. li. 24; p. 446 Petav.), we have an accumulation of correspondences. Christ, he says, was born 6th Jan., which is 6 Maemakterion of Athenians (Ideler, i. 361), 6 Audynaues "of the Greeks, i. e. Syrians," 11 Tybi of the Egyptians (= Alexandrians), 14 Julius of the Paphians, 5 of the 5th month of the Salaminians, 13 Atarta of Cappadocians. The Lord's baptism he dates 8th November, which is 7 Metageitnion of Athenians (Ideler, u. s.), 8 Dius "of Greeks, i. e. Syrians," 16 Apellaeus of Macedonians, 12 Athyr of Egyptians (Alexandrians), 16 Apogonius of Paphians, 6 Choeak of Salaminians, 15 Aratata of Cappadocians.

The fixed Alexandrian year—twelve months of thirty days each, with the five epagomenae at the year's end (24–28 Aug.), and a sixth at the end of each fourth year, so arranged that the year always began (i Thoth) on 29th August—stood its ground against the Julianized Syro-Macedonian year, and is still retained by Copts, Abyssinians, and (some) Armenians. This calendar runs as follows:

1 Thoth	= 29 Aug.	1 Pharmuthi	= 27 Mar.
1 Phaophi	= 28 Sept.	1 Pachon	= 26 Apr.
1 Athyr	= 28 Oct.	1 Payni	= 26 May.
1 Choeak	= 27 Nov.	1 Epiphi	= 25 June.
1 Tybi	= 27 Dec.	1 Mesori	= 25 July.
1 Mechir	= 26 Jan.	1 Epagomenae	= 24 Aug.
1 Phamenoth	= 25 Feb.		(Ordo Saecul. § 401, p. 460.)

Of this form, in earlier times, were variously modified the calendar of the Arabians (Bostra?), Gaza, Ascalon, Cappadocia, Salamis (in Cyprus). For the discussion of these matters it must suffice here to refer to Ideler's Handbuch u. s. and his authorities.

This multiplicity of month-reckonings was felt, the more the Roman world was Christianized, to be incompatible with the requirements of the church; and, before the close of our period, with the exception of Copts, Aethiopians (Abyssinians), and (partially) Armenians, whose year is still of the Alexandrine form, all the churches had accepted the Julian method (with or without the Roman names), according to which January, March, May, July, August, October, December have each 31 days, February 28, in leap year 29, and each of the remaining four months, 30 days. The established Roman notation by calends, nones and ides, inconvenient and absurd as it seems to us, was long retained—so long, in fact, as Latin continued to be the only written language in the West. Attempts, indeed, were made to introduce the regular numerical count of month-days, as by Gregory the Great at the close of the 6th century. Of earlier times, there is a fragment of a Gothic calendar (4th century) in which the month-days are numbered (Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Collect. v. i. 66). In the Byzantine church, the numerical way of dating began to be used in the 7th century. It appears, together with the old way, in the Paschal Chronicle; but in the same century the emperor Heraclius, in a chronological writing of his, keeps to the old method, which continues to be used in numerous πασχάλια of later times; Georgius Syncellus (end of 8th century) employs only the new reckoning. MOON. The moon does not appear in Aringhi's 'Index of Christian Symbols,' nor does the present writer know of her being used as a Christian emblem until the 6th century, when the crucifixion began to be a common subject of representation, and the sun and moon of course formed a part of it. [See CRUCIFIX.] The latter appears as a crescent or female figure, or as either, holding or containing the other, or as a face. In the crucifixion of the Laurentian MS. she is a crescent within a round disk, and there is a very singular picture in tab. v. of that MS. (Assemani Catalog. Bibl. Medic.) of a partial and total eclipse of the sun, which seems to represent the moon as a white disk and face, and also as a black disk marked with the crescent. See the crosses and ivory plaque, Mozzoni, sec. 8. The associations of Asiatic and Egyptian paganism may easily account for the omission of the moon from Christian art for the first three or four centuries. The Mithraic worship prevalent in Rome in the earlier centuries must have included the moon as well as the sun. See the Abbé Auber's Symbolisme Religieux, vol. i. p. 169. Even in the many arabesques of vaultings in Bosio's plates, the writer can find no use of the disk or the crescent as ornament, though in the earlier basilicas and memorial churches, where roofs were sown with stars (as notably in the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna), the moon may also have occurred. The great Apocalyptic mosaics would allow the presence of the sun and moon in the Lord's hand; as also some Old-Testament subjects, as the 5th-century mosaic of Joshua in Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome, the Vienna Greek MS. of Genesis (4th or 5th century) in a dream of Joseph (D'Agincourt, pl. xix., and compare Vatican Virgil, pl. xx.). But they seem to have been held in earlier times to be a part of the idolatrous symbolism against which Tertullian protested so decidedly in his treatise 'De Idololatriâ'; and to have been necessarily banished from the Christian Church wherever there was danger of confounding pagan rites with her own. The moon does not occur in Garrucci's or Buonarrotti's Vetri. The classical enthusiasm of the Carolingian period, both English and Frank, seems to have accepted solar and lunar imagery with equal readiness, both being now fully allowed in the crucifixions and Apocalyptic pictures. The former Saxon worship of sun and moon seems to have haunted the minds of northern Christianity very little, and the symbols of both seem to have been so freely used in crucifixions as to be considered safe anywhere. Sometimes personifications occur, such as those in the Cottonian Aratus (B. Mus. Tiberius, B. 5; Westwood, Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. pl. 48). There is a very interesting miniature of chariots of the sun and moon in Count Vivian's Bible, middle 9th century (Bastard, Peintures des Manuscrits, vol. ii; see woodcut), and a Franco-Saxon MS. in the same volume contains a crucifixion with a crescent Diana's head, as moon, on a medallion.

From the Bible of Count Vivian.

It seems impossible, to connect Egyptian lunar symbolisms of the horned Isis with any Christian emblem. But a twofold allegory was connected with the idea of the moon from the days of Augustine at least. He speaks of her as representing the church (Enarr. in Ps. x.), "Luna in allegoria significat ecclesiam, quod ex parte spiritali lucet ecclesia, ex parte autem carnali obscura est. Alii dicunt non habere lunam lunem proprium, sed a sole illustrari. Ergo lunâ intelligitur ecclesia, quod suum lumen non habeat, sed ab Unigenito Dei Filio, qui multis locis in SS. allegorice sol appellatus est, illustratur." One of the latest and most beautiful repetitions or echoes of this idea is the well-known passage in the 'Christian Year,' beginning "The moon above, the church below."

The presence of the sun and moon in crucifixions may be accounted for as representing the darkness which prevailed at the Lord's death; but it seems that it gave occasion in later days to the idea of the moon's representing the synagogue, or Hebrew church. St. Gregory the Great takes her to represent the frailty and decay of the flesh (In Evang. S. Lucæ, Hom. 2.).

The Turkish use of the crescent after 1463 was the adoption of the ancient symbol of the city of Byzantium, which was probably more welcome to them as unconnected with any Christian association. It is found on Byzantine coins (Mionnet, Descr. des Médailles, vol. i. p. 378), and dates from a repulse given to Philip of

MOON, SUPERSTITIOUS OBSERVANCE OF. The practice of blowing horns, shouting, and so on, during eclipses of the moon, to defend those doing it from witchcraft, was well-known to the nations of antiquity. Juvenal (Satir. vi. 442) refers to it:

"Jam nemo tubas, nemo aera fatiget:
Una laboranti poterit subcurrere lunae."

It was an old custom therefore, which lingered on long after the introduction of Christianity, and was reprehended by more than one of the fathers. A sermon attributed to St. Augustine (Serm. 215, De Tempore) details, in order to denounce and forbid, this among other superstitious practices. Ducange quotes a MS. Penitential, which says: "Si observasti traditiones paganorum, quas quasi haereditario jure, diabolo subministrante usque in hos dies patres filiis reliquerunt, id est, ut elementa, colores, lunam, solem, aut stellarum cursum, novam lunam, aut defectum lunae, ut tuis clamoribus aut auxilio splendorem ejus restaurare, valeres," etc. And in a Life of St. Eligius (c. 15) we find: "Nullus si quando luna obscuratur, vociferare praesumat, quia Deo jubente certis temporibus obscuratur." The practice seems, indeed, to have been common to all savage nations, and not to have died out in Europe up to the ninth century. [Compare NEW MOON.] [S. J. E.]

MOPSUESTIA, COUNCIL OF (Mopsuestenum Concilium), held by order of the emperor Justinian, A.D. 550, to make enquiry whether the name of Theodore, formerly bishop of Mopsuestia, whose writings were comprised in the celebrated three chapters afterwards condemned by the fifth council, had ever been on the sacred diptychs or not. Its acts are preserved in the fifth session of that council. (Mansi, ix. 150 and 274-17.) [E. S. Ff.]

MORGENGABE (German). A gift by a husband to his wife on the day after marriage. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ix. 20) says of it, "tam in dote, quam in morgengabe, hoc est, matutinali dono, certum est adaequasse" (Macri Hierolex. s. v.). [C.]

MORLAIX, COUNCIL OF (Marlacense Concilium), held at Morlaix in the diocese of Toul, or Marlé, near Paris, A.D. 677, under king Theodoric, whose ordinance relating to it is extant; when Chramlin, bishop of Embrun, was deposed, and at which Mansi thinks St. Leodegar or Leger exhibited his last will and testament (xi. 163 and 171). MORNING PRAYER. [HOURS OF PRAYER; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.]

MORTAL AND VENIAL SINS. The first among the early Christian writers who makes such a distinction is Tertullian. He ranks among capital sins—idolatry, blasphemy, murder, adultery, violation, false witness, fraud, which seven he fancifully connects with the sevenfold dipping in the river Jordan: "Septem maculis capitalium delictorum inhorrerent, idololatria, blasphemia, homicidio, adulterio, stupro, falso testimonio, fraude" (Adv. Marcion. lib. iv. cap. 9). Similarly, in De Idololatria, cap. 1. And in De Patientia, cap. 5, after a similar list, he adds: "Haec ut principalia penes Dominum delicta." (This word delicta is, apparently, with him, a general term for offences, and dependent on the particular appellative adjoined to it for the degree of gravity to be attached to its meaning. In St. Augustine and later writers, on the contrary, it is used by itself for grave crimes. See Pamelius's comment on this passage, p. 147, n. 40.) In the same manner he ranks among the number of daily or little sins anger, evil speaking, a blow struck, a vain oath, a failure to fulfil a promise, a lie caused by shame or necessity: "Quod sint quaedam delicta quotidianae incursionis, quibus omnes simus objecti. Cui enim non accidit, aut irasci inique, et ultra solis occasum, aut et manum immittere, aut facile maledicere, aut temere jurare, aut fidem pacti destruere, aut verecundia aut necessitate mentiri? In negotiis, in officiis, in quaestu, in victu, in visu, in auditu, quanta tentamur, ut si nulla sit venia istorum, nemini salus competat. Sunt autem et contraria istis, ut graviora et exitiosa, quae veniam non capiunt, homicidium, idololatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia, utique et moechia et fornicatio, et si qua alia violatio templi Dei" (De Pudicit. c. 19). And he draws the distinction sharply between the great and the small in cap. 18, "quae aut levioribus delictis veniam ab episcopo consequi poterit, aut majoribus et irremissibilibus a Deo solo." As to penance there was a milder party and a more rigid; the latter maintaining that no "locus poenitentiae" should be allowed to certain classes of offenders; and this difference of opinion was one of the causes of the Novatian and other schisms. [PENITENCE.] St. Cyprian calls adultery, fraud, murder, mortal crimes ("adulterium, fraus, homicidium, mortale crimen est") (De Bono Patientiae, c. 5). Origen declares that there are mortal sins which are not in the rank of great sins (Hom. xv. in Levit.); but there is a doubt whether the passage should be read culpa mortalis or moralis. In his sixth commentary on St. Matthew, he mentions evil speaking, lying, idle words, intemperance, as slighter sins, and such as murder and adultery as greater.

St. Augustine distinguishes more accurately three classes of sins: "There are some sins so great that they are to be punished with excommunication; there are others for which this remedy is not necessary, but they may be healed by the medicines of chastisements; and, lastly, there are some which are very light, from which no man is free in this life, for which we have left us a daily cure in that prayer, Forgive us our trespasses," etc.—"nisi essent quaedam ita gravia, ut etiam excommunicatione plectenda sint, non diceret apostolus; congregatis vobis et meo spiritu, tradere ejusmodi hominem Satanæ, etc. Item nisi essent quaedam non eâ humilitate poenitentiae sananda, quales in ecclesia datur eis qui proprie poenitentes vocantur, sed quibusdam correctionum medicamentis, non diceret ipse Dominus, Corripe inter te et ipsum solum, etc. Postremo, nisi essent quaedam, sine quibus haec vita non agitur, non quotidianam medelam poneret in oratione quam docuit, ut dicamus, Dimitte nobis debita nostra" (De Fide et Operibus, cap. 26). Many other passages might be quoted from this father, and all to the same effect. To the above may be added that St. Gregory (Moral. lib. xii. c. 9) distinguishes between peccatum and crimen, as does St. Augustine, making the first to mean such sins as are forgiven daily, upon repentance and prayer; and the second to mean flagrant crimes, to be punished by public penance. The general conclusions to be drawn from these and other declarations may be stated thus:

That all sins were deadly to the soul: not merely those called great, mortal, capital, or deadly sins, but also those known as small, light, or venial. These St. Augustine, in the treatise last quoted, goes on to say, destroy the soul by reason of their number. They are like the small drops which fill a river, or the grains of sand which, although they are small individually, will oppress and weigh us down; or as the bilge of a ship which, if neglected, will swamp the vessel as surely as the greatest wave, "by long entering and never being drained."

That it was not all mortal or deadly sins, but only sins of a public and heinous nature, which gave public scandal, that were put to public penance for a longer or shorter time. St. Gregory Nyssen, in his Letter to Letoſius, gives a list of such publicly punished sins, among which he mentions idolatry, Judaism, Manichaeism and heresy, magic, witchcraft, and divination; adultery and fornication; public and violent robbery, and murder. All these might be put to penance of various degrees, and then the offender might be re-admitted; but it would seem that penance was permitted only once, and that there were a multitude of other sins for which public penance was not imposed, which were, nevertheless, entirely distinguished from venial or less grave offences.

Idolatry was considered, in the early church, the greatest of all sins. A letter found among the works of St. Cyprian, and purporting to be from the clergy of Rome to him, calls it "grande delictum. Ingens et supra omnia peccatum" (Ep. 31); and Cyprian, in a letter to his own clergy, agrees that it is "summum delictum"—the sin against the Holy Ghost, which he who commits "non habebit remissam, sed reus est aeterni peccati" (Ep. 10). But here he is speaking of apostates.

The councils do not, apparently, treat of this distinction specifically. There are many provisions as to the degree of penance for particular offences, but no attempt at a general classification. But yet they recognized this distinction between classes of sins, which, indeed, was one that could not be overlooked. The Council of Agde (A.D. 506) forbade the excommunication of persons for slight causes (can. 3). Similarly, the fifth council of Orleans, c. 2 (A.D. 549), has a provision that no person of right faith should be cut off from communion for slight causes, but only for those offences deemed worthy of excommunication by the fathers [EXCOMMUNICATION; PENITENCE]. Bingham refers to a similar provision made by the Council of Clermont in its second canon, but this is, apparently, an error. [S. J. E.]

MORTIFICATION (mortificatio, νέκρωσις). Under this head it is intended to give some account of the practices adopted at various times by Christians, to "mortify" or deaden "their members which are upon the earth." A general account of the progress of ascetic ideas has already been given under ASCETICISM.

I. MORTIFICATION IN REGARD TO BATHING, CLOTHES, SHELTER, REST, AND FOOD.—To cast ashes upon the head, to abstain from bathing and even from washing, to lie on the bare ground, to wear dirty and ragged clothing—all these were methods of mortification practised by various ascetics. Jerome, for instance (Epist. 77 ad Ocean. c. 4), describes the dishevelled hair, the sallow face, the dirty hands, the unclean neck, of Fabiola performing her penance; of himself he says (Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 7) that his limbs were scarred and rough with the use of sackcloth, while his unwashed skin was black as that of an Ethiopian; and again (Epist. 14 ad Heliod. c. 10) he asks, what need there can be for one who is washed in Christ ever to wash again? Palladius (Lausiaca, cc. 142, 143) relates of the anchoress Sylvania, that for sixty years she never washed, except her hands for the reception of the Eucharist. Even at a much earlier period, Hegesippus relates of St. James the Just (in Euseb. H. E. ii. 23) that he neither anointed himself with oil nor used the bath. Several of the early rules of nuns, as those of Augustine (c. 12), Caesarius (c. 29), Leander (c. 10), discourage the use of the bath, as an indulgence only to be granted to sick persons. Jerome refers (Epist. 77, c. 2) to Fabiola's deliberate preference of the poorest and meanest clothes to robes of silk, and (Epist. 54 ad Furiam, c. 7) deliberately lays down the principle, that the fouler a penitent is, the fairer is he—"poenitens quo faedior, eo pulchrior." Some ascetics allowed the hair to grow unkempt and uncared for; on the other hand, the cutting off the hair of the head was practised as an ascetic disfigurement, a very wide-spread custom, as an indication of mourning [HAIR, WEARING OF, p. 755; TONSURE]. It was naturally a special mortification for women; in the 4th century (A.D. 370) the Council of Gangra (c. 17) anathematizes women who cut off their hair from mistaken asceticism. At about the same period Jerome (Epist. 147 ad Sabinianum) testifies that virgins or widows on entering a nunnery offered their hair to be cut off by the superior. Optatus of Mileve (de Schism. Donat. i. 6) and Ambrose (ad Virg. Lapsam, c. 8) blame the custom, which evidently existed in the Western as well as the Eastern churches, of nuns cutting their hair on entrance into a convent. In the capitularies of Charles the Great (vii. c. 310) the cutting off the hair is only prescribed for penitents. Somewhat different from the purely ascetic view is the cutting off her hair by a woman to avoid the love of a particular person (Isidore of Pelusium, Epist. ii. 53; compare Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. ii. 592).

The early Christian Fathers earnestly protest, as is natural and right, against luxury and ostentation in dress; but the fury of asceticism sometimes went far beyond all moderation. Some fanatics passed their lives in absolute nakedness, like that hermit of the Sketic Desert, the sight of whom convinced Macarius that he had not attained the highest pitch of ascetic austerities; the Boσkoι or "Grazers" were probably not very far removed from this state (Sozom. H. E. vi. 33; Evagrius, i. 21). Sulpicius Severus (Dial. i. 17) mentions a monk of Sinai who for fifty years had no other clothing than his own hair; and the like is reported of Onuphrius and Sophronius, and many others. In the West too, similar aberrations are recorded; the famous Spanish monk Fructuosus († 675), for instance, is said to have lived for a long period of penance in a cave, like a wild beast (Vita S. Fructuosi, in Acta SS., April 16; ii. p. 432). A common method of producing discomfort was wearing next the skin the rough HAIRCLOTH, of which sacks were commonly made. [SACKCLOTH.]

Going barefoot was from ancient times an ascetic practice. [SHOES.]

Attempts to confine sleep and necessary rest within the narrowest possible limits have been made so long as ascetic life has been practised at all. Many of the ancient Egyptian hermits attempted to banish sleep for long periods, either by standing in prayer or by various kinds of bodily exertion. Macarius, the younger, is said to have succeeded in remaining without shelter and without sleep for twenty days and nights (Palladii Laus. c. 20, p. 722). Dorotheus the Theban carried stones all day long for the building of cells, and at night employed himself in making ropes of palm-bark, never lying down to rest (Laus. c. 2). The "adamantine" Origen attempted to banish sleep by hard study. The monks of Tabennae, under the rule of Pachomius (art. 50), slept in a kind of coffin, so arranged that they were unable to lie down at full length; others, mentioned by Cassian (Collat. i. 23; xviii. 1; Instit. iv. 13), used for beds only mats (mattae, ψαθοι) of reeds or straw. The more rigorous ascetics lay on the bare ground; thus Jerome says of himself (Epist. 22, ad Eustoch. c. 7), that when sleep crept over him in spite of himself, he dashed his skeleton frame on the ground; and Paulinus tells us of St. Martin of Tours (Vita, iv. 72) that the bare ground sufficed for his light slumbers. Nor were the feeble sex wanting in such austerities; Gregory of Nazianzus tells us (Orat. 11 [al. 8], c. 13) how his sister Gorgonia laid her tender limbs on the ground; and Jerome glorifies his friend Paula (Epist. 108, c. 15) for refusing the indulgence of a bed even in severe fever, and choosing to sleep on the hard earth, with sackcloth spread under her. Benedict allowed for his monks (Regula, c. 55) a mat, a blanket, a rug, and a pillow (matta, sagum, laena, et capitale); they were to sleep in their clothes and girdles (Reg. c. 22). Benedict's rule furnished the general type of monkish bedding for many generations. In all monasteries sleep was abbreviated by the necessity of rising for the offices of the night or early morning [HOURS OF PRAYER; VIGILS].

The custom of living without any habitation whatever began, as was natural, in those regions of the East, where for the greater part of the year it is possible to pass the night in the open air without risk. Theodoret (Hist. Rel.) gives many examples of hermits of Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and Mesopotamia, who spent their lives in the manner of John the Baptist in the wilderness. Even women endured this rude life, as Marana and Cyra (Theod. H. R. c. 29), and the probably fabulous Mary of Egypt, who is said (Rosweyde's Vitae Patrum, i. 18, p. 388) to have passed forty-seven years in the wilderness to the east of Jordan without the shelter of a roof and without intercourse with mankind. Many ascetics exposed themselves on bare rocks or peaks of mountains, or on pillars built for the purpose, to the heat of the sun and to all the winds of Heaven. Pillar saints were divided into στυλῖται and κιονῖται, the former of whom lived on the bare platform which formed the capital of the pillar, while the latter had a hut constructed for shelter. Some hermits lived on trees (δενδρίται), as Addas of Mesopotamia (Moschus, Pratum Spirit. c. 70); many lived in caves (σπηλαιώται), as the Egyptian monks Elias, Pityrion, Solomon, Dorotheus, Capito, and Elpidius (Palladius, Laus. cc. 51, 74, 96-99); some submitted to be walled up in their narrow dwellings (χαστοί, ἐγκλειστοί, reclusi), as Salamanus (Theod. H. R. c. 19) and Macarius Romanus (Vita, c. 21, in Rosweyde Vitae Patrum, p. 230); the latter believed that he continued at least three years in this condition, but the whole narrative shews a disordered mind. In the more rigorous climate of Western Europe the kind of exposure which is possible in Egypt and Palestine was soon discovered to be destructive to life; hence in this region even cave-dwellers are comparatively rare; hermits could not exist without some kind of shelter, however scanty. Recluses were, however, not very uncommon.

Insufficient or distasteful food is a very common form of mortification. For the principal ecclesiastical prescriptions as to time and manner of fasting, see FASTING, LENT, STATIONES. With regard to the fasting of professed ascetics, we may remark that a much greater rigour of abstinence is possible in the milder regions of the East than in our ruder climate. Several Eastern ascetics lived wholly on uncooked food, as (e.g.) Ammonius (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 12, p. 716; Apollo, ib. c. 52, p. 742). The principal founders of Eastern Monachism—Anthony, Hilarion, and Pachomius—were men of excessively mortified life; the latter was taught by his master, Palaemon, to maintain life on bread and salt alone, without oil or wine (Vita, c. 6, in Rosweyde, p. 115); but they did not seek to compel their monks to emulate their own austerity. Pachomius forbade his monks to use wine and "liquamen," but he allowed them daily, at least, one meal of cooked food, with rations of bread, that they might be able to endure their labour (Vita, c. 22). Flesh meat was in no case included in the viands—not an insupportable hardship in the climate of Egypt; the bread was the "paximatum"—the twice baked bread or biscuit—which Cassian (Collat. ii. 19) informs us was the usual food of the Egyptian hermits of his time. The daily allowance for a monk was (according to Cassian) two cakes of this bread, weighing together about a pound troy. On fast days only half this allowance was issued. In Lent we read of some of the monks of Tabennae fasting for two, three, or even five days without intermission. The younger Macarius is said to have taken no more than four or five ounces of bread daily (Lausiaca,

• See Alteserrae Asceticon, v. ii.

c. 20, p. 722); Hilarion to have lived from his thirty-first to his thirty-fifth year on a daily allowance of about six ounces of barley bread (Jerome, Vita Hil. c. 6); Marcellus of Cyprus, on the Euphrates, to have taken no other food in a day than his evening meal of three ounces of bread (Theodoret, Hist. Rel. c. 3). In a colder and damper climate such excessive abstinence was, of course, impracticable. "We are Gauls," said the monks of St. Martin (Sulpic. Severus, Dial. i. 4, § 6), "and it is inhuman to compel us to live like angels." Such considerations probably compelled Benedict, in drawing up his statutes for the monastery of Monte Cassino, to content himself with a moderate dietary; the scanty portion of bread on which an exceptional person like Macarius subsisted was not to be the rule for a whole community. He allowed (Reg. c. 39) a pound of bread for each man per day, with two different "made dishes" (cocta duo pulmentaria), that if any man could not eat the one he might take the other. When fruit or fresh pulse was to be had, a third course of these might be added. In case of unusually hard labour, the abbat might order a more generous diet. The flesh of four-footed beasts was altogether forbidden, except for the sick and infirm; fish and fowl were allowed. With regard to wine, Benedict believed that one "hemina"—about half an English pint—of wine per day was sufficient for each man; but, though he allowed this, he evidently preferred total abstinence (Reg. c. 40). The rule of St. Benedict became the standard of Western monachism, which, however, constantly tended to fall away from the severity of its first estate, and was from time to time recalled to its old rigour, or even more than its old rigour, by such reformers as Benedict of Aniane.

Abstinence from wine was commonly practised by ascetics. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. c. 6, p. 850) deprecates the use of wine by the Christian sage, and he does also that of flesh; abstinence from wine is one of the practices which Eusebius (H. E. vi. 3, § 12) mentions as having injured the health of the ascetic Origen. Some of the Gnostic sects abstained altogether from wine, and the Encratites, in particular, thought it the "blood of the evil spirit."

II. SPECIAL KINDS OF MORTIFICATION.—1. Use of the Cross. Among the methods of mortification must be included the stamping or impressing crosses on the flesh in a painful manner, the expanding the arms in the attitude of one crucified, and the bearing a heavy cross of wood.

The first of these may perhaps have originated from a literal interpretation of the expression of St. Paul (Gal. vi. 17), "I bear in my body the marks (στίγματα) of the Lord Jesus." St. Rhadegund († 587), to take one instance, to give vividness to her conception of the Passion, used to lay a metal cross, heated in the fire, on various parts of her body (Venant. Fort. Vita, iii. c. 21). To be "crucified with Christ" has sometimes been attempted by rapt enthusiasts in the most literal sense. But a more common kind of self-torture was that of standing with outstretched arms, in the attitude of one crucified. This was practised within our period, both as a form of ordeal (stare vel vadere ad crucem) and as a part of monastic discipline. The way of applying the former, seems to have been that accuser and accused took their stand in the cruciform attitude, and the one who first dropped his arms was adjudged to have failed to prove the charge or to vindicate his innocence, as the case might be. Thus, in a matrimonial case, husband and wife were ordered "exire ad crucem" (Capit. Vermeri. 17; Baluze, Capitularia, i. 164). The remaining for long periods with the arms expanded, as a form of penance, originally a merely monastic practice, was introduced in the 8th century by the rule of Chrodegang into the canonical life. St. Lambert (about A.D. 700) is said to have nearly lost his life in consequence of having been compelled to stand in the attitude of one crucified against a stone cross, in the court of his monastery, during a cold winter's night (Vita S. Lamberti in Canisius, Var. Lectt. II. i. p. 140). St. Austreberta is related (Vita, § 15, in Acta SS. Feb. 10) to have endured a similar penance. More particular precepts as to this matter belong to a later age. Cassian († c. 445) mentions (Collat. viii. 3) certain Egyptian ascetics who carried about with them a heavy cross of wood; a practice which, he says, occasioned more laughter than respect. The practice seems to have become more common in the Middle Ages.

2. The practice of wearing chains or rings of iron, which has existed among Brahmins and Buddhists from a high antiquity, is found also in the Christian Church. Gregory of Nazianzus (Carm. 47) mentions monks who labour under never-ceasing iron fetters, wearing away the evil of their nature as their flesh is worn away. Epiphanius (Expositio Fidei, Opp. i. 1106 d) blames monks who went about in public with neck-rings of iron; and Jerome (Epist. 22 ad Eustochium) bids his friend beware of those who went about barefoot, laden with chains, with long hair and beard and dirty black mantle, to be seen of men. The hermit Apollo in the Thebaid wore chains, as Rufinus (Vitae Patr. i. 7) informs us; Theodoret cannot say too much of those chain-wearers, whose story he tells in the Historia Religiosa. The well-known Symeon of the Pillar was for some time chained to the rock on which he lived by a long chain fixed to his foot; afterwards, on his pillar, he wore for thirty years a heavy chain hanging from his neck; his iron collar, the historian Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. c. 13) says that he had seen with his own eyes. Many other instances of men wearing heavy chains or rings may be seen in Theodoret's Historia Religiosa. See also the accounts of the Abbat Senoch of Tours, in Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patr. c. 15), and of St. Radegund (Vita, iii. c. 21).

From the 6th century onward we find the wearing of chains and the like prescribed as a penance. Homicides of their own kindred were sentenced either to an oppressive weight of chains, or to wear an iron band round the body made from the blade of the sword with which the homicide was committed. This punishment Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Conf. c. 87) tells us was endured by a fratricide, who also bore heavy chains. Charlemagne (Capit. Aquisgran. c. 77, in Baluze, i. 239) in 789 thought it necessary to issue a caution against vagrants who went about in irons (nudi cum ferro) which they pretended to wear for penance sake. Unchaste priests were not uncommonly sentenced to wear rings or hoops of iron round their arms or bodies.

3. Bodily Pain and Disfigurement. The voluntary self-wounding of the Baal priests and other pagan hierophants was not altogether unknown in the Christian Church, though it had a less orgiastic character. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, in his Epistola Synodica to the bishops of Palestine and Cyprus (Hieron. Opp. i. 543, ed. Vallarsi), reprobrates the conduct of some who, he says, mutilated themselves with the knife, thinking that they shewed religion and humility in going about with scarred forehead and cropped ears; one man had even bitten off a part of his tongue, to prove the timidity with which some served God. Ammonius the monk cut off one of his ears and threatened to bite out his tongue; but this was not from ascetic motives, but to render himself ineligible for the office of bishop. He was, however, in the habit of burning himself with a red-hot iron from pure asceticism (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca, c. 12, p. 716). Another Nitrian monk, the younger Macarius, is said to have exposed his naked body for six months to the stings of venomous flies to atone for the anger and impatience with which he had once crushed a fly that stung him (Laus. c. 20, p. 722); and Symeon, the pillar-saint, to have allowed vermin to eat into his body for a considerable time (Vita, c. 7, in Roswey, p. 172). The Greek Menologion (Jan. 4) relates that St. Apollinaris of Egypt used to expose herself to the stings of gnats and gadflies; and Johannes Moschus (Pratum Spirituale, c. 141) voluntarily exposed himself to the stings of the countless insects of the hot Jordan valley, thinking so to escape the never-dying worm and the flame that is not quenched. A sister of the famous nunnery of St. Bridget at Kildare is said to have burned her feet over a fire which she had secretly lighted in her cell (Vita S. Brigidæ, c. 11, in Surius, Feb. 1). Martinianus scorched his whole body in the flames of a fire of sticks, with a view of counteracting unlawful passion. And these are but specimens taken from the crowd of records of self-torture which may be found in various hagiologies. The discipline of the scourge will be treated separately [WHIPPING].

4. Cold. Ascetics frequently attempted to cool the burning passion which possessed them by exposure to cold. Thus the English monk Drithelm is said (Bede, H. E. v. 12) to have remained immersed in a stream during the recitation of many psalms and prayers. Of James, the disciple of Maro, it is related (Theodoret, Hist. Rel. c. 21) that during his long devotions in the open air he was sometimes so covered with snow that he had to be dug out. Similar austerities are related of many other ascetics, both male and female. Abraam of Carrhæ is said (Theod. H. R. c. 17) to have held fire an altogether superfluous luxury.

5. The SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of ascetics will be noticed under that heading, and the ascetic views of continence under VIRGINITY. See also CELIBACY.

MORTMAIN. The law of mortmain which, in the English use of the term, is a law restricting the acquisition of property by permanent corporations, especially of a religious character, is based upon two distinct considerations of policy; one that of preventing property being withdrawn for ever from the general market (that is, being grasped by the "dead hand" of an artificial legal personality); the other, that of opposing obstacles to fraudulent or extortionate impositions on the part of religious advisers. There is no doubt that both these lines of policy are distinctly represented in, if not directly copied from, the Roman law at its ripest maturity, and the later legislation of Christian emperors. Ulpian (circ. A.D. 200) says "we are not permitted to appoint the gods as our heirs, with the exception of those in favour of whom either a senatus consultum, or imperial constitutions, have conceded a special privilege, as, for instance, Tarpeian Jove." The policy of this prohibition may have been the same as that by which Justinian, three centuries later, enacted that, where a testator nominated the Lord Jesus Christ as his heir or part heir and added no limiting words, the inheritance should accrue to the church of the testator's domicile; and similarly where an archangel or martyr was nominated an heir; and where there was no such church the sacred edifices of the metropolis should profit from the inheritance (L. 26 (c. I. 3)). Savigny (System, vol. ii. b. ii. c. 2) has adverted to the real meaning of this policy, which was to secure that the benefit and responsibility should be vested in concrete persons distinctly cognisable by law.

The law with respect to collegia, that is, corporate bodies consisting of at least three persons (L. 85. D. L. 16), throws, perhaps, the greatest light on some of the aspects of early mortmain law. As early as A.D. 117-138, we see that collegia could not take inheritances unless they were specially privileged for this purpose (L. 8. C. (vi. 24)). A passage of Paulus (A.D. circ. 200) alludes to a senatus consultum of the time of Marcus Antoninus permitting the legacies to be made in favour of collegia, supposing the collegia were lawfully constituted (L. 20. D. xxiv. 5)), and with respect to the constitution of these bodies it appears that a religious purpose was presumed a legitimate object ("religionis causâ coire non prohibetur; dum tamen per hoc non fiat contra senatus consultum quo illicita corpora arcentur" (L. 1. D. xlvii. 22)). Nevertheless, it appears from a constitution of one of the Antonines in Justinian's code that the corporate body of the Jews in Antioch was not reckoned a legal association, and could not sue for a legacy which had been left it.

As respects the claims of the Christian church to inherit, or even to own, property, it must have depended at first upon whether the local religious societies were or were not treated as legitimate collegia. Gibbon (c. xv.), indeed, adduces an interesting story, told in the life of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222-235), of a dispute in respect of land between the society of Christians and the victuallers (popinari), as a proof that property had already legally vested in the Christian church.

But it was not till Constantine's Edict of Milan (A.D. 313), by which he restored to the Christians the property of which they had been bereft in the late persecutions, that their right of ownership in land was formally recognised. This edict prepared the way for the more celebrated one of the year A.D. 321, by which anyone "was to have full power of leaving by will whatever property he chose to the church and its governing bodies." It was within fifty years of this time that the first unmistakable mortmain law was enacted by Valentinian the Elder (Cod. Th. xvi. 20). It forbids all sorts of ecclesiastical persons from entering on the property of widows or wards. It prevents them from acquiring any benefit from the donation of the wife of any one who, under pretext of religion, has privately joined himself to them. The whole gift is to be so completely invalid that the offending person cannot take anything from the same quarter either by gift or by testament. Any attempted gifts lapsed to the treasury.

The next law is twenty years later (Cod. Th. xvi. 28). After prescribing the conditions under which a woman may become a deaconess, it enacts that she shall make neither the church, the clergy, nor the poor her heirs. Any attempted act in violation of the law would be invalid. The following language of the law may almost be supposed to have supplied the policy and the terms of an English mortmain act. "Immo si quid ab his morienti fuerit extortum nec tacito fideicommissio aliquid clericis in fraudem venerabilis sanctionis callidâ arte aut probrosâ cujuspiam conhibentiâ deferatur: extorres sint ab omnibus quibus inhiaverant bonis: et si quid forte per epistolam, codicillum, donationem, testamentum, quolibet denique detegitur ergo eas quas hac sanctione submovimus id nec in iudicium devocetur: sed vel ex intestato is qui sibi competere intellegit, statuti hujus definitione succedat." Women offending against the law are forbidden to enter a church or to receive the communion, and any bishop not enforcing these penalties is to be deposed. About two months later this constitution was partially repealed, to the extent that deaconesses were allowed to alienate moveables in their lifetime. A controversy subsequently arose as to the true import of this repealing statute. The emperor Marcianus held that its effect was to sweep away all restrictions on dispositions in favour of the church. The merits of the controversy are lucidly expounded by Gothofred in his note to the passage in the Theodosian Code.

We have the advantage of studying this legislation in a more impressive form than is presented by the bare letter of the law. St. Ambrose writes: "Nobis etiam privatae successionis emolumenta recentibus legibus denegantur. Et nemo conqueritur. Non enim putamus injuriam qui dispendium non dolemus" (Libel. ad Ker. relat. Sym.). St. Jerome, again, writes still more explicitly: "It shames one to confess that idol-priests, mimes, charioteers, and harlots can take inheritances, and only the clergy and monks are disabled from taking them; and it is not by persecutors but by Christian princes that they are disabled. Not that I complain of the law, but I lament that we have deserved the law. Caution is good; but how has the wound come which calls for the caution? The caution of the law is provident and safe; and yet even thus our avarice is not restrained, not by secret trusts we evade the law" (Ep. 2, ad Nepot.). A curious allusion to the current legislation is also contained in a letter of Gregory

Nazianzen, in which he beseeches Aërius and Alypius to pay the legacy left by their mother to the church. He says, Τὸς ἔξω ῥίψαντες νόμους τοῖς ἡμετέροις δουλῶσθαι (Ep. lxi.)

By Justinian's time the policy of restricting gifts by legacy or otherwise to religious and charitable institutions seems chiefly to have been based upon the importance of securing due deliberation and publicity. Thus a distinction was drawn by a constitution of Justinian's between gifts to religious and charitable institutions of less and of more than 500 solidi in value; only the latter requiring to be publicly registered (L. 19; C. (1. 2)). It also appears from the sixty-fifth Novel (though this novel is imperfectly preserved) that, in the case of granting immovable property to a church, the donor or testator is required to use very precise words in order to determine for what distinct object or objects his gift was intended, whether the substance or only the income of the property was to be rendered available for them, and whether a sale was or was not to be made. It may be concluded then that all jealousy of corporate bodies as owners, and all apprehension of frauds perpetrated on weak-minded testators, were, during this period, in abeyance. The progressive triumph of the church and its prominence in civil government may likewise account for the absence of distinct mortmain legislation up to and including Charlemagne's period. The utmost aim of Charlemagne's Capitularies in this respect was to secure that religious gifts were made with sufficient deliberation. Such a precaution is contained in the capitulary of A.D. 803 (Addita ad legem Salicam), "qui res suas pro animâ suâ ad casam Dei tradere voluerit domi traditionem faciat coram testibus legitimis."

MOSAICS IN CHRISTIAN ART.—It is not the purpose of this article to enter into the history of the form of pictorial and architectural decoration known as "mosaic." Any discussion on the origin of the art, the countries where it was first employed, its introduction into Greece and Rome, its various forms, and the names by which they were known, would be out of place here. All the information required on these and kindred topics will be found elsewhere, especially in the late Sir Digby Wyatt's excellent treatises, The Art of Mosaic, and The Geometrical Mosaics of the Middle Ages. Neither do we propose to enter on the vexed question of the orthography and derivation of the name. After all that has been written upon it the true etymology of the word "mosaic" still remains a matter of speculation, and perhaps can never be determined. Suffice it to say that by the term "mosaic" we understand the art of arranging small cubes or tesserae of different substances, either naturally hard or artificially hardened, and of various colours, so as to produce an ornamental pattern or a historical or symbolical picture. The materials of these tesserae were at first chiefly different coloured marbles, hard stones, pieces of brick and tile, earthenware, &c., the natural colours being used to form the pattern. Subsequently pastes of glass coloured artificially were almost exclusively employed. These, according to Sir Digby Wyatt, were "what is now generally called terrazzo di smalto; i.e. mosaic composed of minute portions of silex and alumina, vitrified by heat and coloured by the addition of one of the metallic oxides."^a

The gilt tesserae used so profusely for the background of the pictures were formed by applying two thin plates of glass with a film of gold leaf between them to a cube of earthenware, and then vitrifying the whole in a furnace.

The discovery of the mode of making these coloured tesserae of vitreous paste may be said to have created the art of mosaic decoration in the ecclesiastical form in which it is chiefly known to us. It put into the hands of the designers the power of producing all varieties of colour, from the most delicate to the most intense, essential for the truthful representation of the subjects; while its brittleness enabled them to obtain pieces of any size and shape required, at a cost far smaller than that of the precious marbles; and, "in case of deterioration from dirt or other causes, it can," as Mr. Layard has observed, "be restored and cleaned without any loss of character or detriment to the original work." (Paper read before Roy. Inst. of Brit. Arch.)

To these recommendations may be added its durability. From the nature of the substances employed mosaic pictures are practically indestructible, except by direct violence. It may be styled, in the words of Ghirlandajo, "the only painting for eternity." No form of pictorial art therefore can be regarded so suitable for the decoration of ecclesiastical buildings, in which the permanence of every detail should symbolize the perpetuity of the faith. The subdued richness of this mode of decoration, especially when gold grounds are extensively used, and at the same time its grand and solemn character when used in large masses, give mosaic an appropriateness for the ornamentation of sacred edifices which was very early appreciated. No sooner had Christianity emerged from the hiding-places of the catacombs, and been triumphantly installed by Constantine as the religion of the empire, than mosaic began to receive that amazing development which allows us truly to style it essentially a Christian art. Pliny indeed distinctly tells us that mosaic-work, which had been originally employed almost exclusively for the decoration of floors, had in his time recently passed upwards and taken possession of the vaulted ceilings, and that glass pastes had begun to be used, "pulsa . . . ex humo pavimenta in cameras transiere, e vitro: novitium et hoc inventum." (Plin. Hist. Nat. lib. xxxvi. c. 64.) But as Kugler correctly states (Handbook of Painting: Italian Schools, part i. p. 20, note), the middle links between the small cabinet pieces of wall-mosaic, almost exclusively of a decorative character, exhibited by the fountain recesses at Pompeii and in a few examples at Rome, and the vast Christian wall-pictures, are entirely wanting. We are so entirely destitute of examples of such decoration on a large scale where we should have most looked for it, on the vaults of the Imperial Thermae, the Palace of the Caesars, or other contemporaneous edifices, that "we are almost led to recognise mosaic-work as we see it in the basilicas, as a spontaneous development called forth by a newly awakened religious life," and may with him be "almost tempted to believe that historical mosaic-painting of the grander style first started into existence in the course of the 4th century, and suddenly took its wide spread, borne on the advancing tide of the triumphant Christian faith." At the commencement of the art the designers were evidently restricted by no conventional rules, but were left to follow their own genius in the selection of subjects and their arrangement. By degrees, however, a recognised system of symbolic decoration was adopted, which became stereotyped and prevailed from the 5th century onwards through the whole of southern Christendom, displaying its last examples before the final extinction of the art in the 12th century, in the gorgeous wall-pictures of St. Mark's, Venice, and the mosaics of the Royal Chapel at Palermo and the cathedrals of Monreale and Cefalù in Sicily.

In the earliest mosaics the position of chief dignity, the centre of the conch of the apse, was always occupied by Christ, either standing or enthroned, supported on either hand by the apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul standing next Him, together with the patron saints and founders of the church. Subsequently the place of our Lord was usurped by the patron saint (as at St. Agnes at Rome), or by the Blessed Virgin holding the Divine Child in her lap (as at Parenzo and St. Mary in Domnica). A hand holding a crown is usually seen issuing from the clouds above the chief figure, a symbol of the Supreme Being. The river Jordan flows at the feet of Christ, separating the church triumphant above from the church militant below. In a zone below we usually find in the centre the Holy Lamb, the head surrounded with a cruciform nimbus, standing on a mount from which gush the four rivers of Paradise, symbolizing the four evangelists. Trees, usually palm trees, laden with fruit, typify the Tree of Life, while the phoenix with its radiant plumage symbolizes the soul of the Christian passing through death to a new and glorified life. On either side six sheep, types of the apostles, and through them of believers in general, issue from the gates of the two holy cities, Jerusalem and Bethlehem. [BETHLEHEM, p. 201.] On the western face of the great arch of the apse or the arch of triumph we see at the apex a medallion bust of Christ, or the Holy Lamb, or, which is very frequent, the book with seven seals elevated on a jewelled throne. On either side are ranged angels, the evangelistic symbols, and the seven golden candlesticks in a horizontal band, the spandrels below containing the twenty-four white-robed elders of the Apocalypse offering their crowns with arms outstretched in adoration to the Lamb. In the larger basilicas, where a transept separates the nave from the apse, a second transverse arch is introduced, the face of which is also adorned with subjects taken from the Apocalypse. That at St. Praxedes (see post) represents the heavenly Jerusalem with the redeemed in long line entering the gates, which are guarded by angels.

^a The Greek word for the tesserae or cubes of which mosaics are formed was ψηφίδες, a diminutive of ψήφος, a pebble. In the Acts of the Second Council of Nice the destruction of the mosaic pictures by the Iconoclasts is thus described: ὅσα μὲν ἐκ ψηφίδος ὄντα ἐξουρῶσαν (Labbe, Council. vol. vii. col. 580); and again, in the order to set up sacred pictures, we read, τὰς πεντάς καὶ ἀγίας εἰκόνας τὰς ἐκ χρωμάτων καὶ ψηφίδος καὶ ἐτέρας ὕλης ἐπιτηδεύς ἔχουσας (Ibid. col. 355). The mosaic wall-picture of Theodorice in the forum at Naples, the gradual disintegration of which was regarded as so ominous a sign, is described by Procopius as ἐκ ψηφίδων τινῶν ξυγκειμένη μικρῶν μὲν ἐσάγων, χροαῖς δὲ βεβαμμένον σχεδὸν τι ἀπάσαις (De Bell. Goth. lib. i. c. 24). It would be hardly possible to describe a mosaic picture in more accurate language. The Saracens borrowed the name, together with the art and materials of mosaic work, from Byzantium. The Arabic term for the mosaic tesserae was sfefsis or sfefysa. "When at the commencement of the 8th century peace was concluded between Byzantium and the caliph Walid, this latter potentate stipulated for a certain quantity of sfefysa for the decoration of the new mosque at Damascus. In the middle of the 10th century also Romanus II. sent the caliph Abderrhaman III. the materials for the mosaics of the Kibla in the mosque at Cordova." (Kugler, i. p. 58, note.)

The detailed description given by Paulinus of the mosaics executed by his direction for the basilica of St. Felix and the "Basilica Fundana" at Nola early in the 5th century (Epist. ad Sever. 32) indicates points of resemblance and difference with the subsequently recognised type. The whole representation was strictly symbolical, and the human figure seems to have been rigidly excluded, so that it would speak only to the initiated. He describes the Lamb standing on the mount from which issue the four rivers typical of the Gospels, the symbol of the Father above, the lofty cross surmounted by the crown occupying the chief place, which are familiar to us in other mosaics. But, what we do not see in any existing mosaics, the Holy Spirit, under the form of a Dove, was represented as descending on the symbolic Lamb; the apostles were also depicted as doves (a symbol reproduced many centuries later in the apse of St. Clement at Rome), and in addition to the customary sheep as many goats appeared on the left of the Saviour, symbolizing the last judgment. We cannot sufficiently regret the loss of these very remarkable early works.^b

The catacombs present very few examples of mosaic work. There are fragments of a mosaic picture of considerable size on the soffit of the arch of an arcosolium in the catacomb of St. Hermes. From the engravings given by Marchi (Monum. delle Arti Crist. Primit., tav. xlvii., described p. 257) we see that it must have been a very rude performance, the drawing bad, and the execution coarse. The portions remaining exhibit the raising of Lazarus, Daniel in the lions' den, and the paralytic carrying his bed, only differing from the ordinary catacomb frescoes in the material employed. The mosaic cubes, according to Mr. Parker (Archæology of Rome, Catacombs, p. 110), are entirely of glass paste, not of marble. Marangoni (Cose Gentilesche, p. 461) preserves the record of an arcosolium in the cemetery of St. Callistus decorated in mosaic, with our Lord seated between St. Peter and St. Paul, also seated. Two sepulchral mosaics from the same catacomb are preserved in the sacristy of St. Mary in Trastevere, one representing birds, probably, according to Mr. Parker, of the 2nd century, the other, representing the miraculous draught of fishes, of the 3rd (Parker, u. s.

Mosaics, p. 3). Two mosaic busts in circular medallions, from the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, discovered in 1656, are preserved in the Chigi Library. One represents a young man, Flavius Julius Julianus, with short black hair; the other his deceased wife, Maria Simplicia Rustica. She, as one deceased, is represented in the attitude of prayer, with outstretched hands (Dr. Rossi, Mosaici Cristiani delle Chiese di Roma) Perret (vol. iv. pl. vii. No. 3) gives a mosaic fragment, depicting a fighting cock, also from a catacomb. This scanty list comprises nearly, if not quite, all the catacomb mosaics recorded.

The earliest known examples of mosaic art used for the decoration of a sacred building are those of the 4th century, which cover the waggon-roof of the circular aisle of the church of St. Constantia, in the immediate vicinity of the basilica of St. Agnes, outside the walls of Rome. There is sufficient reason to believe that this edifice was erected by Constantine the Great either as a baptistery to the adjacent basilica (BAPTISTERY, vol. i. p. 165), or after his death as a place of sepulture for his two daughters, Constantia, or Constantina, who died A.D. 354, and Helena, the wife of Julian, who died A.D. 360. As in the earliest Christian frescoes, the style of art seen in these mosaics is in no way distinguishable from pagan art of the same period. They belong essentially to the class of decorative paintings, and although those who wish to do so may read a Christian symbolism into the vintage scenes which cover the vaults, it is probable that none such was intended. "They have quite the light and gay character of ancient pagan wall decoration, and if they must be considered of Christian origin—the vine and vintage scenes having been frequently adopted as Christian emblems—they are probably the earliest Christian wall-mosaics that have been preserved" (Dr. Appell, Christian Mosaic Pictures, p. 6). These mosaics form twelve equal compartments, the opposite bays having analogous decorations. The ground of the whole is white, instead of the blue or gold which subsequently universally prevailed. Bays 1, 2, 12 have ordinary geometrical designs with octagons and crosses without flowers or figures. Bays 3, 11 have intertwined arabesque wreaths forming small compartments framing airy dancing figures, winged amorini, and richly plumaged birds. Bays 4, 10 contain vintage scenes. Little genii are actively engaged, some gathering grapes, some carting them home, some treading the wine-press. One holds a writhing snake. Birds are fluttering among the branches or pecking the grapes from the vine which gracefully trails over the vault. In the centre is a female bust, perhaps intended for Constantia. (Woodcut No. 2.) (It may be remarked that scenes very similar to these adorn the magnificent red porphyry sarcophagus of Constantia which stood here, now in the Vatican.) Bays 5, 9 are very similar to bays 3, 11. Bays 6, 8, are far the richest of the whole. The vault is covered with boughs of olive and other fruit-bearing trees, with peacocks, guinea fowls, partridges, and other birds interspersed among them, without any attempt at conventionalism. Bay 7, which was probably the most elaborate of the whole, has been modernised. The two side apses (a) (b) contain coarse, ill-drawn mosaics of a much later time (added by pope Hadrian A.D. 772-798), representing Christ and some of the apostles, the latter crouching in distorted attitudes, in defiance of anatomical possibilities. The contrast between the joyous freedom of the earlier designs and the grim melancholy of the later is so marked that it is difficult to conceive how they can have been so frequently attributed to the same period.

No. 2. The Vintage. From St. Constantia. (South Kensington Museum.)

So widespread and complete has been the destruction of the earlier mosaics that the only other work which can be with any probability referred to the time of Constantine is that which decorates the cupola of the church of St. George at Salonika, the ancient Thessalonica. This church is on sufficient grounds assigned by MM. Texier and Pullan to the first sojourn of Constantine at Thessalonica (323). It is a circular building, covered with a dome more than 216 feet in circumference entirely lined with mosaics of the most magnificent character, probably the most extensive work of the kind in superficial area that has come down to us. According to the authorities just quoted this mosaic, which is one of the very few that has survived the fury of the Iconoclasts or of the Mahommedans, covers no less than 9,732 square feet, and it has been calculated to contain more than 36,000,000 tesserae. The light and fanciful architectural designs, vividly recalling the wall frescoes of the Baths of Titus or those at Pompeii, which are so markedly absent from the majority of the Christian mosaics furnish an unmistakable evidence of its early date. The drawing, though conventional and architectonic, is good, the arrangement exceedingly dignified, the colouring rich and harmonious, and the whole effect of the cupola, with its gold ground, extremely gorgeous. The cupola is divided into eight compartments, alternately repeating each other in general design. They present a series of sacred edifices of fantastic architecture, veiled with purple curtains floating in the wind, with richly plumaged birds,—peacocks, ibises, ducks, partridges, curlews, doves, &c.,—perched on the friezes, which are themselves decorated with dolphins, birds, palm trees, and other naturalistic devices. Each of these buildings presents a splendid colonnade, in the centre of which a semi-circular or octagonal apse protected by cancelli retires, or a veiled baldacchino stands, with a burning lamp hanging from the vault above the curtained altar, the whole displaying invaluable evidence of early ritual arrangement. On either side of the altar stands a holy personage, colossal in stature and severe in aspect, in the variously-coloured dress of solemn ceremonial, with his hands elevated and outstretched in prayer. (Woodcut No. 3.) The personages represented, who all bear names famous in the Greek church but less familiar in the West, are (1) over the west door (a) Romanus, a white-bearded presbyter; (b) Eukarpius, a young dark-haired soldier; 2. (to S.) (a) effaced; (b) Ananias, a presbyter; 3. (a) Basiliscus, a soldier; (b) Priscus, a soldier; 4. (a) Philippus, a bishop; (b) Therinus, a soldier; (c) Basiliscus, a beardless youthful layman; 5. effaced; 6. (to N.) (a) Leon, a soldier; (b) Philemon, a flute-player; 7. Onesiphorus, a young beardless soldier; (b) Porphyrius; 8. (a) Cosmas, old, grey-headed and grey-bearded; (b) Damian, young and beardless. These magnificent and most interesting works deserve to be much more widely known and more carefully studied. (They are found well reproduced in chromo-lithograph in Texier and Pullan's Eglises Byzantines, pl. xxx.-xxxiv.; and Nos. 1, 4, 7, 8, are engraved by Mr. Wharton Marriott in his Vestiarium Christianum, pl. xviii.-xxi.) These salonica boasts of another magnificent mosaic in the cupola of St. Sophia, a work of the 6th century, of which we shall speak in its place.

The only other ancient mosaics breathing the spirit of classical art are those of the 5th century, which decorate the quadripartite vaults of the chapels of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, which open out of the Lateran baptistery. These are said to have been apartments in the palace of Constantine, converted into chapels by pope Hilary, A.D. 461-467. The Christian character of these mosaics is shewn by the nimbed Holy Lamb, surrounded by a rich garland of fruit and flowers in the centre of each ceiling; but the decoration with its graceful arabesques, vases of fruit and groups of birds, peacocks, ducks, parrots, red-legged partridges, and doves, and other conventional ornaments, are quite in the classical style of St. Constantia. The ground, however, is gilt, not white, as in that building. On the walls of the chapel of St. John the Baptist are figures of the four Evangelists. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. 74, 75; Parker, Mosaics, p. 16.)

We have purposely described these last mosaics somewhat out of their chronological order on account of their artistic connection with those already described. The very extensive series of mosaics in the church of St. Mary Major, or the Liberian basilica, though somewhat earlier in date, having been executed by the order of Sixtus III., A.D. 432-440, as is expressly stated in the letter of Hadrian I. to the emperor Charlemagne (Labbe, vii. col. 955), and perhaps the most remarkable works of early Christian art, belong to a totally different school. As Lord Lindsay has remarked (History of Christian Art, vol. i. p. 99, Letter ii.), "none stand so isolated; none have had so little influence on the latter ages of its development." The reason of this want of artistic relation with anterior or subsequent works lies probably in the fact that the artists who designed them had formed themselves entirely on the study of classical bas-reliefs, especially those of the columns of Trajan and Antoninus, while their predecessors had taken the frescoes of the baths as their models, and their successors formed their taste in Greece or Byzantium. These very remarkable mosaics consist of two series: viz. (1) those decorating the arch of the tribune, and (2) those ranged along the walls of the nave, occupying what may be called the triforium space. Of these the former series are much the inferior; "straggling in composition," writes Lord Lindsay, "and poorly executed." They have, indeed, little artistic interest except as the earliest known representations of scenes from the early gospel history. As such, it has been remarked that they manifest the difficulty an artist who had only studied in classical schools had in depicting subjects which as yet had no fixed type in Christian art. The pictures accordingly exhibit no distinctly Christian characteristics, or anything that differences them essentially from Pagan subjects. For the first time, it is true, we here see at the apex of the arch, in a medallion, the familiar symbol of the jewelled throne bearing the apocalyptic roll with seven seals, and above the roll a gemmed cross and crown, supported by St. Peter and St. Paul, with the evangelistic symbols on either side, and below it the signature of the builder XYSTVS.EPISCOPVS.PLEBI.DEI. But the scenes of Gospel history depicted below are so entirely unlike the subsequently recognised types that it is not at first sight easy to identify them. These pictures occupy the wall on either side of the arch, and are ranged in five rows. The uppermost row (1) contains to the left (a) the angelic message to Zacharias; (b) the Annunciation; to the right (c) the Presentation in the Temple; (2) the second row contains (d) the Adoration of the Magi [see woodcut, article ANGELS, vol. i. p. 84]; (e) our Lord among the doctors; (3) the third row gives a long subject, (f) the Massacre of the Innocents, extending to both sides of the arch; (4) in the fourth row we see, again for the first time, the two holy cities of Bethlehem and Jerusalem; (5) the fifth, the Faithful figured as sheep. It deserves notice that in these pictures, the only figures besides Christ distinguished by the nimbus are those of the angels and Herod, as if the nimbus were a conventional mark of dignity unconnected with sanctity. The Virgin Mary never has it; at any rate in the original design. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. p. 203; Valentini, la Patriarc. Basilica Liberiana, pl. 61; Parker, Mosaics, p. 15; South Kensington drawings, No. 7445.) Far superior in drawing and grouping are the scenes from the Old Testament which occupy the walls of the nave. Here we recognise the spirit of the antique still lingering, while the distinctly religious idea is almost entirely wanting. They were originally forty-two in number, but are now only twenty-seven. Six were destroyed to form the arches of entrance to the Borghese and Sistine chapels, and nine, lost through accident or decay, have been replaced by paintings. In these, which we may regard as the first and last effort of any extent in dramatic representation, "the composition is often excellent; the attitudes simple and expressive, though they want relief, and the conception is altogether superior to the performance" (Lord Lindsay, u. s. p. 101). The series, which begins at the upper end to the left with the interview of Abraham and Melchizedek, carries on the Old Testament history through the times of Isaac and Jacob, and beginning again at the same end to the right, with the finding of Moses, pursues his history and that of Joshua to the battle of Bethhoron. Some of the historical scenes display real life. In that of the separation of Abraham and Lot, "the figures," writes M. Vitet (Histoire de l'Art)

No. 4. Visit of Angels to Abraham. From St. Maria Maggiore. (South Kensington Museum.)

"express well what they are about. One feels that the two groups are separating. Isaac blessing Jacob has almost the same pose as Raphael has given it in the Loggia; the taking of Jericho, the battle with the Amalekites, also have details which are not without a certain interest." The visit of the angels to Abraham, of which we give a woodcut (No. 4), in which three stages of the story are represented in one picture, has a solemn dignity not unworthy of the subject (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tav. 50-64; Valentini u. s.; Parker, Photogr. 1952-1966; 2038-2058).

There are few ancient works of which the date has been more variously assigned than that of the very remarkable mosaic in the apse of St. Pudentiana on the Esquiline, perhaps the most beautiful in Rome. It has been placed at various epochs from the end of the 4th to the close of the 9th century. The earlier date is with little doubt the correct one. It is true that as we see it now the picture has suffered too much from the hands of restorers to allow us to speak with absolute certainty on the point. But in the remarkable dignity of the composition, the freedom of treatment and correctness of perspective, as well as in the whole drawing grouping and drapery, it has all the essential marks of a living art, and points to a time when the still surviving traditions of the Pagan schools had been quickened with a new spirit. The figures do not, as in the later mosaics, stand in rigid isolation, gazing out into vacancy, but are seated with most calm dignity, "grouped so as to form a picture," and displaying much variety of attitude and individuality of feature. Kugler's verdict is certainly correct, that "even if the building itself be proved to be of more recent date than Siricius, who built the church A.D. 390, still this work at least must have been copied from one much older" (u. s. p. 41). This picture represents Christ enthroned in the centre of a semicircle of Apostles in Roman costumes (two of whom have been lost by modern repairs), each seated in front of an open portal, forming a crescent-shaped cloister with a tiled roof, above which rise the roofs and domes of the heavenly Jerusalem. St. Peter and St. Paul sit on either side of Christ. Behind them stand two female figures of singular dignity and beauty, with martyrs' chaplets in their hands, representing either St. Pudenciana and her sister St. Praxedes, or, according to Garrucci, the church of the circumcision and that of the gentiles. None are nimbed except our Lord. Christ is seated on a richly decorated throne, His right hand is raised in benediction, and in the left He holds a book inscribed Dominus Conservator Ecclesiae Pudencianae. Behind His throne a tall jewelled cross is planted on a mount, and among the clouds which form the background are seen Evangelistic symbols of somewhat large dimensions. We give a woodcut of this very remarkable and beautiful work (No. 5).^c

(Gally Knight, Eccles. Arch. of Italy, vol. i. pl. 23; Labarte, Histoire des Arts Industriels, album, vol. ii. pl. 121; Fontana, Mosaici delle Chiese di Roma, tav. 14; Parker, Photogr. Nos. 280, 1416-1419; South Kensington, No. 7987; Parker, Mosaic Pictures, pp. 23-27, 153.)

Passing over the small remains of the mosaics of St. Sabina, Rome, with the singular "imagines clipeatae," and the noble figures of the churches of the Jews and the Gentiles, entirely Roman in type, character, and costume, c. 424 (Ciampini, u. s. vol. i. c. 21, tab. 48), and the fragments of the once imposing decorations of St. Paul's outside the walls, set up by Leo the Great, A.D. 440-462, mentioned in Hadrian's letter to Charlemagne already referred to, which were almost entirely destroyed in the conflagration of 1823 to the irreparable impoverishment of early Christian art (Kugler, u. s. p. 29; Parker, Mosaics, p. 16; see woodcut, art. CHURCH, vol. i. p. 371), we must now transfer our attention to Ravenna. No city in Italy, Rome hardly excepted, can shew such admirable specimens of this art. They belong chiefly to the earliest and best period, while the principles of classical art were still in living exercise, before the hieratical traditions of the Byzantine school had begun to proscribe all traces of freedom and nature. Nowhere do we find pictorial decoration more intimately allied to architectural arrangements, the two being so closely connected that each appears essential to the completeness of the other. The mosaic works still existing at Ravenna—many, alas! have perished—exhibit four distinct styles of art. The earliest and most classical in style and drawing are those of the lower part of the orthodox baptistery, set up by archbishop Neon, A.D. 430, and those which cover the whole of the interior of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, now known as the church of St. Nazarius and Celsus, A.D. 440. A century later in date, and decidedly inferior in style and execution, though still entirely free from Byzantine stiffness, are those which decorate the domes of the orthodox baptistery, and of the Arian baptistery, which may be ascribed to the same date, c. A.D. 553. We have examples of a third mode of treatment distinct from the other two, in the mosaics of St. Vital, A.D. 547, of the chapel of the archbishop's palace, completed in the same year, and of the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe, built in A.D. 549. "In themselves," writes Mr. Layard (u. s. p. 14), "these mosaics are deserving of the most careful study, as belonging to the best period of early christian mosaic art. They are especially valuable to the architect, as affording some of the finest examples of the treatment of pictorial mosaics, and of the technical qualities of the material." The Ravenna mosaics, though, as we have seen, extending over a period of full a century, and displaying various styles, are evidently productions of one and the same school of art; exhibiting, it is true, a gradual decline from classical dignity and purity of taste, but maintaining on the whole the same high level, both in drawing and design, as well as in harmony of colour: we shall therefore treat them together.^d To commence with the orthodox baptistery erected by bishop Ursus, A.D. 400-410, and decorated with mosaics by archbishop Neon, A.D. 430. This building is internally an octagon, covered with a cupola, and is brilliant with mosaics, almost from floor to roof. The most remarkable of these are the eight prophets; grand majestic figures, draped in white, which occupy the spandrels of the lower tier of arches, upon an oval background of gold enclosed by acanthus leaves which spread out in lovely arabesque scroll-work. To quote a very appreciative description, "the most remarkable individuality, not merely in face but in figure, is preserved in each; and in each there is a distinct expression, life-like and full of character. Found in a pagan building, one would say they represented Roman senators of the sterner republican type, and were portraits. Their actions are essentially different; their draperies cast with that truthful, excellent variety of fold no study of art-examples only could have taught, and the manipulation of light and shade is perfect."

^c Labarte considers that the Apostles and female figures are works of the 4th century; but that the figure of Christ and the Evangelistic symbols belong to a later epoch. (Arts Industriels, iv. 172.) This is also the opinion of Vitet. Garrucci also attributes this mosaic to pope Siricius, A.D. 390.

The ornamentation of the cupola is divided into two zones encircling the central picture representing the baptism of our Lord. The lower zone, which may be ascribed to the earlier period, presents a series of throned crosses; altars bearing the open gospels; episcopal chairs beneath shell-roofed niches; and tombs surmounted with garlands, set within an architectural framework of almost Pompeian elegance. This lower zone springs from a profusion of acanthus leaves, on which parrots, doves, and other birds are perched. The upper zone, containing the twelve apostles, together with the central picture of the baptism, shew indications of restoration at a later and inferior period of art (c. A.D. 553), though still preserving much of antique dignity and grace. The apostles, colossal in size, robed in gold and white drapery floating in the wind in graceful folds, advance with rapid step towards the central figure, bearing in their hands jewelled crowns. The life and movement of the advancing figures present a striking contrast to the motionless repose of later mosaics. In the picture of the baptism, which fills the centre of the cupola, Christ is entirely nude, immersed in the river up to the middle. The Baptist, half nude, pours water on the Saviour's head, on which the holy dove is descending. An incongruous relic of paganism appears in the form of the river-god Jordan, rising from his stream and offering a napkin as an act of homage. The mosaics of this building stand in the very highest rank among similar works for the richness of the ornamentation, the harmony and delicacy of the colouring, the excellence of the drawing, and the dignity of the composition. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 25; von Quast, Ravenna, taf. i. pp. 4, 5; Kugler, p. 25.) Analogous in style, and rivalling the baptistery in the rich harmony of its ornamentation, is the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, A.D. 440. This is a building in the form of a short Latin cross, each arm covered with a barrel vault, with a small cupola rising on a square lantern above the intersection. The whole interior, both walls and roof, from the height of about six feet from the floor, is coated with mosaics, which, as Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcasalle have pointed out, are of special value as a connecting link both in the subjects and their treatment between the Graeco-Roman work of the primitive Christian church, and the strictly new-Greek or Byzantine; between the frescoes of the catacombs and the mosaics of the Roman churches. The chief arches are decorated with rich acanthus scroll-work (see woodcut No. 6), which also covers the lunettes at the ends of the transepts, where the bright green leaves pencilled with red and black and bordered with gold, stand out on a dark blue ground, with stags making their way through the foliage to slake their thirst at a fountain, in evident allusion to Ps. xlii. 1. The subject in the chief lunette facing the entrance has been variously explained. It represents a male figure, advancing with energetic stride, his pallium floating in the air, and bearing a crux hastata over his right shoulder. In his right hand he carries an open book. Before him to his right is an iron grate or gridiron, with burning wood under it. Behind him is an open cupboard, or scrinium, containing rolls of the Gospels. This figure has been identified from the days of Ciampini downwards with our Lord, and the book is supposed to be an heretical work which He is about to throw into the flames. Such a representation of our Lord, however, is quite without a parallel in the whole cycle of sacred art, and it has of late, with more probability, been regarded by Garrucci and Richter (Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, p. 31), as St. Lawrence with the instrument of his martyrdom, as the sword lies at the feet of St. Agnes in the mosaic in the basilica bearing her name at Rome. The book held by him would under this interpretation be one of the Gospels (before the restoration of 1875 the scrinium contained only three rolls, St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John), borne as a symbol of his office as a deacon (cf. Const. Apost. lib. ii. c. 57; Hieron. Epist. lvii.; Concil. Vusens. ii. c. 2). Very superior both in design and execution is the celebrated, but somewhat overpraised, mosaic of the Good Shepherd in the lunette above the chief entrance. "For beauty and purity of design," writes Mr. Layard (u. s. p. 14), "which nearly approaches that of classic times, and for exquisite harmony of colour, this is one of the most perfect specimens of the art that can be found." Its resemblance to some of the catacomb frescoes of Orpheus is too strong to be overlooked. [FRESCOS, vol. i. p. 656.] The Saviour, represented as a beardless young man with long flowing hair, clad in a long gold tunic striped with blue, and holding a crux hastata in His left hand, is seated in a grassy, hilly landscape, with His sheep grazing around Him, caressing with His right hand one of the flock that has lovingly approached Him.* Each of the walls of the lantern supporting the cupola bears two standing figures—perhaps apostles—by another and inferior hand, but full of action and admirably posed. Below the windows are doves perched on the rim of a vase and drinking from it, reminding one of the celebrated antique mosaic in the Capitol, described by Pliny. The dome itself is spangled with stars shining forth from a red azure ground encircling a Latin cross. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. 65–67; von Quast, taf. 2–6, pp. 10–15; Kugler, p. 28.)

^d In describing the Ravenna mosaics I have drawn largely from the admirable articles which appeared in the Times newspaper during the year 1876, especially those published September 25 and December 30.

We have to leap over a century to arrive at the period of the execution of the mosaics of what is known as the Arian baptistery, or St. Maria in Cosmedin, said to have been built by Theodoric, and after his death reconciled and decorated by bishop Agnellus, c. 560. Our limits forbid our dwelling upon these works of art, which are almost exactly reproductions of those in the upper part of the dome of the orthodox baptistery. We have, as there, the baptism of Christ in the centre, with the attendant figures of the Baptist and the river-god Jordan, with the lengthy, angular apostles in a lower zone—disproportionate, figures—bearing crowns. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 23; von Quast, 18; Kugler, p. 35.)^f

We pass now to the celebrated church of St. Vital, consecrated in 547. It will be seen from the ground plan and section of this remarkable edifice (CHURCH, vol. i. pp. 375, 376), that in its general plan it is circular, covered by a dome, with what we may call a quadrangular chancel ending in a domed apse. There can be no doubt that the principal dome, together with the whole of the interior, was originally decorated with mosaics, but the whole have perished at the hands of later restorers with the exception of those of the sacrarium and apse. These are so remarkable in their treatment and so splendid in their general effect as to make us regret most keenly the destruction of the others. Although the architecture of the church is what was afterwards known as Byzantine, and it owed its erection to the Emperor of the East, the term "Byzantine" cannot properly be applied to the mosaics. "The style of art," writes Kugler, "is still of that late Roman class already described, and we have no reason to conclude that the artists belonged to a more Eastern school" (Handbook of Painting, u. s. p. 34). It is evident, however, that the direct classical influence was waning, and giving place to realism. They no longer, as in the representations of which "the Good Shepherd" of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia may be taken as a type, "reflect pagan art-tradition glorified by Christian sentiment," but either depict scenes belonging to their own times or sacred subjects into which the spirit of the day has been breathed, with scarcely any trace of antique feelings. The broad soffit of the arch dividing the sacrarium from the central domical

* The somewhat exaggerated laudation given to this mosaic by von Quast and others may be estimated by an inspection of the accurate reproduction of the original size, by Salviati and Riolo, in the gallery of the south-east court at the South Kensington Museum.

area is decorated with 15 medallions containing individual portrait-like heads of our Lord and His apostles and the martyrs Gervasius and Protasius, set in a field of gold-green arabesque foliage on a blue ground. The two walls of the sacarium exhibit a remarkable series of Old Testament subjects, chiefly symbolical of the Eucharist, together with figures of prophets and evangelists, set in an architectural framework. The principal picture on each side is contained in the blank head of a semicircular arch, above which two angels floating through the air support a circular medallion bearing a Latin cross with the letters $\Lambda \Omega$. Each semicircle includes two subjects combined in one picture: that to the north (1) Abraham and Sarah entertaining the three angels, and (2) Abraham raising his hand to slay his son, while a hand from heaven points to a ram. That to the south (1) the offering of Melchizedek, who draped in royal vestments of white with gold ornaments, advances from a palatial edifice to an altar or draped table, on which stand two loaves of bread and a chalice; (2) Abel, "an excellent and perfectly antique shepherd figure" (Kugler), clad in a kind of goatskin, holding a lamb in his extended arms over the table, with a rude hut behind him. These figures are nearly life size. The spandrels to the south contain on one side (1) Moses keeping the flock of Jethro, and above (2) Moses loosing his shoes from his feet; and on the other side (3) the prophet Isaiah standing by a crowned column. Still higher on this side above the arch are St. Matthew and St. Mark, with their symbols of the angel and the lion. The corresponding pictures in the southern spandrels are (1) Moses on the Mount receiving the law, (2) a group of Israelites below, and (3) the prophet Jeremiah also standing by a crowned pillar; St. Luke and St. John, with the ox and the eagle, being represented above. Advancing into the apse proper, the walls on either side at the entrance bear the celebrated historical pictures of Justinian and "his strangely chosen empress" Theodora, with their respective suites, making their costly offerings at the consecration of the church. (Woodcuts No. 7, 8.) These, "as almost the sole surviving specimens of the higher style of secular painting, are of great interest, and as examples of costume quite invaluable." They are, however, inferior in knowledge of form and in drawing, and display little skill in grouping; the artists endeavouring to make up for their deficiencies by minute and careful execution and gorgeous colouring. The figures are life-size, and are upon a gold ground. Both the emperor and empress are distinguished by the nimbus, and wear diadems. (See the woodcuts in article CROWN, vol. i. p. 506.) The emperor is preceded by the archbishop Maximianus (A.D. 546-562) who consecrated the church, a very characteristic figure, accompanied by a deacon and subdeacon, the one bearing a jewelled volume of the gospels, the other a censer. On the other side a chamberlain is represented as drawing back the embroidered curtain of the door for the empress, attended by seven ladies of her court. The border of Theodora's robe is embroidered with the Adoration of the Magi. The half-dome of the apse contains the semi-colossal figure of Christ as "a godlike youth with richly-clustered hair" seated on an azure globe, bestowing the crown of life on the martyr-soldier Vitalis, who is being led up to Him by an angel. Christ's left hand holds the seven-sealed book. Another angel stands on the other side of Christ, together with bishop Ecclesius, the founder of the church (d. 541), of which he carries a model. He is the only figure of the group unnimbed. Below, the four rivers of Paradise flow through green meadows. The vault of the sacarium is richly covered with green-gold arabesques on a blue ground, and green upon a gold ground, amid which four stately angels with outstretched arms uplift a medallion bearing a nimbed lamb on a starry ground. On the wall in front of the apse two angels bear the monogram of Christ, while the cities of Bethlehem and Jerusalem, blazing with jewels, stand below, amid vine-tendrils and birds on an azure ground. No more remarkable series of mosaics than these of St. Vital's are to be found in the whole circle of Christian art. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. tab. 18-22; Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvi. fig. 8, 10, 12; Gally Knight, Eccles. Arch. of Italy, vol. i. pl. 10; Du Sommerard, Les Arts du Moyen Age, album, série 10, pl. 32; La Barte, Handbook of Arts of Middle Ages, vol. i. pl. 27; Kugler, u. s.; Parker's Photographs, No. 752, 753; South Kensington, 972, 973, 6808-6810.)

The basilica known as St. Apollinare Nuovo, since the removal thither of the body of St. Apollinaris for safety in the 9th century from the basilica of the same name in "Classe," but originally built by Theodoric, A.D. 500, for Arian worship, and designated "St. Martino in coelo aureo," from the splendour of its golden walls and ceilings, and "Sacellum Arian," presents two grand processional friezes, of colossal figures, extending the whole length of the nave, in what we have called the "triforium spaces," which "belonging to the very last days of ancient art remind us curiously of the Panathenaic procession on the frieze of the Parthenon" (Kugler, u. s.) That to the south consists of twenty-four male saints, nimbed, holding crowns in their hands divided by palm trees, all clothed in white robes, with the exception of the patron saint, St. Martin, the last of the row, who is clad in violet, advancing in stately march from the city of Ravenna towards the throned Saviour seated between four angels (a restoration since Ciampini's time); on the north, or women's side, we have a similar procession of twenty-two virgin saints issuing from the suburb of Classis, clothed in white, with a gold-coloured short-sleeved robe over, the head covered with a white veil, and the left hand which holds a crown also similarly veiled. They are preceded by the three kings (restored) presenting the offerings to the Infant Saviour seated on His throned Virgin Mother's lap, with two stately angels on either side, both mother and child having the nimbus, and with their right hands raised in act of benediction. "Few of man's works," writes Mr. Freeman, "are more magnificent than that long procession of triumphal virgins. . . . not stiff conventional forms, as in the late Byzantine work; but living and moving human beings." There is great variety in the expression of the faces, and the features are some of the most beautiful in early Christian art. The names are inscribed over each saint. Mrs. Jameson calls attention to the fact that only five of the whole number "are properly Greek saints, all the rest being Latin saints, whose worship originated with the Western, and not with the Eastern church" (Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, vol. ii. p. 527). Above the friezes the spaces between the windows exhibit small single figures of prophets and apostles in niches; and over each window, a vase with two doves recalls a familiar feature in classical art. Higher still, just below the roof, is a series of small subjects from the life of Christ. Those on the ritual, north, depict thirteen scenes from the life of our Lord:—(1) The cure of the paralytic; (2) the cure of the demoniac; (3) healing of the man with the palsy; (4) severing the sheep from the goats; (5) the widow's mite; (6) the Pharisee and publican; (7) the raising of Lazarus; (8) Christ and the woman of Samaria; (9) the woman that was a sinner; (10) cure of the two blind men; (11) miraculous draught; (12) the feeding of the five thousand; (13) gathering up the fragments. Those on the south, as many scenes from the Passion, commencing with the Last Supper and ending with the appearances of our Lord after His Resurrection—to the disciples at Emmaus, and to the eleven apostles; and, what is noteworthy, omitting the Crucifixion and all the physical sufferings of Christ. It deserves notice that in the former our Lord is represented as a beardless young man; in the latter as adult and bearded. These mosaics are of high value in Christian art, and deserve to be better known. The best account of them is in Richter, Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, pp. 4+ ff. Above the saints we see the conch-shaped vault of an apse, with a pensile crown, and a cross above supported by a dove on either side. (Woodcut, CORONA LUCIS, vol. i. p. 461; Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. ii. pp. 126, 127; Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvi. fig. 13, 15-20; Garrucci, Arti Primitivæ. Crist.; von Quast, taf. 7; South Kens. No. 6811, 6812; Kugler, u. s. pp. 38-40.)

To the same period belong the mosaics of the chapel of the archiepiscopal palace.^g (Woodcut No. 9.) We have here a dome with the monogram of Christ in the centre, supported by four simple and graceful angels, with the evangelistic symbols in the spandrels, all on a gold ground. The soffit of each of the four sustaining arches is decorated with seven medallion heads on an azure ground, that of Christ (a very youthful bust) occupying the place of honour in the centre of the chancel arch, with three of the apostles on either side, the heads of the remaining six with that of St. Paul, ornamenting the western arch. The side arches exhibit six male saints to the north, and as many female saints to the south, with the sacred monogram in the centre. These medallions are conceived in the same spirit as those on the arch of the sacrum of St. Vital, but are inferior in design and execution.

The mosaics which decorate the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe belong to a later period, c. 671-677, but they may be conveniently treated of here, as they are examples of the same school of art, and present many points of close resemblance to the earlier works. These mosaics are pronounced by Kugler to be of the highest importance in the history of ecclesiastical art, as almost the only surviving example, since the conflagration of St. Paul's at Rome, of the manner in which "whole rows of pictures and symbols were employed to ornament the interior of churches" (Kugler, u. s. p. 61). The spandrels of the nave arches offer a series of early Christian symbols, from the simple monogram to the Good Shepherd and the Fisherman, while a line of medallions on the wall above exhibits full-face portraits of the archbishops of Ravenna, on the same plan as the series of popes in St. Paul's, which are continued also along the wall of the aisles. (See the woodcut, article CHURCH, vol. i. p. 377.) These are modern, but apparently correct copies. The mosaics of the apse are original, and very remarkable. The arch of the tribune presents the familiar arrangement. The bust of Christ, in a medallion, occupies the centre between the evangelistic symbols, with twelve sheep on either side issuing from the gates of the two holy cities and advancing up the sides of the arch. Lower down are the two archangels, Michael and Gabriel, with heads of youthful beauty, each holding the labarum. Lower still are figures of St. Matthew and St. Luke. The side walls of the apse present two very remarkable historical compositions, evidently designed in imitation of those at St. Vital. To the south the three sacrifices of the Old Testament, those of Abel, Melchizedek, and Abraham, are combined in one really spirited composition. To the north is represented the Granting the Privileges of the church of Ravenna to the archbishop Reparatus by the emperor, probably Constantine Pogonatus, A.D. 668-685, slighter and inferior in drawing and execution to the opposite picture (Kugler, u. s. p. 63), but deserving to be ranked with the mosaics of St. Vital's as invaluable contemporary records of secular costume of the 7th century. Between the five windows of the apse are sainted bishops of Ravenna in pontifical robes, holding books, and blessing the people. The most noteworthy however of the series of mosaics in this church is that of the Transfiguration, which fills the conch of the apse, considered by Lord Lindsay as "perhaps the most beautifully executed mosaic in Ravenna." With the exception of that at Mount Sinai it is the earliest known representation of the scene, and is given in so emblematical a character that by the uninitiated the subject would not be readily recognised (Mrs. Jameson's History of our Lord, vol. i. p. 341). The traditional type is adhered to in the arrangement. In the chief place the presence of Christ is symbolized by a jewelled cross, set in a blue circle studded with gold stars, in the centre of which His sacred face is inserted with Salus mundi below, and ΙΧΘΥΣ above. The divine hand issuing from the clouds, and pointing to the cross, indicates the Father's recognition of the Son. On either side of the cross truncated half figures of Moses and Elias repose on delicately coloured clouds. Below, three sheep in a hilly green meadow looking upward symbolize the apostles. At the base of the composition, in the central position, reserved in the earlier mosaics exclusively for Christ, St. Apollinaris stands in his pontifical robes, with his arms extended in prayer, between six sheep on either side. The freedom from the Byzantine rigidity which characterizes the contemporary works at Rome is very noteworthy. Indeed, notwithstanding its intimate political connection with Constantinople the art-traditions of Ravenna seem to have continued to a late date unaffected by the paralyzing influence of the schools of the Eastern capital, which was destined to destroy the life of ecclesiastical art, and reduce it to the almost mechanical reproduction of conventional forms, depending for their effect on the architectonic regularity of their arrangement and the gorgeousness of the materials employed. The absence of Byzantine influence here has been noticed by Mr. Freeman; the "Ravenna monuments all come together under one head; they are all Christian Roman . . . Greek inscriptions appear over the heads of the holy personages in the mosaics (at St. Mark's, Venice), but the walls of St. Vitalis and St. Apollinaris in Classe spake no tongue but Latin" (Historical and Architectural Sketches, pp. 46, 47).

Contemporaneous with the earliest mosaics at Ravenna are the very interesting works at Milan, in the churches of St. Lawrence and St. Ambrose. Those at St. Lawrence are in the lateral apses of the ancient chapel of St. Aquilinus, containing the tomb of Ataulphus, the first husband of Galla Placidia (A.D. 415). They may be safely ascribed to the early part of the 5th century, and are entirely free from Byzantine influence. That to the right represents Christ, youthful and beardless, clad in white. (Woodcut No. 10.) His head encircled with a cruciform nimbus, bearing A Ω; His right hand raised in benediction, His left holding the Book of Life. The apostles sit on either side, all robed in white long-sleeved tunics, with a black clavus over the right shoulder. Their feet are sandalled. The heads display much variety in expression, meditative stern or cheerful, and some are characterized by youthful beauty. The tribune to the left represents a pastoral scene, where three youthful shepherds, one asleep, are depicted with three sheep in a rocky landscape, under a cloudy nocturnal sky. Two dignified figures clad in rich gold-coloured robes are directing the attention of the shepherds to something out of the picture. If, as Dr. Appell believes, this represents the angel appearing to the shepherds at the Nativity, it is an interesting proof of the entire absence at that early period of any recognised type of the scene (Allegranza, Spiegazione, &c., tav. 1; South Kens. Nos. 7782, 7967). The mosaics at St. Ambrose are in the side chapel of St. Satyrus, or of St. Victor, "ad coelum aureum," this being the original place of the latter saint's interment. They are ascribed to the middle of the 5th century, and are of remarkable excellence, characterized by a living freedom and absence of stiffness. On each side wall of the chapel are three standing saints; on the gospel side, St. Ambrose between St. Gervasius and St. Protasius; on the epistle side, St. Maternus between St. Nabor and St. Felix. All wear white togas over tunics, their feet are sandalled, they have no nimbi. The cupola has a gold ground, in the centre of which, within a garland of gay flowers, is the half figure of St. Victor, a bearded and moustached young man, of a high colour and short brown hair. (Woodcut No. 11.) He is clothed in a red tunic, with a light purple pallium over it. He holds in his right hand a cruciform monogram of Christ with an inscription on the horizontal bar of the H, read by Ferrario, Panagriae. In his left hand he bears an open book inscribed Victor, above is a cross with Faustini on the horizontal bar. The evangelistic symbols as usual occupy the pendentives. They are more unconventional than usual but the lion suffers in drawing from the artist's ignorance of the real animal (Ferrario, Monumenti di Sant' Ambrogio in Milano).

^g They are pronounced by Von Quast to belong to the 5th century chiefly on account of a monogram, "Petrus," which he considers to refer to Petrus Chrysologus, A.D. 433-454. Kugler would prefer to refer this monogram to archbishop Petrus IV., A.D. 569-574 (u. s. p. 40, note).

Before we return to Rome to trace the gradual stiffening and shrivelling up of ecclesiastical art under increasing Byzantine influence, we must cross the Adriatic, and take a survey of the mosaics of the very remarkable basilica of Parenzo in Istria, erected, according to an inscription on the tabernacle, (strangely misread by Dr. J. M. Neale, and the German authorities)^b by Euphrasius, the first bishop of the see, between A.D. 535 and A.D. 543. These mosaics have a strong family likeness to those of Ravenna, especially those of St. Apollinare Nuovo, and evidently belong to the same school. The soffit of the arch of the tribune is decorated with a series of medallion heads of female saints, with the sacred monogram on the vertex of the arch. The western face of the arch has only ribbons and arabesque foliage. The side walls of the ^b The inscription is as follows: "Famul(us) . D(e)o . Euf(r)asius . Antis(tes) . temporib(us) . suis . ag(ens) . an(num) . XI . hunc . loc(um) . a . fundamen(tis) . D(e)o . jobant(e) . sce . Oeccl . apse present the Annunciation to the north, and the Visitation to the south. Two saints and a gold nimbed angel in white robes holding an orb, occupy the spaces between the windows. The semi-dome of the apse contains a very extensive mosaic picture, somewhat coarse, but very effective, the figures being remarkably free from stiffness, noble in outline, and with well-arranged drapery. The general arrangement is that with which we are familiar in this position. A sacred figure occupies the central place with saints and angels standing in solemn attendance on either side, while from the clouds above the Divine Hand holds out a crown. But it is no longer Christ Himself that is the chief object of veneration, but His Virgin Mother, throned and nimbed, holding her Son on her lap. This mosaic therefore indicates a distinct step onwards in the cultus of the Blessed Virgin, anticipating by three centuries the throned Virgin of Santa Maria in Domnica. On either side of the central group stands a stately angel, and beyond three saintly personages; those to the Virgin's right hand are the patron saint, St. Maurus, holding a crown, bishop Euphrasius the founder, and archdeacon Claudius, the architect of the church, a model of which Euphrasius is presenting; and between them a second Euphrasius, a boy, the child of Claudius. The three saints to the Virgin's left are anonymous. The mosaics at Parenzo are not limited to the interior of the church. The western façade was decorated with a mosaic picture of Christ in a Vesica, between the Evangelistic symbols, with the seven golden candlesticks and two saints below, all in a state of sad decay.

No. 11. Cupola of the Chapel of St. Satiro, at St. Ambrogio, Milan.

The very remarkable mosaics of this basilica demand careful illustration. (Lohde, Der Dom von Parenzo; Eitelberger, Kunstdenkmale des Oesterreichischen Kaiserstaates, heft 4-5, pl. xliii.-xvi.; Neale, Notes of Journey in Dalmatia, pp. 79, 80.)

Proceeding still further to the east, Justinian's glorious church of St. Sophia at Constantinople presents an example of mosaic decoration unparalleled in extent and unsurpassed in magnificence, but almost entirely hidden beneath the whitewash of the image-hating Mussulmans, and only known to us by the rhetorical descriptions of Paulus Silentarius, and from the drawings of Salzenberg, taken during the temporary removal of the plaster, and published in his magnificent work on the ancient Christian architecture of Constantinople (Altchristliche Baudenkmale von Constantinopel). The present state of the mosaics may be seen in Signor Fossati's work Agia Sofia. Salzenberg's plates afford an undeniable proof that even in Byzantium itself the stiffening influence of Byzantine pictorial traditions had hardly begun to operate in the 6th century. It is true that, with some exceptions, there is little attempt to produce a pictorial composition. The mosaics chiefly consist of majestic single figures rhythmically arranged as accessories to the architecture, looking down calmly on the worshippers below, without any indication of action. But they are well drawn, and display none of the spectral rigidity and attenuated length which renders later Byzantine art so repulsive. The subsidiary ornamentation on the walls, panels, soffits and spandrels of the arches is no less free and joyous. Here we have beautiful arabesque foliage, branches of trees with clusters of fruit and flowers, with stars, lozenges, triangles, and guilloche borders, manifesting the influence of a still living classical tradition. The whole interior of the church was originally invested with inlaid work. The lower portions were covered with "opus sectile," patterns inlaid in various-coloured marbles, while the upper and far larger portion was swathed, as it were, in a continuous gold sheet (we see the same, at a later date, at St. Mark's, Venice), throwing up the stately sacred forms. The general arrangement of the mosaics may be seen in the section of St. Sophia, given in our first volume (GALLERIES, vol. i. p. 707). Four vast seraphs, with faces of youthful majesty, set in the midst of six overshadowing wings, occupy the pendentives of the great cupola. These are still partially visible, their faces only being concealed by silver stars. The dome itself had no figures, and was simply divided by bands of conventional ornament. The soffits of the four main arches supporting the dome were adorned with full length colossal figures of sacred personages within rich mosaic borders. The soffit of the arch of the apse presented on either side a truly magnificent picture of a white-robed angel holding a globe and a wand, with two wings of vast length and breadth, almost reaching to his feet. The face is characterized by a noble youthful beauty; the hair long and curling. The arrangement of the wall spaces within the cupola will be seen in the woodcut already referred to. The six smaller figures between the second tier of windows represent the minor prophets, flanked at either end by taller figures of the major prophets, Isaiah and Jeremiah to the north, Ezekiel and Daniel to the south. There is much variety and individuality of expression in these stately figures. Jeremiah has a very noble head, with long flowing hair and beard. Jonah and Habakkuk are also noticeable. The latter has a very earnest face, without a beard, and with short hair (Salzenberg, pl. 30). A mosaic given by Salzenberg (pl. 31), from the Gynaecium, representing the Day of Pentecost shews the only attempt at a regularly composed picture. The twelve apostles are ranged in a semicircle (it is noticeable that the Virgin is absent), the descending fiery tongues being depicted on the ribs of the half dome. A fragment from one of the spandrels shews a portion of a group of bystanders, depicted with much graphic power. Half-incredulous wonder is well represented in their faces. One ill-looking fellow with a goat's beard is mocking. The mosaics of St. Sophia are evidently not all of the same date. The figures of Eastern saints, Anthimus, Basil, Dionysius, Gregory Theologus, &c., from the walls of the nave, shew a somewhat soulless uniformity in dress form and feature, with an approach to excess of length, indicating a decline of art (ib. pl. 28, 29). The mosaic of our Lord enthroned, with the prostrate form of the emperor (Constantine Pogonatus) awkwardly poising himself on his knees and elbows at His feet, displays the union of excessive gorgeousness of dress and accessories, with bad drawing and ignorance of anatomy, which characterizes the later Byzantine works. (Woodcut No. 12.)

Another contemporaneous specimen of Greek mosaic, on a scale of which unhappily there are but few examples remaining, is the cupola of St. Sophia, at Thessalonica, representing the Ascension. This vast composition covers an area of 600 square yards, and is executed with a finish rarely exhibited in such works. It may be safely assigned to the middle of the 6th century. The ascending figure of Christ in an aureole supported by angels, in the centre of the dome, has almost entirely perished. The Virgin and twelve apostles, poised insecurely on little conical hills divided by olive trees, stand in a circle round the base, their colossal figures, more than twelve feet high, stretching over the golden concave. The Virgin occupies the chief place opposite the entrance; she is vested in a purple robe, with scarlet sandals, and has a golden nimbus, as have the two angels who, one on either side of her, are addressing the apostles. The apostles are un-nimbed. Their expression is very varied and life-like. Some gaze upwards; some lean their heads on their hands in deep thought; some hold up a hand or a finger in astonishment. There is as yet no trace of the paralyzing effect of Byzantine stiffness and despotic art traditions in this truly magnificent work (Texier et Pullan, Églises Byzantines, pl. xl, xli, pp. 142-144). There can be no reason to doubt that Greece, Asia Minor, and the Holy Land once possessed many other equally noble specimens of mosaic decoration, "incomparably more splendid, more extensive, and grander in plan" (Gally Knight) than those with which we are most familiar in Italy; but very few have survived the wasting effects of the elements, wars, fires, and earthquakes, and those that remain are mostly hidden by Mahommedan whitewash. The apse of the church of the convent of Mount Sinai has preserved its mosaics of the time of Justinian, representing the Transfiguration, with figures of Christ, Moses, and Elias, and the three apostles below, set in a border of medallions containing busts of prophets, apostles and saints. Portraits of Justinian and Theodora are found on the face of the arch of the apse. Above them are the appropriate historical scenes of Moses and the Burning Bush, and Moses receiving the Tables of the Law. Accurate drawings or photographs of these mosaics are urgently called for. M. Didron also reports that the "vaults and cupola of Vatopedi and St. Laura on Mount Athos, and of Daphne, near Athens, and of St. Luke in Livadia, are covered with mosaics," but he supplies no details.

The devastating inroads which swept over Italy in the 5th century effectually stamped out all native art both in the capital and the provincial cities. The revival of mosaic decoration, as of the other forms of ecclesiastical art, must be attributed to artists from the Eastern Rome, who brought with them their technical processes and pictorial traditions. It was not, however, till a later period, as has been already remarked, that the rapid decline which characterizes the Byzantine school proper set in. The mosaic compositions in Rome belonging to the 6th century still exhibit a life and movement which render them "in point of composition scarcely perceptibly inferior to those of the 5th, and in splendour of material by no means so" (Kugler, u. s. p. 31).

The finest mosaics of this class existing in Rome are those in the church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian (the Eastern physician saints) in the Forum, built by Felix IV. A.D. 526-530. (Woodcut No. 13.) Here we perceive that we have finally said farewell to pictorial composition, and enter upon the system of pictorial architectonic decorations, which continued with ever-increasing formality and stiffness up to the extinction of the art. The effect is made to depend entirely on majestic figures rhythmically placed in motionless repose, striking the eye of the worshipper with their calm and solemn grandeur, and filling his mind with reverence and awe, while "the rich play of antique decoration is lost sight of behind the severe gravity of figurative representation" (Lübke, History of Christian Art). The arrangement of this admirable mosaic, the last work in Christian Rome in which we trace a really living art in contradistinction to the mechanical reproduction of hieratical forms, conforms to the type described at the commencement of this article; conventional in arrangement, gorgeous in colour, severe in form, and stern in expression. A colossal figure of our Lord, His right hand raised in benediction, His left holding a scroll, occupies the centre of the roof of the apse. To the left St. Peter introduces St. Cosmas; St. Paul, to the right, St. Damian, each bearing martyrs' crowns. They are followed by St. Theodore to the right, gorgeously robed, carrying his crown, and pope Felix IV., the founder of the church, of which he carries a model, to the left (an entirely restored figure). The composition is terminated on either side by a palm tree, laden with fruit, sparkling with gold, symbolizing the tree of life. Above that to the left is the phoenix with a star-shaped nimbus, typifying eternal life through death. The river Jordan is indicated below Christ's feet, as it were dividing heaven from earth. A frieze encircling the apse bears twelve sheep, drawn with much truth and individuality of expression, advancing from the two holy cities to the Holy Lamb, who, with nimbed head, stands on a hill, from which issue the four rivers of Paradise, which, as well as the Jordan, have their names inscribed. The arch of the apse presents the usual symbols on its face. In the centre the Lamb, "as it had been slain," on a jewelled altar with a cross behind and the seven sealed book on the step; on either side the golden candlesticks, two angels, and the evangelistic symbols, two of which, as well as the throng of elders below offering their crosses, have been nearly obliterated by repairs. The only nimbed figures are Christ and the angels. "The figure of Christ," writes Kugler (u.s. p. 32), "may be regarded as one of the most marvellous specimens of the art of the middle ages. Countenance, attitude, and drapery combine to give Him an expression of quiet majesty, which for many centuries after is not found again in equal beauty and freedom. The drapery especially is disposed in noble folds, and only in its somewhat too ornate details is a further departure from the antique observable. The saints are not as yet arranged in stiff parallel forms, but are advancing forward, so that their figures appear somewhat distorted, while we already remark something constrained and inanimate in their step. . . . A feeling for colour is here displayed, of which no later mosaics with gold grounds give any idea. The heads are animated and individual. . . . still far removed from any Byzantine stiffness." (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. tab. 15, 16; De Rossi, Mosaici Cristiani, fasc. v.; Fontana, Mosaici delle Chiese di Roma, tab. 3; Lübke, History of Christian Art, vol. i. p. 319; Parker, Photogr. 1441-1445; South Kens. No. 7805.)

A very decided decline in art, though still preserving some traces of the ancient Roman manner, is manifested by the mosaics of St. Lawrence without the walls built by Pelagius II. (A.D. 577-590). The apse was destroyed when Honorius III. (A.D. 1216-1227) reversed the orientation, and erected a long nave where the apse had stood, and the only mosaics remaining are on the back-side of the arch of triumph. They are too much restored and altered to be of much value in the history of art. Christ is here seated on the globe of the world, holding a long cross; to his right stand St. Peter and St. Lawrence bearing similar crosses, and St. Pelagius, a diminutive figure, presenting his church. On Christ's left stand St. Paul and St. Stephen, and St. Hippolytus bearing his martyr's crown. Vitet remarks that the savage ascetic aspect of Christ resembles that of an Oriental monk. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 13, tab. 28; Parker, Mosaics, pp. 20-22.) "Standing on the boundary line between the earlier and later styles" (Kugler, u.s. p. 59), but shewing a very decided tendency to Byzantine treatment, are the mosaics of St. Agnes, the work of pope Honorius, A.D. 625-638. The picture, limited to three figures, is a strong contrast to the crowded compositions of later times. Here, for the first time, we have a human saint occupying the central place hitherto reserved for Christ. The Divine Hand holds the crown above her head. The execution is coarse, and the design poor. The forms are stiff and elongated, and the attitudes conventional, while an attempt is made to compensate for deficiencies in art by richness of colour and gorgeousness of costume. St. Agnes is attired with a barbarous splendour in a dark purple robe embroidered with gold and overloaded with gems, as is her jewelled tiara, while strings of pearls hang from her ears, reminding us of the Empress Theodora at St. Vital's. Her red cheeks are mere blotches, and the figure is outlined by heavy dark strokes. A sword lies at her feet, where flames are bursting from the ground, symbolizing her martyrdom. To her right Honorius presents his church; to her left pope Symmachus holds a book. The ground is of gold, which by this time had become the rule, seldom departed from (De Rossi, Mosaici Cristiani, fasc. iv.; Fontana, u.s. tav. 8; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. 17, No. 2; Parker, Photogr. 1593; South Kens. No. 974). The mosaics which decorate the apse of the oratory of St. Venantius (A.D. 632-642), attached to the Lateran baptistry, depart somewhat from the usual type. Christ and the two adoring angels are reduced to busts, upborne on gaudy clouds. Below, not composed into a picture but standing motionless side by side, are ranged nine full-length figures, the central one being the Virgin as an "orante" (the earliest example of her representation, not in an historical subject, in a Roman mosaic). To her right are St. Paul, St. John, St. Venantius, and pope John IV., the builder of the oratory, of which he holds a model in his hand; to her left St. Peter, St. John the Baptist, St. Domnus, and pope Theodore, by whom the oratory was completed. The frieze above the arch has the usual symbolical representations; in the spandrels below are eight full-length figures of saints, four on each side, some having crowns, others books. The execution of the whole is coarse, and the design tasteless. We must pass rapidly over the remaining Roman mosaics in which Byzantine formalism gradually crushes out more and more of the life of art. Those of the small altar apse attached to the round church of St. Stephen, on the Coelian Hill, A.D. 642-649, display in the centre a richly jewelled cross between the standing figures of St. Prinus and St. Felicianus, with a medallion head of Christ on its upper arm (recalling the analogous arrangement at St. Apollinaris in Classe), and the hand of the Father holding out the martyr's crown above. A solitary figure in mosaic, that of St. Sebastian, over a side altar at St. Pietro, in Vincoli, belongs to the same period of art. The saint appears, not as in later art as a youthful half-naked Christian Apollo, but as an old man with white hair and beard, in full Byzantine costume, with richly embroidered trousers bare legs and sandals. He holds his martyr's crown. His countenance displays stern resolution. The figure is stiff and lifeless. Some fragments of the mosaics put up in St. Peter's by John VII., A.D. 703, removed when the basilica was rebuilt, still exist. A figure of the Virgin, with uplifted hands as an orante, is preserved in the Ricci chapel, in St. Mark's at Florence. A portion of the Adoration of the Magi is to be seen in the sacristy of St. Mary, in Cosmedin, which "shews composition of a good character, somewhat in the older taste." The circular church of St. Theodore, A.D. 772-795, contains a well-executed picture, which "is chiefly interesting to us as one of the earliest specimens of the copying of old mosaics" (Kugler, u.s. p. 41). Christ in a violet robe, with long light hair and a short beard, holding a cross in his left hand, is seated upon a blue starry globe. St. Peter on the right is introducing St. Theodore, both being exact copies of the corresponding figures in St. Cosmas and St. Damian. St. Paul, on the left, introduces another youthful saint. Both are offering their crowns on an embroidered mantle to Christ. The unmeaning draperies indicate the rapid decline of art. The largest and most magnificent of the works of this period are those in the church of St. Praxedes. Nowhere, except at Venice and Ravenna, do we find so wide an extent of mosaic decoration in the same building. Not only the portions usually so ornamented, the apse and its arch, but a second arch crossing the nave, and a side chapel, that of St. Zeno, with its vaulted roof, are similarly vested. "The effect of this grand work," writes M. Vitet, "is most imposing, the effect entirely of decoration, independent of the character and value of the objects represented. If the eyes are not charmed, they are at least dazzled, and it is only after some time that we are aware of the feebleness and coarseness of the work, and that we feel a sad surprise at this great degradation of art." Any detailed description of the subjects is rendered unnecessary by their being a formal reproduction, with the necessary substitutions, of the mosaics at St. Cosmas and St. Damian. The sainted sisters St. Praxedes and St. Pudenciana take the place of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and pope Paschal of pope Felix. All else is, in plan at least, the same. The degrading influence of the Byzantine art traditions were, however, too potent to allow the imitator to copy faithfully. He has reproduced the general form and lost the spirit. The execution is rude, and the gorgeousness of the colouring only increases the barbaric effect. The figures are stiff attenuated and angular; the countenances meagre sad and ascetic; the drapery formed only by a few dark lines. The sheep in the frieze are "like children's toys; small horses of wood badly cut" (Vitet). The arch of the tribune preserves the decoration in a degraded form which has almost entirely perished at St. Cosmas and St. Damian. (Woodcut No. 14.) The front of the arch of triumph represents in the centre the heavenly Jerusalem, within whose gates stands our Lord, too diminutive for effect, attended by angels and saints, while below a multitude of the redeemed approach in solemn procession "clad in white robes, and with palm branches in their hands." The simultaneous action of so vast a crowd is not without solemn effect, but the whole displays commonplace thought and feebleness of execution (Ciampini, tom. ii. tab. 47; Fontana, tav. 12; De Rossi, Mosaici Cristiani, fasc. v.; Kugler, pt. i. p. 67; Crowe and Cavalcaselle, vol. i. p. 51; Parker, Photogr. No. 1477-1483, 1506, 1507; South Kens., No. 976). The side chapel, though from its barbaric splendour it has obtained the designation of the "Garden of Paradise," is even poorer in design and ruder in execution. The walls are covered with long lean figures of saints—the Virgin Mary, St. John Baptist, Apostles, Virgins, busts, and sacred symbols, ranged side by side on a glittering gold ground, with no attempt at combined pictorial effect. The vault exhibits in the centre a half-length figure of Christ upborne by four angels, apparently copied from the ceiling of the archiepiscopal chapel at Ravenna. The most interesting portion of these decorations is the Holy Lamb on a mount, from which issue the four streams of Paradise, at which as many stags are drinking. The window above the side door is framed in double rows of medallion portraits, "which are merely rude caricatures" (Kugler, u.s. p. 68). (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 26, tab. 48, 50; Parker, Photogr. No. 1508–1512; Parker, Mosaics, p. 32; South Kens., No. 1393–1396). To the same pope, Paschal I., are due the mosaics of the apse of St. Cecilia, in Trastevere, where the subjects and arrangements are nearly the same, and which in rudeness and "multiplicity of figures correspond pretty much with those at St. Praxedes." We have "the same forgetfulness of the human frame, the same disparity between the richness of the costumes and the deformity of those who are clothed in them" (Vitet). (Ciampini, vol. ii. c. 27, tab. 51, 52; Parker, Photogr. 1706.) To Paschal also we must ascribe the rich mosaics of the apse of St. Mary in Navicella, or in Domnica, where, for the first time in existing Christian Roman art (the example at Parenzo is three centuries earlier), we find the Virgin Mary enthroned with our Lord on her lap, not as an infant, but as a dwarfed man, taking the chief place in the composition. (Woodcut No. 15.) Kugler calls attention to the richness of the foliage decoration, usually proscribed by the moroseness of Byzantine art. The mosaics of St.

No. 15. St. Maria in Domnica; Rome. Circa 815.

Mark's, erected by Gregory IV., A.D. 828, are, according to M. Vitet, "unquestionably the most barbarous in Rome," in which "all respect for any kind of rule, all antiquity of expression, all notion of order and beauty have disappeared. The meagreness of the figures, the lengthening of the bodies, the stiff parallelism of the draperies, cannot be carried farther." The subject, Christ attended by apostles and saints, with the usual accessories, calls for no remark (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 19, tab. 36, 37). The cathedral of Capua possesses mosaics of the same school, which deserve fuller description and illustration (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 29, tab. 54). The celebrated mosaic of the apse of the Leonine Triclinium at the Lateran, though a modern restoration by Benedict XIV., A.D. 1740–1758, is a tolerably faithful copy of the original work, erected by Leo III., A.D. 798–816. The chief subject is the constantly repeated one of Christ and His apostles, with the river of Paradise gushing out at their feet. "The figures in their stiff yet infirm attitudes, and still more in the unmeaning disposition of the drapery, display a decided Byzantine influence" (Kugler, u.s.

p. 66). On the walls on either side of the apse, at the springing of the arch, are the pictures famous for their ecclesiastical and political significance. To the left the enthroned Saviour bestows, with His right hand, the keys on St. Sylvester and with His left hand the Vexillum on the emperor Constantine each kneeling at His feet, as the symbols respectively of the spiritual and temporal power. To the right St. Peter, similarly enthroned, places a crown on the head of pope Leo III., with his right hand and with His left gives the Vexillum to the emperor Charles the Great (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 21, tab. 39, 40; Wharton Marriott, Testimony of Catacombs, p. 95, pl. 6; Vestiarium Christ. pl. 32, 33; Parker, Photogr. No. 761). At the church of St. Nereus and Achilleus, rebuilt by Leo III., A.D. 796, the mosaics of the apse have perished, but those above the arch remain, and are remarkable as representing historical scenes instead of the usual symbolical and apocalyptic subjects. The Transfiguration is represented over the arch, with Moses and Elias standing on either side of Christ, whose superior dignity is indicated with a puerile realism by his taller stature, and the awkward prostrate figures of the three apostles beyond. Further to the left is the Annunciation, and to the right the Virgin and Child accompanied by an angel, less ungraceful than the other figures. The whole composition strikingly indicates the low state to which art had fallen at the end of the 8th century (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 20, tab. 38). The last mosaic to be noticed in this period is that of the church originally called St. Marla Antiqua, then changed to St. M. Nova, and rededicated in the 16th century to St. Francesca Romana, the name by which it is commonly known. In this work there is a strange mixture of good and bad, with some novelties of treatment, indicating the introduction of a new influence. The chief figure, as at St. Maria in Navicella, is the Virgin attended by saints, with our Lord on her lap, throned, and now for the first time crowned. The attempt at pictorial composition is entirely given up, and architectural composition is substituted for it. The figures are, according to the arrangement with which we become afterwards so familiar, for the first time placed each under the arch of a continuous arcade, supported by columns. A sort of tabernacle, in the form of a cockle shell, spreads over all the upper part of the mosaic. The drawing is very bad; the figure of the Virgin, "one of the most hideous that can be imagined" (Vitet), the cheeks simply red blotches, the folds of the drapery merely dark strokes, poorly compensated for by the Oriental magnificence of the costumes, especially that of the chief figure. The garlands of foliage, however, display a certain grace alien from the usually morose rigidity of the Byzantine school. Indeed the whole composition indicates some original power and freedom of thought on the part of its designer (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 28, tab. 53). With the Imperial power the art of mosaic was transferred from Rome to Aachen. Charles the Great summoned the artists to decorate his new basilica, for the enrichment of which rich marbles and pillars were transported from Ravenna. Ciampini (tom. ii. c. 22, tab. 41) preserves the design of the apse, which is very unlike the usual conventional type. In the centre is our Lord enthroned, holding a book with an angel on either side. Below are seven small figures of the elders rising from their thrones, and casting their crowns at our Lord's feet. After the 9th century, during the fierce struggles of contending factions, by which the unhappy land was rent asunder, mosaic ceased entirely in Rome and in Italy generally. Its first revival was in the republic of Venice, where we find its earliest examples in the church of St. Cyprian at Murano, and on a most extensive scale and with the utmost gorgeousness of character at St. Mark's. These, however, are outside our chronological limits. The art was much later in its revival in Rome itself, where the earliest examples, evidently the work of Byzantine artists, belong to the 12th century. We may specially mention those of St. Mary, in Trastevere, A.D. 1130-1143; St. Clement, A.D. 1250-1274; St. John Lateran, A.D. 1288-1294; the apse of St. Mary Major's, of the same date, and the external mosaics in the façade, A.D. 1292-1307. But on these also their late date forbids us to touch.

MOTHER CHURCH. (Ecclesia matris, Matricularis, Matricialis, Mater Principalis, Diocesana, or Ecclesia per se.) We find all these epithets used during the early ages, and substantially in the same sense, viz. that of a principal and dignified church, having other churches dependent upon it. We may distinguish four distinct varieties of meaning in which this word is employed.

I. Of a church planted immediately by the apostles, from which other churches were afterwards derived and propagated. Thus Tertulian (de Praescript. cap. 21) calls the churches in which the apostles preached, either in person or by their epistles, by this name, and makes their traditions to be the rule of doctrine for the whole church: "constat proinde omnem doctrinam, quae cum illis ecclesiis apostolicis matricibus et originalibus fidei conspiret, veritati deputandam, id sine dubio tenentem, quod Ecclesiae ab Apostolis, Apostoli a Christo, Christus a Deo, suscepit." And in this sense the second general council of Constantinople called the church of Jerusalem the mother of all churches in the world, Τῆς δὲ γε μητρὸς ἀπαῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν. And the church of Arles is similarly called the mother church of France, because Trophimus its first bishop was supposed to have first preached the gospel in that country.

II. It denotes a metropolitan church, i.e. the principal church of an ecclesiastical province. Thus in the African canons (can. 119 or 120), "Si autem non fecit, non praejudicetur matri, sed liceat, cum locus acceperit episcopum, quem non habebat, ex ipso die intra triennium repetere." And in can. 90 we meet with the phrase "matrices cathedrae," and Ferrandus Diaconus uses the simple term "matrices" to denote metropolitan and cathedral churches (Brev. cap. ii. 17, 38). Similarly Agobard (de Privilegio et Jure Sacerdotii, cap. 12), "nos ab ecclesiâ non recedimus, nec spernimus matrices ecclesias." But Ducange suggests that the reading here should be nutrices.

III. The term was also and more generally used of the chief church of a diocese, a cathedral, as distinguished from parish churches, committed to the charge of single presbyters, which were called tituli. Among the Greeks the former were known as καθολικαὶ = generales. Thus Epiphanius, in treating of the Arian heresy, calls the cathedral of Alexandria καθολικὴν. See also a canon of the council in Trullo (can. 58 or 59). In the African canons (can. 123), we find again the phrase: "si in matricibus cathedris episcopus negligens fuerit adversus haereticos, conveniatur a vicinis episcopis." And in the same sense, can. 33, by which the bishop is forbidden to alienate or sell the property of his cathedral, and the presbyters that belonging to their parishes: "non habenti necessitatem, nec episcopo liceat matricis ecclesiae, nec presbytero rem tituli sui." The fifth council of Carthage (A.D. 401) calls the metropolitan church "principalis cathedra" (can. 5). It was termed the "mother church," and the rest of the churches in the diocese diocesan churches, ecclesiae dioecesanæ; as in the 8th canon of the council of Tarraco (A.D. 516), which directs bishops to visit their dioceses every year, and ascertain that the churches were in good repair; which, continued the canon, we find not to be the case in all instances—"reperimus nonnullas dioecesanæ ecclesias esse destitutas."

IV. The term mater or matrix is sometimes applied, at a later period, to parish churches also, as distinguished from chapels or other churches dependent ecclesiastically upon them. Thus pope Alexander III., in the Appendix to the third council (A.D. 1167) at the Lateran (pars i. cap. 7): "nec eos duas matrices ecclesias, quarum unam sufficere sibi videbitis, tenere permittatis," where it is apparently equivalent to ecclesia baptismalis, a church in which baptisms were administered, which is one way of describing a parish church, as in Walafrid Strabo (de Rebus Ecclesiasticis, c. 30), "Presbyteri plebium, qui baptismales ecclesias tenent, et minoribus presbyteris praesunt." And similarly a charter of Hugh Capet mentions two churches existing in a particular place: "quarum una est mater ecclesia, in honore B. Remigii, et alia capella in honore S. Germani." This distinction was one commonly existing, and clearly recognised. The mother church was considered as a church per se, i.e. owing obedience to no other; having its own presbyter, and so distinguished from chapels, which were probably always served from the parish church. [ORATORY.] In illustration of this we may quote from a letter of Hincmar of Rheims (h.p. 7): "dicunt enim quia ex quo memorari ab his qui in carne sunt potest, quoniam ipsa ecclesia per se fuit semper, nulli alteri ecclesiae fuit subjecta. . . . Evidentibus documentis invenerunt, quod ipsa ecclesia de Foila-naebraio nunquam ecclesiae in Codiciaco fuerit subjecta, sed presbyterum semper habuerit." [S. J. E.]

MOURNERS. [PENITENCE.]

MOURNING. Outward signs of grief at the loss of friends, either by (a) formal lamentation, (b) change of attire, or (c) seclusion from society. The mourning of the disciples after our Lord's crucifixion and death (Mark xvi. 10), that of the devout men at the burial of Stephen (Acts viii. 2), and that of the widows on the death of Dorcas (ib. ix. 39) are passages that have been cited to shew that demonstrations of grief on such occasions were not regarded by the primitive Church as inconsistent with the Christian theory of the future life of the faithful. The language of St. Paul (1 Thess. iv. 13) probably indicates the character of the Church's teaching in relation to the question during the first three centuries; such losses being viewed as occasions for natural sorrow, tempered however by a firm belief in the joyous resurrection of the departed and their future reunion with their friends. Upon the bereaved Christian the Church enjoined neither a stoical disguising of all emotion nor a formal affectation of grief.

The earlier Christians appear to have condemned even a change of attire as a relic of paganism; and it is certain that many practices—such as the custom on the part of relatives to walk with the head bare, the women with their hair dishevelled and beating the breast, the hiring of female mourners (præficiae), who lamented and sang naenia or songs in praise of the dead, and of lictors dressed in black, corresponding to the modern mute, the observance of a definite period of mourning, during which time it was regarded as indecorous for the relatives of the deceased to appear in public—are all distinctly traceable to Jewish or pagan precedents. Traditional observance, however, often prevailed over religious conviction; and, speaking generally, actual practice appears to have been somewhat at variance with the more enlightened teaching of the Church. The authority of the most eminent among the Fathers is clearly condemnatory of such displays. St. Cyprian disapproves of excessive lamentation and black attire: "desiderari eos debere, non plangi, nec accipiendas esse hic atras vestes, quando illi ibi indumenta alba jam sumperint, occasionem dandam non esse gentilibus ut nos merito ac jure reprehendant quod quos vivere apud Deum dicimus, ut extinctos et perditos lugeamus, et fidem quam sermone et voce deprimimus cordis et pectoris testimonio non probeamus" (Lib. de Mortal. Migne, iv. 234). The language of St. Zeno, bishop of Verona in the following century, shews that it was still customary for widows to indulge in displays of excessive grief. In a dissuasive against second marriages among this class, he adverts, though without direct censure, to the rending of the hair over the corpse, lacerated cheeks, "livore foedata ubera," the mourner "coelum ipsum ululatus rumpens," as ordinary expressions of sorrow on the part of widows (Migne, xl. 305). The authority of St. Chrysostom is emphatically pronounced against such excesses. In addressing an audience, he says, "Thenceforth therefore let no one beat the breast, or wail, or impugn Christ's victory. For He conquered death. And why dost thou, O mourner, weep without measure? This state (τὸ πρᾶγμα) is but a sleep. Why dost thou lament and utter cries? For if even the Gentiles (Ἕλληνες) were wont thus to do, it ought but to move us to scorn (καταγελᾶν ἔδει, in evident allusion to Matt. ix. 24, καὶ κατεγέλων αὐτοῦ). But if the faithful dishonour themselves by such practices, what excuse can they plead? For how canst thou expect to be forgiven who actest thus foolishly, and that too when Christ has so long been risen and the proofs of His resurrection are so clear? But thou, as though seeking to magnify thy offence, bringest in prae-ficiæ (θρηνηφοῦς Ἑλληνίδας γυναῖκας), that thou mayst add fuel to thy grief and stir up the furnace of affliction; and heedest not the words of St. Paul, 'What concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?'" (Homil. 31; Migne, Series Graeca, lvii. 374). This passage can hardly be understood otherwise than as implying that the practices condemned were prevalent in the Church in Chrysostom's time. The final conclusion of the homily is that the Christian ought not to mourn for the relative who has been removed from the calamities of life, nor even, with the prospect of future reunion, to grieve over a temporary separation. The passage is quoted in confirmation of his own view by John of Damascus in his Sacra Parallela, "De mortuis, et quod eorum causa non sit lugendum" (Migne, Series Graeca, xcvi. 543); see also a sermon attributed to Chrysostom by the Benedictine editors (ib. xl. 1166), in which the conduct of Horatius on receiving the intelligence of his son's death (Livy, ii. 8) is cited with approval.

St. Jerome holds similar language. In writing to one Julianus, a man of wealth, who in the lapse of a few days had not only lost his wife and two daughters by death, but also a considerable portion of his property through an invasion of the barbarians, he says, "laudent ergo te alii . . . quod laeto vultu mortes tuleris filiarum, quod in quadragesimo die dormitionis earum lugubrem vestem mutaveris, et dedicatio ossium martyris candida tibi vestimenta reddiderit, ut non sentires dolorem orbitatis tuae, quem civitas universa sentiret, sed ad triumphum martyris exultares; quod sanctissimum conjugem tuam non quasi mortuam sed quasi proficiscentem deduxeris" (Epist. cxvii. Migne, xxii. 794).

It is, however, unquestionable that by many somewhat different views were held. A passage in one of the Apostolical Constitutions, belonging, it is conjectured, to the period intervening between the age of Cyprian and that of Chrysostom, shews that a more definite and formal observance of certain rites was already recognised and inculcated by the Church, though the passage probably indicates the practice of the East rather than of the West [APOST. CONST. p. 125]. A short religious service, whereby it was designed not so much to lament as to commemorate the deceased, is here directed to be held on the third, ninth, and fortieth days after the day of death, the anniversary of the day to be observed by a distribution of alms to the poor. Ἐπιτελείσθω δὲ τρίτα τῶν κεκοιμημένων, ἐν ψαλμοῖς καὶ ἀναγνώ- νεσι καὶ προσευχαῖς, διὰ τὸν διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν ἐγερθέντα. καὶ ἕννατα, εἰς ὑπόμνησιν τῶν περι- όντων καὶ τῶν κεκοιμημένων· καὶ τεσσαρακοστὰ, κατὰ τὸν παλαιὸν τύπον· Μωσὴν γὰρ οὕτως ὁ λαὸς ἐπένησε· καὶ ἐνιαύσια, ὑπὲρ μνείας αὐτοῦ. καὶ διδόνθω ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων αὐτοῦ, πένησιν εἰς ἀνάμνησιν αὐτοῦ (Const. Apost. viii. 42; Cotelierius, i. 424). The repetition of such observances on the ninth day (corresponding to the Greek ἕννατα, Lat. novendialia) appears to have had only pagan precedent, and is accordingly condemned by St. Augustine, who considers that the observance of the other days is in conformity with Scriptural usage. "Nescio utrum inveniantur alicui sanctorum in Scripturis celebratum esse luctum novem dies, quod apud Latinos Novendial appellant. Unde mihi videntur ab hac consuetudine prohibendi, si qui Christianorum istum in mortuis suis numerum servant, qui magis est in Gentilium consuetudine. Septimus vero dies auctoritatem in Scripturis habet: unde alio loco scriptum est, Luctus mortui septem dierum; fatui autem omnes dies vitae ejus (Eccles. xxii. 15). Septenarius autem numerus propter sabbati sacramentum praecipue quietis indicium est; unde merito mortuis tanquam requiescentibus exhibetur" (Quaest. in Heptateuch. i. 172; Migne, xxiv. 596). St. Ambrose, in his Oratio de obitu Theodosii (ann. 375), says, "Ejus ergo principis et proxime conclamavimus obitum, et nunc quadregesimam celebramus, assistente sacris altaribus Honorio principe; quia sicut sanctus Joseph patri suo quadraginta diebus humationis officia detulit, ita et hic Theodosio patri justa persolvit. Et quia alii tertium diem et trigesimum alii septimum et quadregesimum observare consueverunt, quid doceat lectio consideremus." He then quotes Gen. i. 2, and adds, "Haec ergo sequenda sollemnitas quae praescribit lectio;" quoting again Deut. xxiv. 8, he says, "Utraque ergo observatio habet auctoritatem."

Tertullian (de Corona, c. 3) speaks of offerings in memory of the departed, "oblaciones pro defunctis," as customary on the anniversary of their death; and Evodius, bishop of Uzala, in 414, when giving an account of the obsequies of a young Christian, says, "per triduum hymnis Dominum collaudavimus super sepulchrum ipsius, et redemptionis sacramenta tertio die obtulimus" (Epist. clviii. Migne, xxxiii. 694). This passage is adduced, apparently with little reason, by Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chré. art. DEUIL) as evidence that offerings for the repose of the soul of the departed were authorised by the church.

The contrast of Christian to pagan sentiment in relation to the subject is perhaps strongest in the manifestations of joy and exultation [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, p. 252] with which the relatives and friends followed the body to the grave. These demonstrations were, however, widely different from the spirit in which some barbarous nations (e.g. the Thracians, the earlier inhabitants of Marseilles) often conducted their funeral rites.

The latter indulged in unseemly riot and revelry. The feelings of the early Christians resembled rather those of the ancient Cimbri, who were wont to rejoice over friends fallen in battle (Amm. Marcell. II. vi. 2), and such demonstrations appear to have been confined to (α) the obsequies of a martyr, (β) those of some distinguished benefactor of the Church, (γ) those of an ecclesiastic of superior rank and eminent piety. Jerome, speaking of the funeral of Fabiola, says, "totius urbis populus ad exsequias congregabat; sonabant psalmi, et aurata tecta templorum in sublime quatiebat Alleluia" (Migne, xxii. 466). A decree attributed to pope Eutychianus directs that no martyr shall be interred without a purple undergarment (sine colobeo purpureo), the emblem of his service in the cause of his divine Master (ib. v. 158-161). Gregory of Tours, in recording the burial of St. Lupicinus, says, "celebratis missis, cum summo honore gaudioque sepultus est." The office for the burial of a bishop in the time of Gregory the Great appears to have included the singing of the Hallelujah (Migne, lxxviii. 478, 479); and the singing of hymns when conveying the dead to the place of interment seems to have been an invariable accompaniment. Victor Vitensis, in describing the condition of the faithful during the occupation by the Vandals, ann. 487, says, "Quis vero sustineat, ac possit sine lacrimis recordari, cum praecepit nostrorum corpora defunctorum sine solemnitate hymnorum, cum silentio ad sepulturam perduci" (Hist. Persecut. Vand. I. v.; Migne, lviii. 5). The Pseudo-Dionysius, which may be regarded as of some authority with respect to the theory of the Eastern church in the 5th century, inculcates the observance of distinctions in the funeral rites of the unconverted and of the righteous, corresponding to the sentiments proper to their different careers. Their lives have differed, and so their manner of encountering death must differ. The righteous man, who has not given himself up a slave to corrupt passions and criminal excesses, is filled with joy at the prospect of completing his course of trial. Similarly, his relatives, on his completion of that course, pronounce him happy (καταρίζουσι, πρὸς τὸ νικηφόρον ἐνίκταως ἀφικόμενον τέλος) and glorify Him who has given the victory, hoping that they themselves may come to a like end. These sentiments find, in turn, fitting expression in the actual rites [BURIAL, p. 254]; OBSEQUIES (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. 7; Migne, Series Graeca, iii. 263-265).

Undue parade and excess of adornment are censured by St. Jerome. Writing to the mother of Blaesilla, a convert who had died shortly after her conversion, he says, "ex more parantur exequiae, et nobilium ordine praeunte, aureum feretro velamen obtenditur. Videbatur mihi tunc clamare de coelo: non agnosco vestes, amictus iste non est meus; hic ornatus alienus est" (Migne, xxii. 177). The language of St. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, i. 13) is that of one who looks upon details of ceremonial of this character as of little or no importance. At the third council of Carthage (A.D. 397), at which he was present, the practice of placing the Eucharist between the lips of the defunct was condemned. The ceremony of bidding the deceased farewell, probably by the kiss of peace, was condemned in the 6th century at the council of Auxerre.

The custom of remaining within doors, secluded from society, during the first week of mourning is traced by Buxtorf (Lex. Chald. Talm. ad v. Luctus) to Jewish precedent. Under Valentinian and Theodosius, it was enacted that a widow marrying again within a year from the time of the death of the husband "probrosis inusta notis, honestioris nobilisque personae et decore et jure privetur, atque omnia quae de prioris mariti bonis vel jure sponsaliorum vel iudicio defuncti conjugis consecuta fuerat, amittat et sciat nec de nostro beneficio vel annotatione sperandum sibi esse subsidium" (Cod. Theodosianus, ed. Hänel, iii. 8). This law is evidently a reflex of Roman rather than Christian sentiment (see Ovid, Fasti, iii. 134; Zedler, Universal-Lexicon, s. v. Trauerjahr).

The tolling of the bell at the time of death, which is regarded by some as a tradition from paganism, and designed originally to drive away evil spirits, does not appear as a Christian usage before the 8th century [OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD], and was more probably intended as a signal for prayer. MUINTIR, the Irish family or clan, came to denote the monastic society or congregation, in Latin "familia." It was first applied to all within the one monastery, as used in the Felire of Aengus of the monks of St. Donnan in the island of Egg, and in Ann. Ult. (A.D. 640, 690, 716, 748) of the brotherhood in Iona (Ja), and again (A.D. 763) of those at Durrow and Clonmacnoise, who were at war and bloodshed. But in a wider sense it also included those monasteries which had been founded from the parent house, or were under the rule of abbats who were coarbs of the same original founder and thus owed fealty to the abbat of the chief monastery, like the monasteries at Derry, Durrow, Kilmore, Swords, Rechra, and Drumcliff to that in Iona (Reeves, Adamnan's Life of S. Columba, 162, 304, 342, and Ecol. Ant. of Down, Connor, and Dromore, 153; Todd, St. Patrick, 158-9; Skene, Celtic Scotland ii. 61).

MULCTRA. The figure of the Good Shepherd [SHEPHERD, THE GOOD] is often represented with vessel either hanging on His arm, or suspended from a tree near Him, or lying at His feet.

Lamb with Mulctra. (From the cemetery of Domitilla.)

These are mulctrae, the pails into which the kine are milked. (Compare MILK, p. 1184.) A good example of the introduction of the mulctra is found in the cemetery of Domitilla, where the Lamb, obviously typifying the Lord, has beside Him a milking-vessel suspended on the pastoral staff.

Lamb with Mulctra. (From Martigny.)

The Lamb is also represented at the four angles of a vault of the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Petrus bearing on His back the mulctra surrounded by a nimbus in much the same manner that the fish in the cemetery of St. Cornelia bears a basket containing the bread and wine [CANISTER, p. 264]. The Lamb being the symbol of the Saviour, the mulctra is the symbol of the spiritual nourishment derived from Him.

MUNERARIUS. With the Romans, munus, in one of its senses, denoted a show of gladiators, and the person who paid the expenses of such a show and presided at it (edebat) was called editor, dominus, munerator or munerarius, and was honoured during the day of exhibition, even if a private person, with the official ensigns of a magistrate. [Dict. of Gr. and Roman Antiq. art. 'Gladiatores.']

From the very first, the church stigmatized these shows as cruel and debasing, and withdrew, as far as her power extended, all Christians from any share in or responsibility for them. [GLADIATORS, p. 728.] Tertullian (Apol. cap. 44) refers to such games as employing multitudes of criminals and of the lowest class of people, but among them no Christians; if there were any, that they were sent there simply for being Christians. That a Christian could possibly himself be a munerarius does not seem to have even occurred to him. De vestris [i.e. heathen] semper aestuat carcer, de vestris semper metalla suspirant, de vestris semper bestiae saginantur, de vestris semper munerarii noxiorum greges pascunt, nemo illic Christianus, nisi plane tantum Christianus, aut si et aliud, jam non Christianus." And the council of Elvira (A.D. 305), in its third canon, orders that those Christians who had taken upon them the office of flamen, to which it belonged to exhibit these games, if they had offered the sacrifices to the heathen gods which were customary, were never to be received again to communion, even at the hour of death; and such as did this, but avoided the sacrifice, were put to life-long penance, and only admitted to communion at the hour of death, after satisfactory proof of their penitence. A similar feeling governed the enactment in the 56th canon of the same synod, that all Christians who took upon them the city magistracy or dumvirate (to which office, also, it belonged to exhibit such shows) should be expelled from communion during the whole year in which they held office. Another somewhat deeper shade of blame is attached to those who were present on such occasions, and wore the crown or garland for the sacrifice (comp. Acts xiv. 13), but had neither actually sacrificed nor paid any portion of the expense. Such were readmitted to communion after two years' penance (can. 55). It is to be noticed that such provisions are not repeated by later synods; and probably they were rendered needful by a mere temporary phase of the conflict between Christianity and heathenism; when the newer faith, while yearly growing and already stronger in numbers than the paganism which it was supplanting, had for a while to deal with a social system in which the latter was recognized as the religion of the state. But, in fact, a very few years later (A.D. 313) Christianity was itself established as the religion of the Roman empire by Constantine. Nevertheless the gladiatorial shows lingered on until the reign of the emperor Honorius, almost a hundred years later, and were only then abolished through the self-sacrifice of the monk Telemachus (A.D. 404).

MUSIC.—For the first thousand years of the Christian era, the antique Greek system of music was adopted, with but few alterations, and those chiefly modifications of the compass of the scale, and of the notation. In the article on AMBROSIAN MUSIC, the matter (so far as chants are concerned) is taken down to the 4th century. Through the influence of St. Ambrose, all music but that consisting of a diatonic sequence of notes [see CANON] was discarded; the other methods had been considered preferable, perhaps on account of the difficulty in performing such music, or from reminiscences of an Oriental origin; and with the subsequent irruptions of the barbarians, which must have operated very seriously against the cultivation of any but ecclesiastical music, they became obsolete.

GREGORIAN CHANT.—It was observed by St. Gregory, a great musician of his time, that the Ambrosian chants, handed down traditionally to a great extent, had become corrupted; he therefore subjected them to revision, and added other modes and scales to those four which St. Ambrose had retained. This was done by taking away the upper tetrachord from the Ambrosian scales, and placing it below the lower tetrachord. The octaves thus formed were called from the previous scales, with the prefix hypo (ὕπο), thus: Hypodorian, Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypomixolydian. They were also called Plagal, while the four original ones were called Authentic. Thus in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis (middle of 9th century) we find them called "Authenticus protus; ii. Plaga protii; Tonus tertius autenticus: Tonus quartus, plaga deuteri; Differentie v. toni autenticus tritus; Differentie sexti toni plaga triti; Differentie vii. toni autenticus tetrarchus; Incipiunt viii. toni plaga tetrarchi." Thus we have the Dorian scale (first mode):

giving the Hypodorian (second mode, plagal):

the Phrygian scale (third mode):

giving the Hypophrygian scale (fourth mode, plagal):

the Lydian scale (fifth mode):

giving the Hypolydian scale (sixth mode, plagal):

giving the Hypomixolydian scale (eighth mode, plagal):

But it seems that the compass of chants was expected to be confined within five or six notes, and those which are generally accepted as typical examples in the odd modes are certainly not so much within such limits as those in the even modes, which points to the supposition that St. Ambrose's chants had become so altered that the originals were probably forgotten in most instances: in the first mode, for example, b flat is generally found, whereas it is not in the scale, and certainly some very early copies of chants in this mode have assigned the b without any indication; it is, however, hard to imagine but that it was sung b flat. It must be borne in mind that the system of chanting being a monotone with an ornamental end, there are in every one of these scales two important notes: the Dominant, or prevailing note on which the psalm was sung, and the Final, on which the chant was made to end. These, in the Ambrosian modes, are respectively: Proti a, D; Deuteri c, E; Triti c, F; Tetrardi d, G. In the plagal modes, the same finals, D, E, F, G, were kept, and the dominants placed lower, F, a, a, c. The first mode approximates the most nearly in effect to our modern minor mode: the fifth, to our major mode with its fourth sharpened; the seventh and eighth, to our modern major mode. The sixth, although it consists of the notes now forming the natural scale of C, is really in the tonality of F. Our modern use of the terms authentic and plagal, as applied to cadences, seems derived from the seventh and eighth modes, which are authentic and plagal, from taking the dominant and final in each of them and placing a common chord on them in succession. The authentic (or odd) modes will appear to have their finals as the lowest note in the scales; sometimes, but rarely, melodies written in them have been found to descend a note below this: whereas in the even plagal modes the scale itself descended below the final, and the melodies seldom exceeded a fifth above it; whence the line, "Vult descendere par, sed scandere vult modus impar."

"Majores toni, i.e. autentici, scil. primus et tertius, quintus et septimus possunt descendere una voce a fine et ascendere octo. Minores autem toni, i.e. plagales, viz. secundus et quartus, sextus et octavus possunt ascendere v. vocibus et descendere v., quod patet his versibus:

"Majores a fine toni descendere possunt.
Ad primas voces ascendunt vocibus octo.
Ad quintas voces scandunt a fine minores.
Ad quintas etiam possunt descendere voces."

Coussemaeker, vol. ii.

There is very little direct evidence in the first eight centuries as to what the chants were, but a good deal of indirect evidence from various tracts of the centuries immediately following, in many of which the author speaks of the chants as having come down to him from great antiquity. The great musical epoch that parts mediaeval music from the antique is that of Guido Aretinus (11th century): and he asserts that there was a musical usage of 200 years and upwards at his time.

It appears that a distinction was drawn in the accommodating of chants to the psalms, the introits, the communions, and the responsories. All these appear in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis (9th century), and with the beginnings appear the musical notation, which presents an appearance more like shorthand writing than anything else; a kind of attempt to render visible the pitch of sounds. These same appear also in Guido Aretinus, with notation substantially the same as our present one; so also in the Intonarium attributed to abbat Oddo and believed by Guido Aretinus to be his. In some of these appears a more elaborate form, appropriated to the Canticles Magnificat and Benedictus. The various forms of beginning the antiphons were called Differentiae, and these had appropriated to them different "endings" of the psalm-chant. One antiphon, ingeniously chosen to fix the mode, is given as a specimen, with a pneuma at the end of it, and intended to be committed to memory: and these have, in the Tonarius Reginonis, been added by a later hand.

There are five differentiae of the first tone in Regino: nine in abbat Oddo, and twelve in Guido Aretinus. The following is the description given in the last-named author:

Protus adest, denis formarum nexus habenis
Que modum nectunt autentum undique totum:
He tibi sint cordi, jugiter habeantur in ore;
Has queso ne minuas; poteris si addere curas.

Pri-mum quaerite reg-num Dei.

I.

Glo-ri-a, se-cu-lo-rum, Amen. Ec-ce no-men.

II.

Glo-ri-a se-cu-lo-rum, A-men.

III.

Glo-ri-a se-cu-lo-rum, A-men. . .

IV.

Glo-ria se-cu-lo-rum, A-men.

The fourth mode (Deuterus Plagis):

"Deuterus in quinis subactus congrue piris
Ipsius adstrictim curratur ordine plagin
Que quondam lembls cantus fulcare novenis.
Immensus pelagus multi quoque ciere motus

and the following six endings are given by Guido:

I.

II.

III.

IV.

V.

VI.

In Oddo, four endings are given, including the first and fourth of these: the other two differ somewhat: six differentiae are specified in Regino.

The fifth mode (authentus tritus):

"Troporum quintus tritus agricolae dictus
Insequitur splendens croceo rubroque colore
Hic monstrat ceteros super signacula notos
Deuterum et protum subscripto ordine primum
Claviger ac fortis reserat sic ostia vocis."

The allusion in the second of these lines is to a practice which was extensively adopted after the invention of the stave, of using a red line for that on which F was situated, and a yellow or golden line for C, in place of clefs; C is the dominant and F the final of this mode.

Guido gives three endings:

I.

II.

III.

In Oddo only the first two of these are given; in Regino three differentiae are noticed.

The sixth mode (plagis triti):

"Simplicior casus quam strictas possidet amplas Tertia plagarum districte et prima sub una Regula formarum variisque insistere vocum
Ordinibusque solent fusca colorare alieno
Sub modulo trium referetur tertia vocum."

and one differentia in Regino.

The seventh mode (tetrardus authentus):

"Ultimus authentum tetrardus grece vocatur
Corpore detractas in cujus reddere formas
Perplacuit certis, valeant quo ciere phongis
Pullulat ex proto et trito nam sub super hisque."

Guido gives the following endings :

I.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men. . .

III.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

IV.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

V.

VI.

VII.

VIII.

IX.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

The penultimate note in II. would seem to be an error for a.

Oddo gives six endings, viz. the first, fifth, sixth, and seventh of these; one which is substantially identical with III., and one with which IV. would be identical if the three last notes are written in error for c, b, a. Regino specifies six differentiae.

The eighth mode (plagis tetrardi) :

"Hinc plagis sequitur certoque fine tenetur
Nomen habens proprium toto de termine vocum
Namque alii qui ibi sunt quarti quintique locati
Unde magis melum datur variabile in ipsos,
Nescius ast horum fertur strictissime rectus
Octavus ponitur subsuper, hicque vocatur
Ut nomen loca sic mutat per climata nunquam."

Oct - o . . . sunt . . . be - a - ti -

- - tu - di - nes.

Guido gives four endings :

I.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men. .

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

III.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

IV.

Glo - ria se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

Oddo recognises three differentiae, the first of which is identical with III. above, the third is the ending commonly known and nearly identical with IV., and the second is "the Peregrine Tone:" why it should ever have been classed under the eighth mode is inexplicable to the writer; he thinks it naturally belongs to the first: the beginnings of antiphons given in Oddo are certainly more akin to those of the first mode than to the eighth.

Se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

In ex - i - tu Is - ra - el de E - gyp - to,

Domus Ja - cob . . de po - pu - lo bar - ba - ro, Sa - pi - en - - - tia.

No b flat is here indicated, though it would seem most probable that it was used, as in the first mode above, where it is not written.

This renders the verses more obscure, in the third and fourth lines, which the writer thinks must be intended to refer to the variation between b flat and b natural. Perhaps however Guido would not include this chant under the eighth mode in consequence of its using a b flat.

In Regino three differentiae of this tone are recognised.

As stated above, the endings of the tones were not taken arbitrarily (as is done so commonly at the present time), but depended upon the beginning of the antiphon used with the psalms. In the works here cited, a list of antiphons occur under each differentia, some of which are supplied with musical notation, and the others apparently left for the cantor to sing in like manner.

Thus in abbat Oddo, in the first tone, when the antiphon began on D, the first ending given above was used, thus:

Ant.:

Or. Ant.:

When the Antiphon began on C or on g descending to C, the ninth ending was used ;

Ant.:

Or. Ant.:

And so in other cases.

Of course in the Intonarium of abbat Oddo, the music was indicated by a notation different from the modern one: although it appears with the stave and notes, these must have been added by Guido Aretinus when he revised, or edited, the work. And at the head of every tone or mode, before the antiphons, occur the words NONANNEANE, or NOEACIS; with some slight variations: these are supplied with musical characters, and appear to be artificial words to assist the memory of the singer in making the proper inflections, something after the manner of EVOVAE q. v.: the former of these belong to the authentic modes (first, third, fifth, seventh), the latter to the plagal modes.

In Regino and in Guido are to be found forms for the introits and the communions, which differ in some respects from those already mentioned, generally being fuller, requiring more 'singing' than recitation.

I.

II.

III.

IV.

and for communions the first and third of these.

In Regino three differentiae for introits and one for communions appear.

In the second mode Guido gives the following form for both introits and communions:

No more differentiae are to be found in Regino.

In the third mode, for introits Guido gives the forms:

I.

II.

For communions, he gives (II.) again, and which may be thought an error for (I.) above; but the error, if any, may quite as well be the other way. In Regino, two differentiae for introits, and one for communions appear.

In the fourth mode, Guido gives for introits:

I.

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

III.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men. . .

and the first of these for communions also. In Regino, there are two differentiae for introits, and one for communions.

In the fifth mode, for introits the following two forms appear in Guido, the first of them also for communions:

I.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men. . . .

This appears to agree with Regino.

In the sixth mode, Guido gives two introit forms:

I.

Glo - ria se - cu - lo - rum, Amen.

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

and for communions:

Glo - ria se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

only one form for each appears to be recognised by Regino.

In the seventh mode, Guido gives two introit forms:

I.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men. .

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men. . . .

and two communion forms:

I.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

Only one of each is recognised in Regino.

In the eighth tone, Guido gives the following for introits:

I.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A -

- men.

II.

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

The former of these appears to have a pnuma added to it.

For communions:

Glo - ri - a se - cu - lo - rum, A - men.

Only one of each is recognised in Regino.

Besides these, Guido gives one elaborate form of a chant for the Gloria Patri in each mode: it is preceded by a response and a versicle. These responses appear in Regino, for the most part: but in that work it is professedly a selection of them only that is given.

The Intonarium of abbat Oddo concludes with a short "Modus Intonandi Psalmos," professing to be then of an antiquity of two centuries and upwards: the following complete forms for the tones appear; they are as given below, with an example "Dixit Dominus" (Ps. 110):

Pri-mus tonussic flec-ti-tur, et sic e-le-va-tur, et sic fi-ni-tur.

The G before the last three notes has been accidentally omitted, as it is given in his examples. Here we have the 'intonation' at the beginning, and the 'mediation' ("sic elevatur,") and the 'ending': besides this an 'inflection' appears; but it does not seem quite clear how this is to be used.

Se-cun-dus to-nus sic flec-ti-tur, et sic e-le-va-tur, et sic fi-ni-tur.

The tenor clef here seems put by mistake for the bass.

The last five notes of this have been placed a line or space too high, as appears from the examples: they should be F, G, a, G, F.

From the examples the notes e, d, c, at "sic e-le-" should be f, e, d.

A more florid form was adopted for the Magnificat and Benedictus, in this work of the abbat's, and has been continued in later authors:

I.

This ending is misplaced a line or space too low, as appears from the psalm 'Dixit Dominus' given with it.

It appears also that occasionally the modes in Antiphons were changed, i.e. an Antiphon would begin in one mode and end in another. This is what is called in Euclid commutation or modulation (μεταβολή), for example changing from Dorian into Phrygian, or the like. Thus in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis, under the first tone we find to the antiphon "Domine salva nos, perimus," the note "Finit[ur] iiii tono;" and under the 2nd tone to "Cum indurent" and "Primum audisset Job" is the note "Ton. j potest esse." And so in Guido Aretinus, "Sunt preterea plurime antiphonarum que hujus videntur formulæ [third tone] cum sint ex autento proto et prima voce: sic est Pulchra es et inter quas quidem autentici deuteri faciunt, non bene tonorum semitoniorumque positionem intuentes: vel idcirco eas deuteri faciunt quidam quibusdam D, E, F, et G, finales constitute in omnibus omnino modis vel vocum tropis indifferenter et improvide sint." Again under Tone 6: "Iste due communiones que sequuntur, i.e. Panem de celo et Anima nostra proprie sunt de quinto tono et de secunda differentia. Multa responsoria sunt ex isto modo que magis finiuntur in tetrardo quam in trito, sicut est Ego sum id quod sum." So J. M. Neale (De Sequentiis ad H. A. Daniel Epistola) mentions some MSS. containing a list of sequences &c., in which occurs the word "Frigdola," applied to melodies, as some other adjectives are in the MS.: of which he says, "Frigdola vel Frigdora facilius agnoscit etymon: idem enim vult atque Phrygo-Doricum, i.e. Tonus primus mixtus cum tertio." One of the best known examples of this practice is the old melody of the Te Deum, usually attributed to St. Ambrose; which is in the third and fourth modes combined: and this fact would lead us to conclude that the melody had undergone some change since St. Ambrose's time, as the fourth mode was not then in use, unless indeed the tradition of it may have varied, which is quite possible, and may have had some weight in inducing St. Gregory to add the four plagal modes.

The chief authors used here are those mentioned, and reference has been made also to later ones, such as St. Bernard (Tonale), Peter de Cruce, Walter de Odington, John de Muris, Hucbaldus, &c., preserved in the collections of abbé Gerbert and M. de Coussemaker. The most valuable authority (probably) is the treatise of Gabriel

There is no indication here whether the b in the first tone is flat or natural: but probably the flat would be taken, in the synnemenon tetrachord of the Dorian mode.

Amongst the early authors preserved by abbé Gerbert occurs Aurelian; he lived in the ninth century, and he gives the following varieties in the several tones:

Nivers (Paris, 1685) which the writer has in vain endeavoured to meet with: it is mentioned in Sir John Hawkins' History of Music as the most exhaustive book on the subject published up to that time, and seems to have been pretty well known then.

MUSICAL NOTATION.—During the first six centuries of the Christian era the Greek musical notation was in universal use, and indeed the knowledge of it was kept up as late as the time of John de Muris (c. 1320). This notation was exceedingly complicated, being at first sight purely arbitrary, and scarcely reducible to any law. This is the more extraordinary, as some instances can be observed which indicate the acquaintance possessed by the ancients with the property of the octave which has caused sounds separated by that interval to be now called by the same name. Referring to Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities it will be seen that the different modes, Dorian &c., were ultimately, at any rate, nothing more than transpositions of the 'greater system' of two octaves:

and they were determined by the pitch of the Proslambanomenos, the lowest note, an octave below the Mese.

These are mentioned in Euclid's Introductio Harmonica. But the most important work for this purpose is the tract of Alypius, published by Meibomius amongst the Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem: this consists of a short preface, a mere résumé of Euclid's Introductio, and a catalogue of all the notes in every mode. There were five principal modes, the Dorian, Iastian, Phrygian, Aolian, and Lydian: these had for their Proslambanomeni respectively and five others, named from the above with the prefix Hyper, whose Proslambanomeni were and five others, named from the first with the prefix Hypo, whose Proslambanomeni were

The Proslambanomenos of the Hypodorian mode was supposed to be the lowest sound producible by the human voice (βόμβος, Eucl. sect.

Can. Theor. 19). Meibomius arranged all the diatonic notes in a tabular form (as also all the chromatic notes, and the enharmonic notes), but the overlapping of the synemmenon and diezeugmenon tetrachords has caused his diagrams to be rather obscure.

The writer has combined the whole set, without this disadvantage; but it was impossible to introduce them here without interfering with the convenience of the book.

The following notes, being those of the diatonic Dorian mode, are given as an example.

Proslambanomenos	(our Δ),	И	Π	(antinu and double π).
Hypate hypaton	(B),	Ι	Ε	(ι sideways, and ε written square).
Parhypate hypaton	(C),	Ε	Ε	(half θ, looking downwards, and ε square, inverted).
Lichanos hypaton	(D),	Δ	Τ	(δ inverted, and τ sideways, reversed).
Hypate meson	(E),	Ω	μ	(the left half of μ).
Parhypate meson	(F),	Υ	Ρ	(half μ inverted).
Lichanos meson	(G),	Τ	Φ	(digamma reversed).
Mese	(a),	Π	Ϟ	(s reversed).
Trite synemmenon	(b ♮)	Ο	Κ
Paranete synemmenon	(c),	Κ	Δ	(half δ extended).
Nete synemmenon	(d),	Η	>	(λ sideways, reversed).
Paramese	(b ♯),	Μ	Π	(π extended).
Trite diezeugmenon	(c),	Λ	Υ	(half δ inverted).
Paranete diezeugmenon	(d),	Η	>
Nete diezeugmenon	(e),	Γ	Ζ
Trite hyperboleon	(f), -	Β	/	(the acute accent).
Paranete hyperboleon	(g),	Χ	/	(χ with a line through it, διεφθορός, and the left half of α looking down).
Nete hyperboleon	(a a),	⊥	Λ	(τ inverted, and the right half of α looking up).

The following are the notes with their present equivalents :

NOTE.—"We have seen by the treatise of Alypius, written professedly to explain the Greek musical characters, to what an amazing number they amounted, 1240 at the lowest computation." (Hawkins' History of Music, p. 104 ed. Novello, 1853.) The number of characters here given is eighty-four; to these must be added the accented ones (twenty-eight), and a few in Aristides Quintilianus. I have tabulated sixty-three vocal notes and sixty-three instrumental, from Alypius, and the total number of entries in a complete diagram is 810.

The ambiguities here shewn arise from the different genera, enharmonic, chromatic, and diatonic. There are no ambiguities in any given mode. The enharmonic notes (which have a ♯ over them) have generally the same symbols as the chromatic notes next above them. In a few instances, where four alternatives are given, those with the line through them are chromatic notes, in the Lydian mode: the writer is inclined to suspect that this was carried throughout all the chromatic systems for the sake of distinction.

The immoveable sounds (ἐστώτες), viz. the Proslambanomenos, Hypate hypaton, Hypate meson, Mese, Nete synemmenon, Paramese, Nete diezeugmenon, and Nete hyperboleon, are of course expressed in the three genera (in any given mode) by the same symbols; the two Parhypatae and three Tritae in the three genera have the same characters; these chromatic and diatonic notes are identical, but the enharmonic ones are flatter. The two Lichani, and three Paraneatae of the chromatic genus, are distinguished by the line through them.

In some of the latter notes an accent will be found; it is probable that this should be applied to both the symbols employed: these are all one octave above the notes belonging to the corresponding unaccented symbols. This must evidently have been done when the 'Great System' received its fullest development, and the property of the octave mentioned before had been observed, so that the musicians avoided the necessity of introducing fresh arbitrary symbols. But it is a surprising thing that this did not suggest a reform in the notation, discarding for the lower notes symbols different from those in the medium pitch, and making a somewhat similar accommodation. For these symbols had become now representatives of pitch, rather than of the place in the scale.

The pairs of symbols are sometimes put side by side, instead of over each other, as just given; the first of them has reference to the voice, the other to the accompanist on the lyre or other instrument. It is strange that it should not have been seen that one symbol would be quite sufficient for both purposes; and great complication must have arisen from the use of the same symbol to express different sounds, according as it was to be sung or played: thus Π as a vocal note is  the Proslambanomenos of the Hypoaeolian mode in all the three genera, or the same sound as the Hypate hypaton of the Hypoastian mode in them all; or the same sound as the enharmonic Lichanos hypaton of the Hypodorian mode; or it is the chromatic Lichanos hypaton of the Hypodorian mode: but as an instrumental note, it is the Trite hyperboleon in the Hypolydian mode, or the Trite diezeugmenon in the Lydian mode, or the Trite synemmenon in the Hyperastian mode, and will therefore be  when it is diatonic or chromatic, and  when enharmonic. (Here the ♯ or ♭ above the modern note sharpens or flattens it by a quarter-tone.)

Aristides Quintilianus gives a description of all the genera and modes, with notation, which is identical with that of Alypius, but a little extension downwards is perceptible. It would appear that the enharmonic system was becoming obsolete in his time, or likely to become so; for he speaks of the diatonic as most natural (φυσικώτερον) and capable of being used even by uninstructed people (πᾶσι γὰρ, καὶ τοῖς ἀπαιδεύτοις παντάπασι μελωδητόν ἐστι); of the chromatic, as most artistic (τεχνικώτατον), being manageable by practised performers only (παρὰ γὰρ μόνοις μελωδεῖται τοῖς πεπαιδευμένοις); of the enharmonic, as most subtle (ἀκριβέστερον), because it requires none but the most advanced musicians to attempt it (παρὰ γὰρ τοῖς ἐπιφανεστάτοις ἐν μουσικῇ τεύχθηκε παραδοχῆς); and that it is impossible to average people, and they were discontinuing the use of it (τοῖς δὲ πολλοῖς ἐστὶν ἀδύνατον. ὅθεν ἀπέγνωσαν τινες τὴν κατὰ δῖεσιν μελωδίαν, διὰ τὴν αὐτῶν ἀσθένειαν καὶ παντελῶς ἀμελωδητόν εἶναι τὸ διάστημα ὑπολαβόντες). He gives the enharmonic notes arranged in dieses for the lowest octave , and in semitones for the next octave. In this list appear the following, not in Alypius.  used for  (it has been already used for FF#), and  for . And in another list of notes, arranged according to tones, he gives  for  and  for

From his semitonic list we find also  and

B' for  respectively, and for .

He has also catalogued them in such a manner as to shew that the vocal notes were first chosen, having the twenty-four letters adopted in their usual form; then these for the most part inverted, some written 'imperfect,' and ξ and s 'doubled': also  and ; and F correlative with E.

If the diatonic vocal notes be taken out, they give the following:

A or B	Γ or E	Z	H or Θ

I	K or Λ	M or ξ	O

Π or P	C	T or Υ	Φ

X or Ψ	Ω or R	Γ	Δ or F

Ζ	Η or Θ	Λ or V	W

Η or ω	Θ	U or β	3

This ends at the Hypate hypaton of the Hypodorian mode, and, therefore, must have been in use before the Proslambanomenos was added to the scale. The first note, A, is the Nete diezeugmenon of the Iastian mode, or Nete synemmenon of the Aeolian, and also in their derivatives. The sound is not in the Lydian or the Phrygian mode at all; the Dorian employs B, the Hyperdorian both, and the Hyperphrygian B. The remaining inverted letters seem to have been adopted for the Hyperbolean tetrachord, which would obviously have been added to the lyre at some later period.

1 or λ	θ	χ or ρ	υ

The law of this seems fairly evident, the alternatives arising from different modes. The order, it will be perceived, is precisely the contrary of the modern one; probably it was derived from the position of the lyre, and the hand of the performer on it. The highest note but one of the original tetrachords, being called λίχανος, would seem to indicate that the highest string was played by the thumb, and the others by our first, second, and third fingers, and this made one "position" of the hand, which would be "shifted" for another tetrachord; the lyre would be held on the left side of the performer, and the letters of the alphabet would follow the order of the fingers of the right hand. The omitted letters, Δ, Ν, Β, Ξ are only chromatic and enharmonic notes. When the Proslambanomenos was adopted it involved two more symbols; C , as next to C , but not inverted, presented itself at once for , then

C for an enharmonic note, and next C for

were indicated by accenting their replicates below, as has been said. The instrumental notes were then, apparently, made up of the various contrivances seen above. The authors, here appealed to, flourished at the beginning of the second century.

The most celebrated author (in musical respects) of the early centuries is Boethius; unfortunately his work, De Musica, was left incomplete; in his time evidence is forthcoming of a modification of the notation in the direction of simplicity; still the old notation was preserved, and in some cases the letters were joined together, thus Z . There appear to be some errors in the text of Boethius, owing probably to insufficient acquaintance with the notation, and clerical errors in the MS.; as the symbols in some cases do not agree with Boethius's own description of them. One deserves notice: the Parhypate hypaton of the Lydian mode is described rightly as β imperfect, yet it is given in four different places in Boethius as BL ; and apparently this has been copied by later writers. These seem to have contented themselves with one symbol only in the pairs; thus Hucbaldus

The N here is doubtless a corruption of the "careless" η .

And later still, John de Muris uses some of these notes:

But the great change made about this time was the adoption of Latin letters instead of Greek, and using one symbol only, instead of two. Boethius gives the following as one system of notes :

Parhypate hypaton,	B:	" C.

The Proslambanomenos here has no letter assigned to it; but it seems that it was soon found advisable to do this, and so the whole of the set just given was shifted one place, thus using up the letters from A to P, and occupying the double octave through our modern natural notes.

But in another place Boethius gives a larger system, combining all the three genera, and giving the relative lengths of the strings producing the respective sounds.

His description of this is, "Sed ita ut quoniam trium generum est facienda partitio, nervorum que modus literarum excedit numerum, ubi defecerint literae, easdem geminamus versus hoc modo, ut quando ad Z fuerit usque perventum, ita describamus reliquos nervos Bis A, i.e. AA, et bis B, i.e. BB." He assigns A, O, and LL, and a few more, but some errors would seem to have crept into the table from whence the above is obtained.

It appears from Walter de Odyngton that the double octave of the diatonic genus at one time, used the letters from A to S, the Proslambanomenos being A, and the rest up to the Mese B, C, D, E, F, G, H; the synmenon notes I, K, L; and the diezeugmenon and hyperboleon M, N, O, P, Q, R, S. This would make K and L identical with N and O. But it would seem that this was soon reduced to the fifteen. Accordingly we find Jerome de Moravia describing the eight modes as follows:

"Let the double octave be A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, K, L, M, N, O, P. Then—

A to H is an 8ve, and is the Hypodorian mode.
B to I	" Hypophrygian "
C to K	" Hypolydian "
D to L	" Dorian "
E to M	" Phrygian "
F to N	" Lydian "
G to O	" Mixolydian "

And another one must be added, from H to P, which was done by Ptolemy."

The next development is due to St. Gregory, and arises from a further perception of the qualities of the octave as alluded to above, in respect of the accented Greek symbols for the upper notes; if the synemmenon tetrachord be eliminated, the notes from the Mese upwards are each an octave above those from the Proslambanomenos; and when performed they produce an almost identical effect. The idea may have been suggested by the accented Greek notes; anyhow St. Gregory made those from the Mese become replicates of the preceding ones, by assigning to them the same letters; this rejected all the letters beyond the first seven; the notes from the Proslambanomenos to the Lichanos meson, inclusive, being written A, B, C, D, E, F, G; from the Mese to the Parante hyperboleon a, b, c, d, e, f, g; and the Nete hyperboleon itself aa. This notation is sometimes used at the present day, and the writer has had to employ it here. It is obvious that this can be continued further, and, indeed, is the basis of our present nomenclature. If the synemmenon tetrachord be re-introduced, it requires the note next to a to be a semitone, not a tone above it; accordingly, in the course of time, the letter belonging to this received two forms, "quadratum" and "rotundum," h and b, according as the diezeugmenon or synemmenon tetrachord was to be used; these were also called b "durum" and b "molle," and the former became written h. This is the origin of the German nomenclature of H for the note a semitone below C, confining B to that a semitone above A (e.g. J. S. Bach's fugue on his own name:

and also of the terms "dur" and "moll" applied to the major and minor tonality. It will be at once seen in the key of G; it is also the origin of the symbol b, and the French term bémol, applied thereunto.

Accordingly we find Walter de Odyngton giving the compass of the modes, thus: "Dorius. C D E F G a b h c d; Hypodorius Plaga prothi, Γ A B C D E F G a b; Phrygius, C D E F G a h c d e; Hypophrygius Plaga deuteri, A B C D E F G a b h c; Lydius, E F G a b h c d e f; Hypolydius Plaga triti, B C D E F G a b c d; Hypermixolydius Γ G a h c d e f g; Mixolydius Plaga tetrardi, C D E F G a b h c d e." (The Γ in the last but one should apparently be F.)

These letters were written over or under the words to be sung; there was no method of indicating duration of sound, that being entirely dependent upon the "quantity" of the syllable. Thus, from Jerome de Moravia:

G a c c c c c c c c c c c a a

Another method of notation appears to have been in considerable use about the 8th and 9th centuries, invented apparently to diminish, if possible, the number of the arbitrary symbols employed. For this purpose the system of tetrachords was employed, but they were all disjoined by a tone from each other, giving the notes of our natural scale from to and occasionally to .

The symbols present in one tetrachord a similarity to the characters of the lowest notes in the Lydian mode, h, Γ, B (ought to be "imperfect"), F; it is alleged that they are all made from the first of these, for the most part by affixing a s in various positions to it. Thus the first four are h h h h which correspond to the notes ;

for the tetrachord next above, these were reversed, h h h h corresponding to

; for the next two tetrachords above these were inverted, h h h h, corresponding to ;

and h h h h, corresponding to . Also h h were used for . The connection of h h h h together is not very evident, but it professes to exist. In abbé Gerbert's collection, h is replaced by h. This notation is largely used by Hucbaldus, and is mentioned by Guido Aretinus.

These notes were put in amongst the text, or over it; this latter mode doubtless to simplify the reading of the work.

Ex.—A Cadence, &c., in the first mode, from Hucbaldus:

One method of assisting the performer by indicating the distances between sounds is mentioned by Hermanus Contractus; it consisted in specifying the intervals which the note belonging to each syllable stood above or below the preceding note; thus, e for unison (equal), s for semitone, t for tone, ts for the Minor third, d for the perfect fourth (diatessaron), δ for the perfect fifth (diapente) a point being placed after these when the interval was taken in a descending manner; and a comma when ascending: for example:

Ter tri - a junctorum sunt in - ter - val - la so - no - rum.

It was then attempted to render the positions of the sounds visible, so that the eye might assist the ear of the performer; and the first system was that mentioned before as like shorthand: the following is extracted from the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis, under the Second Tone.

Se - cun - dum au - tem si - mi - le est huic.

O Sa - pi - en - ti - a.

These are not precisely identical with the versions above, or in Walter de Odyngton. But it is obvious that great uncertainty must have prevailed on this system, so that without diligent study and much instruction no singer could sing these without error; accordingly we find that great varieties were known, so much that almost every church had its own way of singing. This was partly remedied by the introduction of a red line and sometimes another which would tend to fix the pitch of the notes placed on or near them. According to Sir John Hawkins (Hist. Music) Gabriel Nivers examined many old MSS., and concluded that the whole system of notation before the time of Guido Aretinus was uncertain, that there were no means, in this method, of ascertaining the distinction between a tone and a semitone, which of course was of itself sufficient to induce musicians to seek improvements.

The first was the multiplication of these lines and the writing of the words on them in such a manner that the position of the syllable should indicate the sound to which it was to be sung. Each line corresponded to a sound of the scale of the mode adopted, and the symbol for its note was placed at the beginning of it. See the example on the next page, from 'Aribonis Scholastica.'

This was further improved by adopting a red line for the place of F, and a yellow one for that of C. So we find Guido Aretinus writing in his Micrologus,

"Quasdam lineas signamus variis coloribus
Ut quo loco sit sonus mox discernat oculus;
Ordine tertiae vocis splendens crocus radiat,
Sexta ejus, sed affinis flavo rubet minio."

C being the third from A, and F the sixth, in ascending order.

The next step was to banish the words from these lines, and put points on them. In Sir John Hawkins' Hist. Music is a specimen given from Vincentio Galilei, which is much anterior to Guido Aretinus; but it does not appear to have been correctly translated; the version is here revised, according to the notes given above.

It is easy to see what a great convenience the coloured lines introduced would be in the great number that would often be used.

The improvement of Guido Aretinus consisted in placing notes in the spaces, i.e. abolishing every other line; when this was done, the fifth mode was the only one which would have both F and C on lines, and therefore be "splendens croceo rubroque colore."

A mystical reason has been assigned to these coloured lines: a yellow line is assigned to C, because gold is the most precious among the metals, and C may represent Charity, the chief of the Christian graces; and a red line is given to F, which may stand for Faith that caused the martyrs to seal their testimony with their blood.

These lines most probably were intended in the first instance to represent the actual strings, something after the manner in which the music for the lute was written "in tablature" (see Mace's Musick's Monument, 1676), but the ancients were not apparently acquainted with the art of "stopping" strings in performance. And so, curiously enough, to this day in the harp, coloured strings (red and black) are assigned to the C's and F's, the others being the natural colour of the catgut; it is difficult to avoid connecting this with the old practice, as G would now be a more likely note to be chosen than F.

Consequently Guido's improvement may be said to be the invention of the stave, in the sense of indicating the sound irrespective of the instrument producing it, and when this was once done the whole system of music became so revolutionised as to enter upon a new phase altogether, mediæval instead of antique; which is foreign to the purpose of this book.

The writer has here used the modern stave of five lines, and the modern forms of some of the clefs: there is no difference in principle between these and their predecessors, and the music is much more easily read.

MUSIC, CHRISTIAN USE OF.—We are left a good deal to conjecture to what extent music was used, or what forms it took. The first intimation is that of St. Paul (Ephes. v. 19; Col. iii. 16), in which he recognises three distinct kinds of composition; psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs (ψαλμοί, ὕμνοι, ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαί): these it would seem most reasonable to suppose to be the Psalms of David, original compositions in stanzas, and more irregular compositions, such as the choruses in the Greek plays. Each of these would require a somewhat different musical treatment, although all of them would be little else than recitative. (Vide HYMNS.) The first of these would be fitted with a monotonous chant having an ending, as shewn above; the second with something more like a rhythmical tune, and the third with a melody similar to those of the antiphons. It is commonly believed that St. Ambrose took a melody that had been in use in pagan rites, and adapted it to his Advent hymn "Creator alme siderum," which melody is still in use, though with some varieties of reading; and it is easy to see that for such compositions the example would be followed. All the early writers assign to St. Ignatius the introduction of antiphonal chanting; "A quibus vel quando cepit antiphona dici, Ignatius Antiochie Syrie tertius post Apostolum Petrum Episcopus, qui et jam (etiam?) cum ipsis degebat apostolis, vidit visionem angelorum, quomodo per antiphonas Sancte Trinitati dicebant ymnos. Isque modus visionis Antiochie tradidisse probatur ecclesie, et ex hoc ad cunctas transivit ecclesias." (Tonarius Regionis Prumensis.) Accordingly we find these forms appearing in the liturgies: the thirty-third psalm is specified in that of St. Clement, and the twenty-third and others in St. James's. But the presence of a choir is recognised, and a part assigned them. Lit. St. Mark: καὶ ψάλλουσιν ὁ μονογενής, — καὶ ψάλλουσι τὸν χερουβικόν, — σὺν αὐτοῖς ὑμνοῦντων καὶ λεγοντων '[Ο λαός] "Ἅγιος ἅγιος ἅγιος Κύριος.

So in St. James: Εἰτα οἱ ψάλλται τὸν τρισά-γιον ψάλλουσιν ὕμνον, — Οἱ ψάλλται Ἄξιόν ἐστιν ὡς ἀληθῶς κ.τ.λ., — Καὶ πάλιν ψάλλουσιν, — and St. Chrysostom: Καὶ ψάλλεται τὸ πρῶτον Ἀντίφωνον παρὰ τῶν ψαλτῶν (and so for the second antiphon, and the third, or in some cases the beatitudes); ψαλλομένου δὲ τοῦ Τρισαγίου, λέγει ὁ ἱερεὺς τὴν εὐχὴν ταύτην μυστικῶς, — Εὐχὴ, ἣν λέγει ὁ ἱερεὺς καθ' ἑαυτὸν, τοῦ Χερουβικοῦ ᾄδομένου. Accordingly provision is made for a choir in the early churches. Neale (Introduction to Translation of Primitive Liturgies) gives a ground plan of the church of St. Theodore at Athens; in it the choir are placed under the trullus, or dome, which position was maintained up to the 12th century. A very early ode is still extant, ὡς ἱερὰν ἁγίας δόξης; but it is not known whether the music of it has been preserved. The use of the church of Alexandria in the 4th century is shewn by an account in the Geronticon of St. Pambo, abbat of Nitria (apud Gerbert); he had sent a disciple there for some purpose, and the disciple regretted the ignorance of singing in the monastery: Ἀπελθόντος γάρ μου ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ, εἶδον τὰ τάγματα τῆς ἐκκλησίας πῶς ψάλλουσι, καὶ ἐν λύπῃ γέγονα πολλή, διατὶ καὶ ἡμεῖς οὐ ψάλλομεν κανόνας καὶ τροπάρια" (vide CANON OF ODES). The abbat thought his disciple departing from primitive simplicity. From another work of uncertain date, but of great antiquity, preserved by Gerbert, the Institutio Patrum de modo psallendi sive cantandi, we find three kinds of chanting recognised, according to the nature of the day, whether a principal festival, a Sunday or saint's day, or an ordinary day: "Tres ordines melodiarum in tribus distinctionibus temporum habeamus, verbi gratia, in praecipuis solemnitatibus toto corde et ore omnique affectu devotionis; in Dominicis diebus et majoribus festivitibus sive natalitiis sanctorum . . . multo remissius; privatis autem diebus ita psalmodia modulatur nocturnis horis, et cantus de die, ut omnes possent devote psallere et intente cantare sine strepitu vocis, cum affectu absque defectu." And the nature of this chant, as similar to the Gregorian chant, appears also: "syllabas, verba, metrum, in modo et in finem versus, id est, initium, medium, et finem, simul incipimus, et pariter dimittamus. Punctum aequaliter teneant omnes. In omni textu lectionis, psalmodiae vel cantus, accentus sive concentus verborum (in quantum suppetit facultas) non negligatur, quia exinde permaxime redolet intellectus. Scire debet omnis cantor, quod litterae quae liquescunt in metrica rite, etiam in Neumis musicae ritibus liquescunt." This last shews that the musical rhythm conformed to the poetical, elisions and crases being made when necessary; and probably that the system of one note to a syllable was adopted; in this case Neuma (q. v.) would mean a cadence, and not assume its more usual meaning.

It does not appear that the early British church used any music in the services; from the few remains of the old churches that have come down to us, it would seem that no provision was made for a choir: this is remarkable, so far as the Cambrian part of the British church is concerned, since they had an order of bards, and were skilled in the harp. According to John the deacon, certain singers came with St. Augustine to Canterbury, and the church's song (more Romano) became known in Kent; and in several instances we find from Bede that exertions were made to spread this over England. Thus when St. Paulinus became bishop of Rochester he left behind him in the diocese of York a deacon, James, a skilled musician, who lived at Catterick, and taught the Roman or Cantuarian method of church song. "Qui, quoniam cantandi in ecclesia erat peritissimus, . . . etiam magister ecclesiasticae cantionis iuxta morem Romanorum seu Cantuariorum multis coepit exsistere." (Bede, ii. 20.) And the custom of using music in the church service began to be generally spread over England at the accession to the see of Canterbury of archbishop Theodore (A.D. 669). "Sed et sonos cantandi in ecclesia, quos eatenus in Cantia tantum noverant, ab hoc tempore per omnes Anglorum ecclesias discere coeperunt; primusque, excepto Jacobo, . . . cantandi magister Northanhumbrore ecclesiis Eddi cognomento Stephanus fuit, invitatus de Cantia a reverendissimo viro Wilfrido" (Bede, iv. 2); and the archbishop filled up the vacant see of Rochester by another musician, Putta; "maxime modulandi in ecclesia more Romanorum, quem a discipulis beati papae Gregorii didicerat, peritum" (ibid.): a few years afterwards this bishop abandoned his see, and having received an appointment from the bishop of Lichfield of a church and glebe, propagated church music: "in illa solum ecclesia Deo serviens et ubicunque rogabatur ad docenda ecclesiae carmina divertens." (Bede, iv. 12.) About this time John the precentor of St. Peter's, Rome, was sent by pope Agatho, and received by Benedict Biscop into his monastery at Wearmouth for the purpose of teaching church music, and was very much resorted to. "Non solum autem idem Joannes ipsius monasterii fratres docebat, verum de omnibus pene ejusdem provinciae monasteriis ad audiendum eum, qui cantandi erant periti, confluebant. Sed et ipsum per loca, in quibus doceret, multi invitare curabant." (Bede, iv. 18.) From this we may fairly infer that the Cantus Gregorianus soon became naturalised in England so as to create an Anglican tradition of it, of which there is reason to suppose traces have descended to this day.

The same use was professed in France and Germany, but had become corrupted. Gabriel Nivers (quoted by Sir John Hawkins, Hist. Music) asserts that in consequence of pope Stephen II. coming to Pepin, king of France, a number of singers who had accompanied him propagated the church-song in the Gregorian manner over France generally; but after the death of Pepin, the purity of the song was not maintained. In consequence, Charlemagne made an application to pope Adrian to send experts to restore the music: this was attended to, but a second mission of experts had to be made before the desired result was accomplished.

Instruments.—Whatever evidence is forthcoming, is to the effect that the early Christians did not use musical instruments. Various causes would operate: the poverty of a considerable portion of the church, the frequency of persecution, but chiefly the associations, theatrical and indecent, with which the musical instruments that were attainable were associated. (v. DIAPALMA). But at a later period, after the disruption of the empire, and the re-organisation of society, such causes not existing to any extent, the feeling against instruments ceased to exist; and we find that organs were introduced into churches and in some cases other instruments also. Thus it appears, from the above reference to Gabriel Nivers, that the choir that accompanied pope Stephen II. into France spread over that country not only the knowledge of the Roman plain-song, but also the use of instruments. Organs deserve a separate notice.

Harmony.—Whether the ancients were acquainted with harmony has been much disputed: the writer, following most of the eminent musicians, is strongly of opinion that they were not (v. CANON OF THE SCALE): ἀρμονία would appear to mean nothing more than 'true intonation,' or producing successive notes in their right sound. Seneca has been cited to prove the contrary. "Non vides quam multorum vocibus chorus constet? Unus tamen ex omnibus sonus redditur. Aliqua illic acuta est, aliqua gravis, aliqua media. Accedunt viris feminae, interponuntur tibiae, singulorum latent voces, omnium apparent." It would be perfectly impossible that "one sound" should be produced under such circumstances, unless the voices and instruments sung and played in unisons and octaves. This passage and others appear in Hawkins' History, and the writer only wishes to add that the adoption of the accented symbols (as shewn above) for notes an octave above the others appears to him proof positive that this is the true meaning of this and similar phraseology. When men and women sing together the same melody, their voices are really an octave apart; and if the "interposition" of the tibia is to be taken literally, the consequence is consecutive fifths or discordance, which would be detected instantly as not 'unus sonus.'

It has been conjectured that the practice of harmony of some kind, i.e. the use of two notes not always of the same modern name (A, B, C, D, E, F, G) simultaneously, so that two persons would not always sing in unisons or octaves, took its rise in Northumbria in the 8th century. Sir J. Hawkins quotes Giraldu Cambrensis, who gives the following account, and believes (Hawkins thinks without sufficient reason) that the Northumbrians obtained it from Denmark or Norway. "In borealibus quoque majoris Britanniae partibus trans Humbrum, Eboracique finibus Anglorum populi qui partes illas inhabitant simili canendo symphoniaceae utuntur harmonia: binis tamen solummodo differentiae et vocum modulando varietatibus, una inferius submurmurante altera vero superne demulcente pariter et delectante (i.e. singing 'in two parts'). Nec arte tantum sed usu longaevo et quasi in naturam mora diutina jam converso, haec vel illa sibi gens hanc specialitatem comparavit. Qui alio apud utramque invaluit et altas jam radices posuit, ut nihil hic simpliciter, ubi multipliciter ut apud priores, vel saltem dupliciter ut apud sequentes, mellite proferri consueverit. Pueris etiam (quod magis admirandum) et fere infantibus (cum primum a fletibus in cantus erumpunt) eandem modulationem observantibus. Angli vero quoniam non generaliter omnes sed boreales solum hujusmodi vocum utuntur modulationibus, credo quod a Dacis et Norwagiensibus, qui partes illas insulae frequentius occupare et diutius obtinere solebant, sicut loquendi affinitatem, sic canendi proprietatem contraxerunt." (Camb. Descr. xiii.)

It has been already noticed that John the precentor of Rome lived at Wearmouth for some time and taught music; and it has been conjectured that the invention of this kind of harmony (or its introduction into England) is due to him. The writer thinks that the system described by Giraldu may mean no more than that the melody was not sung in octaves, at least at the time of John, whatever it may have become afterwards. If this be true, the practice of harmony in church music is due to the church of Rome.

The writer is aware, and thinks he ought here to mention, that Sir F. Ouseley (a good authority) believes harmony to be an invention of the northern tribes of Europe; but he is not acquainted with the evidence for this belief: and Professor Macfarren (Lectures on Harmony) contrasts the peoples of the South and North in respect of inventive power of melody and harmony. Those who advocate the opinion that the ancients were acquainted with harmony, consider a strong point of evidence to be the number of voices and instruments collected together on several public occasions: but as the writer is not satisfied with this, he thinks it more likely that harmony was a discovery of the learned musicians, who had had the experience of their predecessors for centuries, during which many advances had been made in the science of music, and that the inventive powers of the people have little to do with it: and in this view it is certainly most likely that such a discovery should have been made, or at least pursued, chiefly at Rome. It is rather difficult to imagine barbarous tribes inventing harmony while civilised people were ignorant of it and studied music all the while. Certainly towards the ninth century, the practice of producing octaves, fifths, or fourths simultaneously was known, and in the former two cases it was called 'symphonia,' and in the latter 'diaphonia.' The terms 'succentus' and 'concentus' are also used as synonymous with 'symphonia.' Regino Prumensis allows the use of succentus in octaves and fifths, but he prohibits diaphony: Hucbaldus acknowledges both. Thus for a 'symphony' of octaves and fifths we should have, in the fifth tone—and for a diaphony of fourths, we should have

The ancients always considered the fourth a concord; and it is a satisfactory interval in melody; probably for this reason the experiment of singing in fourths as well as in fifths and octaves was tried, and found unsatisfactory: wherefore it was called diaphony, a term used by the ancients as contrary to συμφωνία. This is doubtless the reason why the fourth is now considered a dissonance. Harmony appears to have extended no further than this before the time of Guido Aretinus. [J. R. L.]

MYROPHORI (μυροφόροι). The women who brought to the Lord's tomb the "spices and ointments" which they had prepared are so called in Greek office-books. The third Sunday after Easter is in the Greek church the "Sunday of the Unguent-bearers" (τῶν μυροφόρων). [C.]

MYSTAGOGIA (μυσταγωγία) would naturally mean the conducting or initiating into mysteries. It is, however, commonly used by the Greek fathers as a term for the sacraments themselves, regarded as conducting to higher life. Thus Chrysostom uses the word μυσταγωγία for Baptism, ἱερὰ μυσταγωγία for Holy Communion, κρατὴρ τῆς μυσταγωγίας for the cup in the Lord's Supper (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.). [C.]

MYSTAGOGUS (μυσταγωγός) is, as Suidas has defined it, "a priest, an initiator into mysteries." Hence the Lord Himself is described as acting as Mystagogus to His disciples (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 40, p. 659). And those who prepared Christians for initiation into the sacred mysteries of the church were called by the same name. Hence the lectures which Cyril of Jerusalem addressed to his catechumens, in which he expounds the rites to which they were to be admitted, are called Κατήχσεις μυσταγωγικάι. [C.]

MYSTERY (μυστήριον, root μν-, as in μνέιν, to shut). A μυστήριον is properly a rite to which none but the initiated can be admitted. Hence baptism, to which in early ages men were not commonly admitted without a catechuminate of some length; and the Holy Communion, to which none could be admitted without baptism, and of which the most sacred portions were concealed from the profane [DISCIPLINA ARCANI], naturally came to be called μυστήρια. Thus Chrysostom on St. John xix. 34 (Hom. 85), speaking of the water and blood, says that from these are derived the mysteries of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 39, p. 632, ed. Paris, 1630) calls the ministers of baptism οἰκονόμους τοῦ μυστηρίου; and (Orat. 44, p. 713) says that Jesus in the upper room partook of the mystery (κοινωνεῖ τοῦ μυστηρίου). The Laodicean Council (Can. 7) provides that certain heretics, after learning an orthodox creed and being anointed with chrism, should be admitted to the holy mystery (κοινωνεῖν τῷ μυστηρίῳ τῷ ἁγίῳ [al. τῶν μ. τῶν ἁγ.]), i. e. to the Holy Communion, for they were already baptized. In later times, however, the word μυστήριον came to be applied to many rites of the church in much the same way as the Latin Sacramentum, and the Greek doctors generally reckon the same number—seven. NAMES (INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY ON). The origin and meaning of names, a subject long regarded as too capricious and arbitrary in character to admit of scientific treatment, has received considerable elucidation from recent philological research both in England and on the continent. Very slight investigation suffices to shew that religion, whether pagan or Christian, furnishes a most valuable clue to such inquiry. The present article is restricted to the comparatively limited field presented in the nomenclature of Christian nations during the first eight centuries, and to an endeavour to determine how far that nomenclature was modified or remained unmodified by Christian influences.

For this purpose, it will obviously be of primary importance to ascertain how far the early Christian theory required from converts the assumption of a new name at the ordinance of baptism. On this point the evidence is somewhat conflicting, but generally it would seem that the practice was comparatively rare until after the period of persecution. In the first and second centuries, it is to be remembered, the ancient gentile relations, which transferred to an adopted member of a gens the praenomen, nomen, and cognomen of his adoptive father, gradually ceased to exist. So early as the reign of Trajan we find instances in the Fasti of the designation of consuls solely by their cognomina or agnomina; and in the second and third centuries such instances are numerous. Sometimes a consul is designated only by his cognomen or agnomen, and sometimes by all his names. Thus Domitian's colleague in his ninth consulship (A.D. 83) appears now as Rufus, and again as Q. Petilius Rufus; the colleague of Philippus in the reign of Honorius is sometimes Bassus, sometimes Anicius Auchenius Bassus. Gradually, however, the Roman form of nomenclature almost entirely disappears; though even so late as the 6th century we find Fulgentius, the eminent African bishop, bearing also the names Fabius Claudius Gordianus, while Sidonius, bishop of Clermont, in the preceding century, bore also the name Apollinaris.

The influences that successively determined Christian practice, were—(1) indifference, originating in the causes above mentioned, with regard to adoption or family names; (2) the freedom conceded by legislative enactments; (3) the removal of deterrent considerations such as existed during the persecuting age; (4) the express exhortations of the teachers of the church to a change of practice; (5) the veneration of relics. Of these influences (1) and (2) were shared in common with paganism, and belong to the first three centuries; (3) (4) and (5) are connected with the subsequent period only.

(1.) The letters of Cyprian illustrate the prevalent indifference of his age. In default of motives like those which had formerly existed in adopting a Roman name on admission to the rights of citizenship, the provincial contented himself with Latinising his native name. We find, for example, Cyprian referring to a fellow bishop by the name of Jubaianus, a provincial name with a Roman termination. (Migne, Patr. iv. 129.) In the same correspondence we find in letters written on behalf of different church communities, and signed by their leading members, names of signatories such as Saturninus and Felix, repeated with addition of alter or iterum alter (ibid. iv. 158), where it is evident that the employment of the nomen or praenomen would have effectually prevented any confusion.

(2.) In the 3rd century it was declared lawful by the state for any citizen to lay aside his name and assume any other he might wish. This enactment, first promulgated in the reign of Caracalla (A.D. 212), and sanctioned by succeeding emperors, is thus re-enacted under Diocletian and Maximin:—"Sicut in initio, nominis, cognominis, praenominis recognoscendi singulos impositio libera est privatis: ita eorum mutatio innocentibus periculosa non est. Mutare itaque nomen, vel praenomen sive cognomen sine aliqua fraude licito jure, si liber es, secundum ea, quae statuta sunt, minime prohiberis: nullo ex hoc praejudicio futuro. S. 15. Kal. Jan. A. A. Conss." Justinian Codex, ix. 25: Corp. Jur. Civ. (Lipsiae, 1720), ii. 396.

(3.) Under ordinary circumstances, the Christian of the first three centuries appears to have shared in the prevalent indifference with respect to names, and to have baptized his children with little regard to the significance of the particular name bestowed; the expression of St. Ambrose that our ancestors were wont to coin names on definite principles,—"apud veteres nostros ratione nomina componebantur" (Migne, xvii. 47), is confirmed by the language of St. Chrysostom, who says that the Jews made the names given to their offspring a means of moral training and an incitement to virtue, and bestowed them not as men did in his day, carelessly and as chance might dictate, καὶ οὐ καθάπερ οἱ νῦν ἄπλως καὶ ὡς ἔτυχε τὰς προσηγορίας ποιοῦντες (Migne, S. G. liii. 179). It may be observed that this latter passage is alone sufficient to discredit the spurious Arabian canon of Nicaea (Mansi, Concilia, ii. 961), quoted by Martigny, which represents the church as having already, in the early part of the 4th century, forbidden the faithful to give their children names other than those distinctively Christian. There is, however, good reason for inferring that prudential motives also deterred Christians from assuming names significant of their change of faith, although in times of persecution, when compelled openly to avow their religion, they often changed a pagan for a scriptural name before undergoing a martyr's death. Procopius of Gaza, who wrote in the first half of the 6th century, refers to this as no uncommon practice under such circumstances. "One," he says, "called himself Jacob; another, Israel; another, Jeremiah; another, Isaiah; another, Daniel; and having taken these names they readily went forth to martyrdom" (Comment. in Isaiah, c. 44; Migne, S. G. lxxvii. 2401).

(4.) The example and teaching of the fathers proves that from the earliest times the teachers of the church did not share in the prevalent indifference. St. Cyprian assumed the name of Caecilus in addition to his own, as an acknowledgment of gratitude to one to whom he owed his conversion. Eusebius took the name of Pamphilus from that of the martyr Pamphilus, whom he held in special veneration. It is, however, in the 4th century, when Christianity had received state recognition, that we first find evidence of a desire on the part of the leaders of religious opinion to modify the customary practice. St. Chrysostom, in the Homily above quoted, distinctly censures the prevailing fashion of giving a child his father's or grandfather's name without regard to the import of the name itself. Such, he says, was not the custom in ancient times. Then especial care was taken to give children names which should not merely incite to virtue those who received them, but also serve as admonitions to all wisdom (διδασκαλία φιλοσοφίας ἀπάσης) to others, and even to after generations. "Let us not, therefore," he concludes, "give chance names (τὰς τύχουσας προσηγορίας) to children, nor seek to gratify fathers, or grandfathers, or those allied by descent, by giving their names, but rather choose the names of holy men conspicuous for virtue and for boldness before God." (Migne, S. G. liii. 179.) At the same time he warns his hearers against ascribing any efficacy to such names, all justifiable hope on the part of the Christian being grounded upon an upright life. We find, from another discourse, that the practice he recommended was already sometimes observed. The parents of Antioch, he tells us, gave the name of Meletius (an eminent bishop of that city, who died 381) in preference to any other name, each thinking thereby to bring the saint under his own roof (Migne, S. G. l. 515).

But notwithstanding some eminent exceptions, there can be no doubt that, prior to the 4th century, such practice was rare, a conclusion supported by the evidence afforded by the early Christian epitaphs. The Martyrologies also present us with many names (as will be seen from the subjoined lists) which reflect not merely the secular associations of paganism, but even its religious culture. Martyrs often encountered death bearing the names of those very divinities to whom they refuse to offer sacrifice. It has, indeed, been sought to qualify the evidence derived from Christian epitaphs, by conjecturing that, in order to prevent confusion, only the original name was inserted in the inscription, and that in those instances where we are presented with a second name,—e.g., Muscula quae et Galatea (ann. 383, De Rossi, i. 112), Asellus qui et Martinianus (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 458), and in the well-known one of king Ceadwalla, Hic depositus est Ceadwalla qui et Petrus (Baedae Hist. Eccles. v. 7).—the second name is that conferred at baptism. Against this theory Le Blant, however, quotes the equally notable instance Petrus qui et Balsamus (Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 501). Balsamus, according to the Acta, on being asked his name, replied, "Nomine patris, Balsamus dicor, spirituali vero nomine, quod in baptismo accepi, Petrus dicor." Other instances, e.g., Macrina quae Jovina (Marangoni, Acta Sancti Vict., 88). Vitalis qui et Dioscuros (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 465), Canusius qui et Asclepius (Mai, Coll. Vat. v. 14), where the second name is directly derived from the pagan mythology, are equally adverse to such a theory.

(5.) While the customs and associations which had once given interest and importance to names gradually disappeared, other circumstances began to invest them with new significance. Foremost among these must be placed the superstitious veneration of relics. As the presence of a supposed fragment of a body of a saint was believed to secure his protection for the locality where it was enshrined, the inhabitants of the district sought to prove their reverence for his memory by assuming his name. In later times, with the adoption by each country of a patron saint, the same principle became still further extended. St. James (San Diego or Iago) in Spain, St. Andrew in Scotland and Holland, St. Martin in France, and St. Maurice in Switzerland, are some of the more notable instances in which a name (in some cases that of an altogether mythical character) became the favourite national designation for the individual. In those countries which were among the last to embrace Christianity, this principle is to be seen yet more widely extended. Here the adoption at baptism of a Christian name was the usual practice. In the 14th century, Ladislas Jagellon, duke of Lithuania, on becoming a convert to the faith, persuaded many of his subjects to follow his example. In consequence of their numbers they were baptized in companies, the same name being given to all in one company. All the men in the first company were named Peter, and all the women Catherine; in the second company, the names given were Paul and Margaret; and so on. (Salverte, i. 171.)

A considerable stimulus to the interest attaching to names was imparted, in the 7th century, by the chapters on the subject in the Etymologiae of Isidore of Seville. He taught that all scriptural names had been given with a pregnant reference to the part or future career of the individual, and in a lengthened enumeration assigned to each name a meaning (often erroneous) expressive of that individual's character or experiences. To the influence of his treatise, we may attribute the fact that in the 8th century, with the revival of letters in Frankland, it became a not uncommon practice for men of eminence to assume a literary alias. Charles the Great, and many of his courtiers, were addressed in more familiar intercourse, by other than their baptismal names, scriptural names being generally adopted. Charles probably was led to assume the name of David, from the erroneous meaning given to it by Isidore, "fortis manu, quia fortissimus in praeliis fuit." (Migne, lxxii. 823.)

NAMES OF CHRISTIANS DERIVED FROM PAGAN ANCESTORS; (B.) NAMES OF CHRISTIAN ORIGIN AND SIGNIFICANCE. Of the works from which these lists have been principally compiled, a critical notice will be found under INSCRIPTIONS (pp. 841-844); see also CATACOMBS, pp. 295-306. Those which rest on the authority of Aringhi, Boldetti, or Perret, must be accepted with the caution necessary in relation to the researches of those archaeologists, but it has not been thought desirable to expunge them from the lists. It must also be borne in mind that the value of this evidence rests, in not a few instances, on the assumption of the exclusively Christian character of the Catacombs of Rome,—the view adopted in CATACOMBS, and maintained by Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow (Roma Sotterranea), but one by no means unanimously accepted.

A. (a) Under the first head are given names derived, unchanged, or but slightly modified from the pagan mythology: Alcinous (Act. Sanct. Vict. 76); APOLLOS = Apollonius (1 Cor. xvi. 12); to be met with even in the 6th century (De Rossi, i. 1013); Apollinaris (Marangoni, Act. S. V. 122); Apollinaria (Muratori, Thesaur. 1830-6); Apollonius (Martyr. Rom. xiv. Feb.); Phoebe (Rom. xvi. 1); Pythius (Act. S. V. 83). From ARTEMIS: Artaemisius (Marini, Arval. 695); APTEMEICIA (Perret, v. pl. 78); BACCHUS: Bacchius (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 455); Dionysia (Act. S. V. 113); Libera (ib. 87); Liberia (Vignoli, Insc. Select. 334). The DIOSCURI (Act. S. V. 131); Castoria (ib. 98). CALLIOPE, Calliopa (Martyr. viii. Jun.). CERES, Cerealis, and from Demeter, Demetrius (Act. S. V. 115); this name would appear to have been borne by many martyrs (ib. 701). DIANA: Dianesis (ib. 89); Cinthia (Vignoli, 332). EROS: this appears as the name of a bishop of Arles at the commencement of the 5th century; Erotis (Perret, v. pl. 46); a martyr in Cappadocia, under Diocletian (Oct. xxvii.) was named Erotheides. HERCULES: (?) Herculanus (Perret, v. pl. 58); Eracles, Eracia (Act. S. V. 77, 120); Heraclides (Ruinart, p. 121); HPAKAEIA (Act. S. V. 77); Heraclius, m. (Oct. xxii.). HYGIEA: Hygias (?) (Act. S. V.). JANUS: Janus (Muratori, 387, 1); Janilla (ib. 1886, 6). JUPITER: Jovina (Act. S. V. 120); Jovianus (Perret, v. pl. 27); Jovinus (Marini, 383); Jovita, m. (Feb. xv.); Olympius (Act. S. V. 106); Olympia (Cardinali, Is. Velit. 203); Olympiades, m. (Apr. i. Dec. i.). Jupiter Ammon: Ammonius, Ammononia (Martyrol. passim). LEDA: Laeda (Boldetti, 379). LUCINA: Lucina (ib. 428). MARS: Martia, m. (Jun. xxi.); Martinus (Boldetti, 487); Martialis, Martinus, Martina, passim; Martinianus (July ii.). MERCURY: Mercurius (Act. S. V. 82); Mercuria (ib. 98); Mercurionus (ib. 4); Mercurus (Fabretti, 551); Mercurialis (May xxiii.); Mercurilis (Mai, v. 393); Mercurianetis (De Rossi, i. 71); Mercurina (Le Blant, i. 74); Mercuriolus (Cancellieri, Orsa e Simplic. 18). HERMES: Ermes (Boldetti, 483); Ermogenes, (Act. S. V. 72); Ermogenia (ib. 94); Hermes, many martyrs, Nov. ii., Mar. i. etc.; Hermogenes (Dec. x.; Sept. xi.). These last names were extremely common in the primitive church, and Martigny conjectures that their prevalence is to be ascribed to the occurrence of the name (Romans xvi. 14) as that of one of St. Paul's disciples. This supposition is hardly in harmony with what we have seen to be the practice or the church at that period. MINERVA: Minervia (Boldetti, 491); Minervinus (Dec. xxxi.); Minervus (Aug. xxv.). Athene: Athenodorus, martyr in Mesopotamia under Diocletian (Nov. xi.); Athenogenes, bishop of Sebaste, martyr in the same persecution (July xvi.). Pallas: Palladius (Osann. 539, 14) occurs also as the name of a hermit of Nitria, afterwards bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia. MUSAËUS: Museus (Perret, v. pl. 39). NEMESIS: Nemesis (Muratori, 1515, 9); Nemesius (Feb. xx.); Nemesianus (Sept. 10); Naemisina (De Rossi, i. 272); here, however, De Rossi observes, "Vox Emisina defunctae patriam significat, Emesam nempe celeberrimam Phoenices urbem." NEPTUNE: Posidonius (Le Blant, i. 339). NEREUS: Nereus saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 15). The Roman martyrology gives (Feb. xvii.) the name of a martyr named Romulus. SATURN: Saturninus, extremely common in the primitive church (Marchi, p. 85; Act. S. V. 82); also name of the reputed founder of the church at Toulouse, sent by Fabianus, bishop of Rome; Saturnina (Act. S. V. 80). A brother of St. Ambrose bore the name of Satyrus. SILVANUS: African martyr (Feb. xviii.), bishop of Emessa m. (Feb. vi.), and many other martyrs. The Museum of the Lateran (Inscript. class. xviii. n. 17) contains a marble inscribed with the name URANIA: Oderico (Syll. Vet. Inscript. Romae, 1765) gives (261) the name of a Christian, derived from that of the muse of astronomy, Uranus. Boldetti (p. 477) gives the epitaph of a Christian female named VENUS, though Maury (Croyances et Lejend. de l'Antiquité, 349) denies that the name can be found in the Acta, and endeavours to prove that the St. Venise of Gaul was really the Venus of antiquity accepted under Christian modes of veneration; we have also Venere (Marini, 452); Veneriosa (Le Blant, i. 117); Venerius (ib. ii. 467), also a bishop of Milan and a hermit in the Island of Palms (May iv.; Sept. xiii.); Venerigine (Oderico, 259). Aphrodite, Aphrodisias (Act. S. V. 97); Aphrodisius, m. at Alexandria (Apr. xxx.). In Egypt many Christians bore the names of the divinities of that country, though these often receive from writers or in inscriptions a Greek or Latin terminal,—e.g. Serapio from SERAPIS (Boldetti, 469); the Acta of some of the martyrs of the Thebais give us the names unmodified (Giorgi, de Miracul. S. Coluthi).

(B) From religious rites, auguries, and omens. Augurius (Marchi, 39); Augurinus (Le Blant, i. 341); Augustus (ib. 26); Auspicius (Le Blant, i. 342); Desiderius, m. (Mar. xxv.); Expectatus (Gazzera, Insc. del Piem. 28); Faustinus (Marchi, 27); Faustus, m. (Aug. i.); Felix (Act. S. V. 129); Felicia (Perret, lxii. 62); Felicissimus (Passionei, 118); Felicitas (Perret, v. pl. 3); the derivatives of these in great number; Firmus, m. (Feb. xi.); Firma (Maffei, Mus. Veron. 281); Macarius, m. (Sept. 5), the Greek form is found on many marbles; Optatus (Perret, xv.); Profuturus (ib. xli.); Pretiosa (Wiseman, Fabiola, 264).

(γ) From numbers. Primus, Prima, Primenia (Fabretti, 579); Primenius (De Rossi, i. 206); Primigenius (Marini, 96); Secundus, m. (Jan. ix.); Secundilla, m. (Mar. vii.); Secundinus (Perret, 41); Tertius, conf. (Dec. vi.); Quartus, disciple of the apostles (Nov. iii.); Quartinus (Act. S. V. 112); Quartina (Boldetti, 479); Quintilianus (De Rossi, i. 222); Quintus, m. (May x.); Sextus (Perret, lxii.); Septimus (ib. lxix.); Septimius (ib. xvii.); Octaviana (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 454); Octavia (Fabretti, 375); Octavius, m. (Nov. xx.); Octavianus (De Boissieu, Suppl. xiv.); Nonnosa (De Rossi, i. 205); Nonnosus (Le Blant, i. 110); Decia (Airinghi, ii. 262); Chylianus, martyr bishop (July viii.).

(8) From colours. Albanus (June, xxi.); Albano (Marini, 266); Albina (Reines. 952); Candidus (Perret, xxxvi); Candida (De Rossi, i. 346); Candidiana (Doni, 539-70); Flavius (Bosio, 433); Fusca, v. m. (Feb. xiii.); Fuscus, m. (Sept. vi.); Nigrinus (Le Blant, i. 388); Rubicus (Passionei, 118); Rufus (Mai, v. 404).

(e) From animals. Names of this class, already adopted by paganism, seem to have become more common among Christians; not improbably, as Martigny suggests, from a sentiment of humility. Aper (Act. S. V. 93); Aequitius (Oderico, 33); Agnes, v. m. (Jan. xxi.); Le Blant, ii. 455); Agnella (De Rossi, i. 277); Agnellus (Dec. xiv.); Aquila, m. (June xxiii.); Aquilinus, m. (May xvi.); Aquilius (Le Blant, i. 157); Asella (Act. S. V. 120); Asellus (Maffei, 281); Asellicete (Marini, 393); Asellicus (ib. 422); Asellianus (Boldetti, 487); Asellius (Marini, 293); Asinia (Lupi, Severi martyris epitaph. 102); Basiliscus, m. (Mar. iii.); Capra (Boldetti, 361); Capriola (Act. S. V. 85); Capriole (ib. 102); Caprioles (Perret, v. pl. 5); Castora (Maffei, 264); Castoria (De Rossi, i. 284); Castorius, (Gruter, 1050, 10); Castorinus (Act. S. V. 129); Castellus (Bosio, 106); Catalinus, m. (July, xv.); Catullina (Act. S. V. 131); Cerviola (Mai, v. 424); Cervinus (Lupi, Severi m. epitaph. 173); Cervonia (Marangoni, 460); Columba, m. (Sept. xvii.); Columbanus, etc.; Dracontius (Buonarr. Vetri, 169); Damalis is perhaps the true form of Damaris, a convert of St. Paul at Athens; Felicula (Fabretti, 549) and Faelicla; Formica (Muratori, 1872, 5); Leo (Passionei, 125); Leonilla, Leontia (Marini, 188); Leontia (ib. Arr. 422); Leontius (De Boissieu, Suppl. iv.); Leoparda (De Rossi, i. 136); Leopardus (Perret, v. pl. 26); Lepusculus Leo, these two names of a child present themselves in singular contrast on a Roman marble of the year 401 (De Rossi, i. 226); Lupus, m. (Oct. xiv.); Lupercus (Perret, v. pl. 41); Lupicinus (Marini, Arr. 296); Lupicus (Boldetti, 398); Lupula (Le Blant, i. 396); Melissa (Act. S. V. 96); Merola (De Boissieu, 545); Merulus, m. (Jan. xvii.); Muscula (Perret, v. pl. 33 and 71); Onager (Boldetti, 428); Palumba (Muratori, 1919, 11); Palumbus (Boldetti, 413); Panteris (Perret, v. pl. 50); Pardales (De Rossi, i. 248); Pecus (Mai, v. 397); Pecorius (Lupi, 181); Porcaria (De Boissieu, 561); Porcella (Boldetti, 376); Porcus, Porcia (Boldetti, 449); Serpentina (ib. 482); Soricus (Act. S. V. 153); Taurus (Boldetti, 413); Taurinus (Perret, v. pl. 58); Tigris (Fabretti, ii. 287); Tigrina (Boldetti, 346); Tigradius (Le Blant, i. 26); Tigrinianus (Boldetti, 416); Tigrinus (Reines. xx. 398); Tigris (De Rossi, i. 281); Tigrinus, m. (Jan. xii.); Turdis (Boldetti, 400); Turtura (De Rossi, i. 423); Ursa (Boldetti, 429); Ursacius (Lami, de Erudit. Apost. 353); Ursicinus (Perret, v. pl. 36); Ursulus (Marini, Alb. 193); Ursula, v. m.

(Oct. 21); Ursus (Boldetti, 308); Vitella (Bottari, ii. 127); Vitellianus (Maffei, 483). Many of these names owe their preservation to the fact of their having been borne by martyrs. A stone engraved by Macarius (Hagiogl. 200) gives us the name $\Omega\text{IX}\Theta\text{YCA}$ from $\iota\chi\theta\upsilon\varsigma$, a fish ($\text{IX}\Theta\text{YCA}$). As if to leave no doubt that the significance of the name was present to the minds of those to whom the bearer was known, we sometimes find, side by side, a figure of the animal delineated. Thus the name of Porcella is accompanied by a design of a young sow (Boldetti, 376); that of Dracontius (ib. 386) by that of a serpent; that of Onager (ib. 428) by that of an ass; that of Caprioles by that of a young goat; that of Turtura, by two turtles (Mai, v. 451); that of Aquilius, by two eagles (De Boissieu, 562). Over the tomb of a female Christian named Aquilina (Boldetti, 397) there is the representation of a flying eagle; while on the marble of Pontius Leo, in the corridor of the Vatican, there is the figure of a lion. Signs of another description are used in the same way. The following is one which can only be explained thus: GENETHLIA IVGATI COIVGI IN PAGE. This inscription is accompanied by a design (see woodcut) evidently intended for a yoke, in allusion to the name of the husband, Jugas.

(6) Names relating to Agriculture.—Agellus (De Boissieu, Suppl. xxiv.; Gazzera, 24); Agricola (De Boissieu, 552); Agricola, m. (Dec. iii.); Arator, bp. (Le Blant, ii. 467); Armentarius, bp. (Jan. xxx.); Cepasus, Cepasia (Act. S. V. 81, 112), the onion was considered a sacred plant by the Egyptians; Cepula (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 457); Cerealis (Boldetti, 399); Cicercula (Marini, Arr. 827); Citrasus (Boldetti, 407); Fabius (Perret, v. pl. 41); Fructuosus, m. (Jan. xxi.); Fructulus (Feb. xviii.); Frumentius, bp. (Oct. xxvii.); Georgius, saint and martyr, in the last persecution; Hortulanus, bp. in Africa (Nov. xxviii.); Laurinia, Laurentius (Act. S. V. 85); Olibio (oliva, Boldetti, 82); Oliva, vir. (June iii.); Palmatus, m. (May x.); Pastor (Marini, Arr. 255); Piperusa (ib. 492); Piperion, m. at Alexandria (Mar. xi.); Rusticus, Rustica (Martyrol. passim); Silvanus, Silvana (De Boissieu, 138); Silvia (Le Blant, i. 363); Silbina (Boldetti, 492); Stercorius (Fabretti, 582); Stercoria (Marchi, tav. xv.); CTEPKOPI (Boldetti, 377); these last names are frequently to be met with on the tombs of Christians, but scarcely ever on those of pagans, and probably embody a sentiment similar to that expressed by St. Paul (1 Cor. iv. 13), and a sense of the public obloquy to which Christians were at this time exposed. Theresia, wife of Paulinus, the friend of Jerome; Tilia (Act. S. V. 91); Venantius (Le Blant, i. 117); Vindemialis (Maffei, 358, 8); also m. bp. under Hunneric (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 3).

(7) From Flowers.—Amaranthus (Marangoni, 462); Balsamia (Oderico, 340); Corona, m. (May xiv.); Florus, m. (Dec. xxii.); Flora (De Boissieu, 31); Florentius (Marini, Arrv. 171); Florentina (Perret, v. pl. 54); Florentinus (Act. S. V. 125); Florida, Floris (ib. 85); Florius (Act. (Oct. xxvii.); Flos, m. (Dec. xxxi.); Flosculus, bp. (Feb. ii.); a child martyr in the reign of Valerian bore the diminutive Floccellus; Laurinia (Act. S. V. 85); Liliosa, m. at Cordova (July xxvii.); Mellitus (Act. S. V. 100); Narcissus, m. (Sept. xvii); Rosa, v. (Sept. iv.); Rosarius (De Rossi, i. n. 930); Roseta (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 456); Rosius, conf. (Sept. i.); Rosula (Sept. xiv.).

(θ) From Jewels.—Chrysanthus, husband of St. Daria; Margaret (μαργαρίτης) vir. m. of Antioch; Sapphira, this entirely shunned by Christians; Smaragdus, m.

(ι) From maritime or military life.—Symbols and names of the former class were adopted by Christians in the first ages of the church, precedents being afforded by the New Testament. Armiger (Hübner, n. 7); Emerentiana, m.; Marinus (Bosio, 564); Marina (Maffei, 208); Maritimus (Fabretti, viii. 5); Maritima (Reines. xx. 443); Nabira, accompanied by the design of a ship (Boldetti, 373); Nancello (ib. 485); Nauticus (Airinghi, ii. 261); Navalis, m. (Dec. xvi.); Navicia (De Rossi, i. 40); Navigia, Navigius (Muratori, 1924, 1997); Nautico (Bosio, 506); Navicius (Doni, xx. 64); Pelagia (Bosio, 213). This name also occurs in an inscription given by Marangoni, "Pelagiae Restitutae Filiae" (Act. S. V. 107), with a fish between two anchors. Pelagio (Bosio, 507); Pelagius (Marchi, 163); Pelacianus (Fabretti, 549); Scutarius, bp. (Le Blant, i. 346); Sicarius, St. (ib. i. 49); Thalsasia (ib. i. 147); Thallassus (Reines. xc. 395); Thalsassiae (Spon, Miscell. 232); Talassobe (Bosio, 283).

(κ) From Rivers.—Cydnus (Boldetti, 392); Inachus (Fabretti, 548); Jordanis (Muratori, 1972); Nilus (ib.); Rodane, m. of Lyons; Rodanus (Mai, v. 401-8); Siquana, name of a female Christian whose titulus was discovered in the Quartier St. Just, at Lyons (De Boissieu, 567). The church of Evreux celebrates on Jan. xxii. a martyr of the name of Orontius, who suffered under Diocletian.

(λ) From Countries and Cities.—Afra, m. (May xxiv.); Africanus, m. (April x.); Africa (Hübner, n. 71); Alexandria (Boldetti, 484); Araba, m. (Mar. xiii.); Ausonia, m. of Lyons; Barbara, m. of Heliopolis; Calcedonius (Act. S. V. 108); ΧΑΛΚΗΔΟΝΙΚ (Fabretti, 592); Creticus (Boldetti, 430); Cyprianus, bp. of Carthage, m. (Sept. xiv.); Daciana (Maffei, 179); Dalmatia (Le Blant, ii. 144); Dalmatius (D'Agincourt, iii. 10); Dardanius (Le Blant, i. 349); Galatia (Boldetti, 808); Garamantius, from a country in Libya (Act. S. V. 82); Germanus, St., opponent of Pelagius; Galla (Le Blant, i. 363); Graecinia (Boissieu, Suppl. 28); Heraclia (Lupi, ii.); Italia (Pelliccia, Polit. Eccl. iv. 152); Laodicia (Mai, v. 437); Ligurius (Reines. cl. xx. 115); Libya, m. in Syria (June xv.); Lydia (Acts, xv. 19); Macedonia (Boldetti, 477); Macedonius (De Rossi, i. 500); Maura (Le Blant, i. 382); Mauritius (ib. ii. 45); Maurus, disciple of St. Benedict; Partenope (Perret, xx. 82); Pelusius, m. at Alexandria (Apr. vii.); Pausilippus, m. (Apr. xv.); Roma (Airinghi, ii. 169); Romanus (Passionei, 124); POMANOC (Mus. Later. Inscript. class. xviii. 9); Sabina, m. (Aug. xxix.); Sabinnianus, m. (Jan. xxix.); Sabinus, m. (Jan. xxv. and Boldetti, 545); Sabinilla (Mai, v. 477); Sabinilius (De Rossi, i. 269); Samnius (Boldetti, 534); Salonice (ib. 419); Sebastianus, from Sebastos, the Greek equivalent for Augustus, probably prior to the assumption of the title by Diocletian and his colleague, but frequent in the Martyrology. Sepianus (Sept. xix.); Sidonia (Boldetti, 481); Tessalio (Boldetti, 413); Thesalonica, m. (Nov. 7); Tiburtius (Mamachi, ii. 230); Trajanus, bp. of Saintes (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. c. lix.); Transpadanus (Mai, v. 408); Troadius, m. at Neo-Caesarea in Pontus (Greg. Nyss. in Act. Greg. Thaum.); Tuscula (Boldetti, 436); Urbanus, greeted by St. Paul.

(μ) From the Months. Aprilis (Boldetti, 409, 420; Maffei, 288; Marini, Arrv. 506); December (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 467); ΔΕΚΕΜΒΡΙΟΣ (Perret, v. pl. 77); Decembrina (Boldetti, 389); Februarius (Le Blant, i. 324); Januaria (Marini, Arrv. 170); Januarius (Boldetti, 55); Januarius (Gazzera, Append. ii.); Januarinus (Fabretti, 552); Julius (Marini, Papiri., 301); Junia (Perret, v. pl. 40); Junianus (ib. v. pl. 32); Kalendius (Boldetti, 490); Marius (Marchi, 91); Martius (ib. 410); October (Act. S. V. 92).

(ν) Implying physical qualities or defects. Balbina (Perret, v. pl. 29); Capito, m. (July 21); Callistus, Callista (Oct. xiv.; Sept. ii.); Crispinus (Perret, vi. 158); Crispus, m. (Oct. xiv.); Currentius (Passionei, 116); Eucharius (Marini, Alb. 32); Eucharistus (Mai, v. 376); ΕΥΧΑΡΙΣΤΟΣ (Airinghi, i. 522); Eucharistianus (Boldetti, 382); Fronto, m. (April xvi.); Longina (Boldetti, 475); Pulcheria, v. m. (Sept. x.); Venustus (May vi.); Venustianus, m. (Dec. xxx.).

(ξ) Implying mental or moral qualities (very numerous). Agathon, m. (Dec. xvii.); Amandius (De Boissieu, 13); Amantius (Perret, v. p. 54); Amator (Hübner, n. 171); derivatives from amo seem to have been especially in favour with the Christians of Gaul. Angelica (Perret, v. pl. 23); Aristo (De Rossi, i. 166); Bona (Boldetti, 381); Bonifacius, m. under Diocletian (Ruinart, 284); Bonosus (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 275); Bonusa (Perret, v. pl. 9); Benignus (Boldetti, 489); Candidus, Candida (Martyrol. passim); Candidiana (De Rossi, i. 44); Casta (Mai, v. 425); Castinus (Act. S. V. 82); Castus (Boldetti, 390); Clarus, St., first bp. of Nantes, 3rd century; Clemes (Act. S. V. 89); Clementianus (ib. 132); Concordia (Le Blant, i. 344); Constantia (Marini, Alb. 31); Constantius (Act. S. V. 96); Contumeliosus, with the adjunct Venerabilis (Le Blant, i. 177); Credula, m. (Ruinart, 201); Crescens, companion of St. Paul; Decentius (Boldetti, 345); Digna (ib. 492); Dignitas (ib. 410); Dignantius (Le Blant, i. 350); Dulcitia (Le Blant, ii. 58); Dulcitude (Boldetti, 410); Eusebius (ib. 82); ΕΥΘΕΒΙΑ (ib. 71); Facundus (Perret, v. pl. 26); Firmus (Act. S. V. 133); Fortissima (Marini, 433); Fulgens, Fulgentius, and the diminutive Fulgentilla in Roman inscription of year 385 (De Rossi, i. 155); Gaudentius, m. (Ruinart, 201); Generose (Mamachi, iii. 243); Generosus, Generosa (Martyrol. passim); Grata, v. m. (May i.); Gratinianus, m. under Decius (June i.); Gratus, m. (Dec. v.); Hidonitas (Oderico, 349); Hilarius, bp. of Poitiers; Honorata (De Boissieu, 47); Honoratus, bp. of Milan (Feb. viii.); Hospitius (May xxi.); Ingenua (Steiner, 840); Innocentia (Boldetti, 79); Innocentina (Perret, v. pl. 37); Innocentius (passim); Justa, Justus (Marini, Pap. 244); Justina (Perret, v. pl. 53); Katharina, v. m. of Alexandria; Laetus (Le Blant, ii. 321); Luminus for Luminosus (De Rossi, i. 499); Modestus, m.; Nobilis (De Boissieu, 534); Patiens, bp. of Lyons; Pretiosa (De Rossi, i. 213); Pudens, Pudentiana (Muratori, 1854); Probus, m.; Procopius, m. under Diocletian; Reverens (Oderici, 34); Sanctus, Sanctinus (Muratori, 1985, 12); Scholastica, sister of St. Benedict; Sedatus (Steiner, 830); Serenus (Bosio, 534); Severus (Marchi, 85); Simplicius (ib. 27); ΣΙΜΠΛΗΚΙΑ (Act. S. V. 71); Studentius (Muratori, 1907); Urbana (Hübner, n. 112); Venerandus (Marini, Pap. 332); Vera (Perret, v. pl. 62); Verus (Act. S. V. 85); Viriunda (Perret, v. p. 51); Vigilantius (Passionei, 125); Virissimus (Boldetti, 431).

(o) Indicative of servile condition or extraction.

The sect to which Minucius Felix refers (c. 8; Migne, iii. 259) as "latebrosa et lucifugax natio," appears to have included many of the servile class, though, where the master himself became a convert to Christianity, their enfranchisement almost necessarily followed. Tertullian, in adducing examples to shew how ineffectual was the reformation of character that followed upon conversion to protect the Christian from the odium attaching to the name, takes as one of his instances the converted slave (Apol. c. 8; Migne, i. 281). [SLAVERY.]

Two martyrs bearing the name of Servus suffered under Hunneric in the 5th century; one at Carthage (Aug. xvii.), the other at Tibur (Dec. vii). In the Roman Martyrology we find Servilius (May xxiv.) Servilianus, a m. under Trajan (Apr. xx.), and Servulus, a m. at Adrumetum (Feb. xxi.). This last name also occurs on a Roman marble of the year 424 (De Rossi, i. 277). Other examples are Bernacle (Boldetti, 55); Bernaclea (Fabretti, viii. 140) for Vernaclea; Verna (Maffei, 358); Vernacia (Act. S. V. 95); Vernacla (Le Blant, i. 119); Vernacolo (Bosio, 408); Vernacula (Boldetti, 54); Serbulus (Reines, 987); Servilianus (Mai, v. 406); Servuli (Bosio, 213).

(π) Diminutives, expressive of endearment, and chiefly bestowed on females, are common to pagan and Christian usage. Augustula (Marchi, 30); Capriola (Perret, v. pl. 75); Castula (Doni, xx. 91); Catullina (Act. S. V. 131); Fabiola (De Rossi, i. 334), d. 452, consequently not the Fabiola praised by Jerome; Feliciola (Perret, v. pl. 67); Fornicula (Boldetti, 545); Fortunula (Act. S. V. 94); the tomb of a young female in the year 444 gives the diminutive Gemmula (De Rossi, i. 313); Muscula (ib. 112); Rosula, m. (Sept. xiv.); Sanctula (Stein, 835); Serenilla (Boldetti, 365); Silvola (De Rossi, i. 235).

Examples of abnormal forms of inflexion sometimes occur: as Julianenis for Julianae, Zozimenis for Zosimae. We also find Irenetis, Ispetis, Leopardetis, etc. (Lupi, Sever. m. Epitaph. 157). These latter forms, however, occur as early as the commencement of the Empire, examples being found of the time of Claudius and even in that of Augustus (Caredoni, Cimit. 157).

(ρ) Names of historical celebrity frequently occur, especially in the Acta Martyrum: Agrip-pina an aged m. under Valerian (May xxiv.); Alexander (Martyrol. passim); Amphion, bp. in Cilicia, conf. under Maximin (June xii.); Amulius (Boldetti, 475); Annon, bp. of Cologne (Dec. iv.);

Antigonius, m. at Rome (Feb. xxvii.); Antiochus, m. at Sebaste (July xv.); Antonius, passim; Apelles, one of the earliest converts (Romans xvi. 10); Arcadius (Jan. xii.); Archelaus (Mar. iv.); Augustus, m. in Nicomedia (May vii.); Cato (Le Blant, i. 334); Cesar (ib. i. 344); Cesarius (ib. i. 72); Cornelia (ib. i. 345); Darius, m. in Nicaea (Dec. ix.); Demetrius, passim; Democritus, m. (July xxxi.); Diocles, m. in Istria (May xxiv.); Diomedes, m. in Laodicea (Sept. xi.); Domitianus, deacon, m. at Ancyra (Dec. xxviii.); Epictetus, m. (Aug. xxii.); Fabius, m. at Caesarea (July xxxi.); Flavius, Flavia (May vii, Oct. v.); Hadrianus, m. at Caesarea (May v.); Heraculus, passim; Juliana, m.; Julianus (De Rossi, i. 500); Narses, m. in Persia under Sapor; Orestes, m. under Diocletian (Nov. ix.); Otacilia, wife of the emperor Philip; Patroclus (Le Blant, ii. 416); Peleus, bp. m. in Phoenicia, under Diocletian (Feb. xx.); Philadelphus, m. (May x.); Plato, m. at Ancyra (July xxii.); Plutarchus, m. (June xxviii.); Pompeius, bp. of Pavia (Dec. xiv.); Poppaea (Boldetti, 361); Ptolemaeus, soldier in Alexandria, m. (Dec. x.); Pyrus (Boldetti, 415); Satyrus (De Rossi, i. 198); Seleucus, m. (Feb. xvi.); Socrates, m. (Apr. xix.); Themistocles, m. in Lycia, under Decius (Dec. xxi.); Theodosius, m. (Mar. xxvi.); Thrases, bp. m. at Smyrna (Oct. v.); Tiberius, m. under Diocletian, (Nov. x.); Timolaus, m. at Caesarea, under the same (Mar. xxiv.); Titus, disciple of St. Paul; also m. at Rome (Aug. xvi.); Valens, bp. m. (May xxi.); three martyrs bearing the names of the three Roman emperors, Valerianus, Macrinus, and Gordianus, suffered at Nyon in Switzerland; but nothing is known respecting them, beyond the fact of their martyrdom. Varus, soldier, m. under Maximin (Oct. xix.); Vergilius (De Rossi, i. 195); Volusianus, bp. of Tours in the time of Childeric, son of Clovis (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 26).

B. NAMES OF CHRISTIAN ORIGIN AND SIGNIFICANCE.

(a) Those derived exclusively from Christian doctrine.

Aeternalis, found on an ancient marble at Vienne, supposed by Martigny to be the only instance of this as a proper name; Hübner, however (n. 25) gives another example found at Emerita in Lusitania. Anastasia (Perret, v. pl. 61); Anastasius (Boldetti, 363); Athanasia, Athanasius (Martyrol. passim, but almost entirely confined to Italy); Christianus, Christela, m. (Oct. xxvii.); Christinus, Christophorus (July xxv.); Aquisita (Act. S. V. 123); Redempta (Lupi, 185; De Rossi, i. 156); ΠΕΔΕΜΠΤΑ (Act. S. V. 109); Redemptius (Vermiglioli, Iscr. Perug. 589); Redemptus (Lupi, ib. 110; Gazzera, 10; De Boissieu, Append. 10); Reparatus (Nicolaï, 232). With reference to spiritual salvation: Saluta (Bosio, 532); Salvius (Jan. xi.); Soteris (Act. S. V. 91). With reference to Predestination: Prelecta (De Rossi, i. 597); ΠΕΚΕΠΤΟC, Receptus (Aringhi, iv. 37, p. 121). Referring to the new birth and adoption by baptism: Adepta (De Boissieu, 534); Renata (Act. S. V. 84); Restitutus (Boldetti, 399), this last being of frequent occurrence in the Martyrology. With reference to the spiritual life: Viventius (Act. S. V. 106); Vivianus (ib. 134); Vitalis (ib. 88); Vitalissimus (ib. 123); Zoe (ib. 129); ΖΩΤΙΚΕ (Osann, 441, 119); Refrigerius (De Rossi, i. 88); Refrigeria (Boldetti, 286-7). Pnumulus, from πνεῦμα, expressive of divine inspiration, occurs on a marble from Lyons (De Boissieu, 582).

(β) From Festivals and Rites of the Church. Epiphania, m. under Diocletian (July xii.); Epiphanius (De Rossi, i. 287); the mother of the emperor Heraclius I. was called Epiphania (in later times the more common form of this name was Theophania): Natalis, Natalia, m. (July xxvii.); Natalis (Boldetti, 492); Pascasia (De Boissieu, 550); Pascasius (Giorgi, de Mon. Cris. 33); Pascasus (Act. S. V. 108); Pasqualina (Nicolaï, Basil. di S. P. 230); Paraseceves, m. (Mar. xx.); Eulogia (Buon. Vetri, tav. iii. 2); Sabbatius (Passionei, 135); Sabbatia (De Rossi, i. 87); Sabbatus (Boldetti, 490).

(γ) Martyrdom, from the veneration which it commanded, often induced Christians to adopt the names of the sufferers; while the generic term gave rise to the name Martyrius or Martyria (Lupi, 82; Gruter, mliii. 3; Marangoni, etc.). Martigny compares with this the widespread name of Toussaint (All Saints) in modern times.

(δ) From Christian virtues. Among these Agape and Irene, with their derivatives, are of especially frequent occurrence, the latter being often borne by the Eastern empresses. They are also common on the earliest monuments. In a fresco from the cemetery of St. Marcellin-et-Pierre (Bottari, 127) they appear to be employed with a figurative allusion to the heavenly feast therein depicted, but they are also to be found with unquestionable reference to individuals (Boldetti, 55; Ruinart, 348). The collection by Le Blant (i. 40) gives the epitaph of a Lyonnese merchant with the name of Agapus; so Agapetus (Perret, v. pl. 27 and 62); Agapenis (De Rossi, i. 99 and 209). A splendid sarcophagus in Boldetti (p. 466) gives us Aurelia Agapetilla. Sometimes the names of the three Christian virtues, Pistis, Elpis, Agape, are united in one family (De Rossi, IXΘYC 19). The Roman Martyrology (Aug. i.) records these names as those of three virgins who suffered under Hadrian. Passionei (118, 47) has the epitaph of a Christian lady named Fides. The first wife of Boethius was, according to tradition, a daughter of the consul Festus, and bore the name of Elpis. The bishop of the church at Lyons, in 426, was named Elpidius (Brev. Lugd. Sept. xi.). Other forms, such as Elpisura, Elpidophorus, are to be met with (Boldetti, 366). Ispes (Perret, v. pl. 32); Spesina (Cyprian, Epist. xxi., Migne, iv. 281; Vermiglioli, Iscr. Perug. 587). Caritosa (Perret, v. pl. 77); Charitina, virg. m. under Diocletian (Oct. v.). From Irene we have Irenaeus, a name borne by many martyrs as well as by the famous bishop of Lyons. The church at Gaza in Palestine had a bishop named Irenion, whom it commemorates Dec. xvi. Brotherly love is expressed by names like Adelfius (De Boissieu, 597) and Adelphus (Martyr. Gallic. April xxviii.).

(ε) Names of more general import dictated by pious sentiment.

Adeodatus (Perret, i. pl. 31); Adeodata (De Rossi, i. 164); Ambrose, with allusion to the bread of life; Amphibalus (?), priest for whom St. Alban gave himself up to martyrdom; Angelica (Perret, v. pl. 31); Aromatia (Maffei, 279); Benedictus; Cyricus (Act. S. V. 89); Cyriacus, child m. in Seleucia; also (Marini, Arv. 266), with other names derived from Κύριος. Deicola (Jan. xviii.); Deogratias (Kalend. Carth. Ruinart, 532); Deusededit (De Rossi, i. 406), and of frequent occurrence in the Martyrologies; Donatus, the grammarian, tutor of St. Jerome; Donata (Perret, v. pl. 21); Erasmus, m. under Diocletian; Evangelius (Perret, v. 19); Memoriolus (Le Blant, i. 107) (?), with reference to the phrase frequent in Christian epitaphs, bonae memoriae; Pientia (Fabretti, 579); Pius, the first pope of this name suffered under Antoninus; Sanctus, m. at Lyons; Sanctinus (De Rossi, i. 532); Sanctulus (Boldetti, 436); Sophia, first introduced from the dedication of the newly-erected church at Constantinople, was subsequently adopted by the niece of Justinian's consort; it afterwards became a favourite name with the imperial princesses, and spread widely among the Slavonic nations; Vera (Le Blant, ii. 234); Vitalis (De Rossi, i. 212).

Derivatives from Θεός are frequent; many, however, appear to have been transmitted from paganism. Theophilus was the name of a Greek poet of the Middle Comedy, and the individual addressed by St. Luke must evidently have been so called prior to his conversion to Christianity; one of the last high priests was also so named. Thekla, the feminine of Θεοκλής (also a pagan name), is said by tradition to have been a disciple of St. Paul at Ancona. In most of the pagan names of this class the word probably denotes merely a high degree of excellence. ΘΕΟΤΕΚΝΕ and ΘΕΟΚΤΙCΤΕ (Marini, Alb. 98) are probably distinctively Christian; as also Theopistes, m. (Sept. xx.). The name of Servus Dei occurs on some of the marbles of the earlier centuries (Act. S. V. 132), and also as borne by two martyrs of Cordova (Jan. xiii.; Sept. vi.); but Boldetti, who at first took it for a proper name in the inscription on a tomb in the cemetery of St. Praetextatus, subsequently found the words impressed with a seal on the cement of a loculus in the cemetery of St. Agnes—a fact that would seem to imply that it was customary to stamp them on the tombs. Ancilla Dei, according to De Rossi (i. 133), was also a proper name; and an inscription of the year 366 gives us Quod vult Deus (ib. 99). This latter is not unfrequent in the earlier centuries, and was borne by a bishop of Carthage of the 5th century, and by a Donatist bishop, a contemporary of Augustine. Hübner (n. 2) gives the singular name Deidomus. A marble at Naples bears an inscription with the name Habet Deus (Fabretti, 757). The first Saxon archbishop was called Deusededit (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 99). [INSCRIPTIONS, i. 833a.]

(ζ) Names also occur, which, if not exclusively Christian, suggest their probable adoption from a conception of the Christian life as one of warfare: Bellator (Act. S. V. 93); Fortissima (Marini, 433); Gregory (γρηγορέω), the guardian or watchman of the church, often adopted by bishops; Victor (Boldetti, 807); Victora (Perret, v. pl. 47); Victoria (Act. S. V. 88); Victorianus (De Rossi, i. 195); Victoricus, m. (Dec. xi.); Victorina (Hübner, n. 8); Victricus bp. and conf. under Julian (Aug. viii); Victurus, m. in Africa (Dec. xviii.); Vincensa (Perret, v. pl. 26); Vincentius (De Rossi, i. 217; Hübner, n.

(7) Other names express the Christian joy and assurance in the midst of tribulation: Beatus (Perret, 59); Caelestinus (De Rossi, i. 72); Exillarius (ibid. i. 533); Felix, Felicio (Marini, Alb. 110, 26); Felicissimus (Act. S. V. 91); Fidencius (Le Blant, ii. 15); Gaudentialus (ib. i. 364); Gaudentius, Gaudiosus (Fabretti, iv. 46); Hilara (Marchi, 53); Hilaris, Hilaritas (Boldetti, 397, 407); Hilarius (Martyrol. passim); Hilarus (Marchi, 39); Ilarissus (Marini, Arv. 405); Iodocus (from jocus), an Armorican prince who settled as a hermit in Ponthieu, and gave his name to a monastery owned by Alcuin; Jubilator (Airinghi, ii. 175); Sozomen, the church historian; Sozomene (Le Blant, ii. 234); Tutus (ib. i. 204).

The designation υἱὸς φωτός (1 Thess. v. 5) seems to have suggested many names. Boldetti (407) gives an inscription containing three derivatives from lux.

LUCEIO LUCELLO FLORENTIO
QUI VIXIT ANN. XIII. MENS. III.
DIEB. XXVIII. ORIS XS. LUCEUS
RUFINUS PATER CONTRA VOTUM.

Towards the close of the 4th century, the name of Mary, preceded or followed by another, is occasionally to be met with. LIVIA MARIA IN PACE (De Rossi, i. 143); MAPIE ΙΦΙΝΙ, Iphinae for Rufinae (Act. S. V. 77). It occurs, also, in two inscriptions given by Perret: MARIA IN PACE (v. c.) and MARIA FECIT FILIAE CIRICE (lxiii. 23). De Boissieu (p. 585) gives the epitaph of one Maria Venerabilis, a centenarian of Lyons in the 5th century. A marble of the cemetery of SS. Thruso et Saturninus (Act. S. V. 89) gives the name of Anna, but this is yet more rare.

The following are instances of apostolic names:—Andreas (Vermiglioli, 589); ΑΝΔΡΕΑΣ (Osann. 428, xlv.); Johannes (Marini, Pop. 251), Ruinart, passim; with the commencement of the 5th century the name becomes of more common occurrence (De Rossi, i. 278, 280). Paulus (Act. S. V. 105; De Rossi, i. 191); ΦΛΑΤΙΩΣ ΠΑΥΛΟΣ (Act. S. V. 73); Paula (ib. 106). Petrus (Marchi, 27; Hübner, n. 135a); ΠΕΤΡΟΣ (Osann. ib. xlv.), with its derivatives Petrius (Act. S. V. 129); Petronia (Montfaucon, Iter Ital. 118); Thomas, extremely rare, occurs in the year 490 (De Rossi, i. 398; Hübner, n. 178). Osann. (485, xi.) gives us the derivation from Stephanus of ΣΤΕΦΑΝΙΝΟΣ.

Among names taken from the Old Testament, that of Susanna is not uncommon: SVSSANNA (De Rossi, i. 196); Rebecca is found in a Roman epitaph of the 4th century (De Rossi, ib. 96) REVECCAE INNOCENTI. Many names of martyrs are of this class: Moyse, at Alexandria (Feb. xiv.); Samuel and Daniel, in Mauritania (Oct. xiii.); Tobias, at Sebaste under Licinius (Nov. ii.).

The European races which remained unsubdued by the arms of the Empire, or but imperfectly subjugated, offer certain points of contrast which may be briefly noted. Among the Celts there is discernible, on the part of the early converts, a feeling of deeper reverence and humility in the adoption of sacred names. The prefixes of Ceile (the companion or vassal), Cear (the friend), Cuilleach (the handmaiden), and giolla, the modern gillie, and mael, a disciple, denote nothing more than relations of reverent dependence. St. Michael was the object of widespread devotion; hence Cear Michael, now Carmichael. In many Irish families of the old Celtic blood Gilla Christ (Gilchrist) appears to have been a Christian name (Petrie and Stokes, p. 67). Gillespiug (Gillespie, espung = episcopus) belonged to the line of Diarmid. The names of four northern proprietors in Domesday Book,—Ghilemicel, Ghilander, Ghillepetair, and Ghilebrid,—probably attest the presence of a Celtic element attracted by the illustrious foundation at Lindisfarne. The name of Mary, which gradually spread in the Latin church, after the 4th century (Northcote and Brownlow, R. S., pp. 254–7) is wanting, a point illustrative possibly of the divergence between Celtic and Latin Christianity; it is not until the 12th century that we find the name of Malmair, “servant of Mary” (Petrie and Stokes, 59). Maelcolum (Malcolm) bears testimony to the veneration in which the memory of the apostle of Iona was held.

Among the Teutonic races on the continent we find ourselves on less firm ground. Many names compounded with that of the Supreme Being were assumed in purely pagan times, and it is often a matter for doubt whether the prefix that belongs to names of this character does not really denote a name of the numerous class commencing with gund (war), a class conceived in a very different spirit. Other names, again, like Theodoric, Theudebert, etc., offer a deceptive but unreal appearance of affinity to Greek Christian derivatives. Converts appear to have retained their names unchanged; Ereda (? Freda), Brinca or Bringa, Uvilairic, Trasaric, Sedaigunichus, occur as those of Gothic Christians (McCaul, Christian Inscr. p. 21); in the opinion of Schottel (Teutsche Hauptsprache, p. 1031) it was not until after the death of the emperor Friedrich II. (ann. 1250) that, under ecclesiastical influences, Germany began to admit a certain infusion of Latin elements in her nomenclature. Pott, however, recognises a Christian element in proper names like Traugott, Dindegott, Gottlob (? ‘Deum lauda’), and in family names such as Kennegott, Lebgott, Gottleber, regarding them as originally imperatives, dictated by pious sentiment. To Heer and Herrgott, which some have derived from the pagan Divus (e.g., Divus Augustus, Divus Antiochus, etc., combined with the equivalent for Θεός), he attributes a like origin (Die Personennamen, pp. 94–98).

An interesting illustration of the importance of this subject will be found at p. 879, in the account there given of the name Veronica—an example of the manner in which a false etymology has sometimes in turn given rise to the fabrication of legend.

NAMES APPLIED TO CHRISTIANS.
[FAITHFUL.]

NAMES, OBLATION OR RECITAL OF. I. The Offerers.—It was a very early rule in the church, that when the bishop received any gifts for the poor, he should inform them "who the donor was, that they might pray for him by name." This precept was in the original text of the Apostolical Constitutions, being found in the Syriac recension as well as in the interpolated Greek (Bunsen, Analecta Ante-Nicæna, ii. 133, 286). When converts were numerous this could hardly be carried out otherwise than by a public notice in church, and if this was done in the case of offerings for the poor, it would soon be done for other offerings. Such is the probable origin of the recital or "oblation" of the names of the offerers in the Liturgy. If a gift were brought on behalf of the sick or otherwise suffering, or of one deceased, then it was their name, not that of the person who brought it, which was offered. In any case the publication of the name was understood as a request for the prayers of the church on behalf of the person named.

St. Cyprian uses the phrase "nomen offerre" of the living, when, complaining of the too easy absolution granted to the lapsed, he says, "While the persecution still continues, ere the peace of the church itself is yet restored, they are admitted to communicate, and their name is offered" (Ad Presbyt. Ep. 16). When he forwarded a charitable collection to Numidia, he gave the bishops there the names of all the contributors, and of the other bishops, and of the priests, who had assisted in making it, "that they might bear them in mind in their petitions, and make a return for their good work in sacrifices and prayers" (PRECES, Ad Januar. Ep. 62). St. Jerome speaks more than once of this practice, which appears to have had its evils after the conversion of the empire: "The names of the offerers are now publicly recited, and the redemption of sins is turned into praise" (Comment. in Jerem. ii. i. 16); "The deacon recites in the churches the names of the offerers, 'She offers so much,' 'He has promised so much,' and they take pleasure in the applause of the people, while conscience is tormenting them" (Comm. in Ezek. vi. xviii. 5-9). When the benefaction was of an enduring kind, as the erection or endowment of a church, the name was recited at every celebration. Thus St. Chrysostom (Hom. xviii. in Acta Apost. 5), addressing the founder of a church, "Is it a small thing, tell me, for thy name to have a place perpetually in the holy oblations?" The council of Merida, 666, decreed that "the names of those by whom it is certain that churches have been built or who are declared, or who have been declared, to have given anything to the said holy churches, shall, if they are living in the body, be recited before the altar in the time of mass; but that, if they have departed or shall depart from this life, their names shall be recited with those of the faithful departed, in their order" (can. 19). The publication of the names of the dead, when an offering was made for them, is found in Africa in the 3rd century. Thus St. Cyprian, ordering that "no oblation should be made for the falling asleep" of one who had broken a law of the church, gives as the reason that one who had done so did "not deserve to be named at the altar in the prayer of the priests" (Epist. ad Presbyt. Furnit. 1). St. Augustine, speaking of the future punishment of heresiarchs, says, "In that day there will be none to recite the names of the chiefs of their madness at the altar" (C. Parmen. iii. 6.)

II. Names constantly offered.—The names of the offerers on a given occasion, and of the sufferers or the dead for whom oblations were made, would be published only once or a few times at the most; but there were other names, as those of the bishop, archbishop, &c., certain eminent teachers of the church, whether living or dead, and those of departed martyrs, confessors, &c., including the apostles and the Blessed Virgin, which were recited continually. These were inscribed in the DIPTYCHS. In Africa at least, the names of the priests seem also to have been recited from a written document. Thus St. Augustine, suggesting that the name of a suspected priest should "not be recited," says, "For what hurt does it do to one, that human ignorance will not have him recited from that tablet, if a guilty conscience does not blot him out from the book of the living?" (Epist. 78 ad Cler. § 4).

III. When offered.—At first the names of the living and of the dead were recited at the same part of the service. Thus in a Gothico-Gallican Collectio post Nomina: "Let us beseech God. . . that He sanctify the names of the offerers and of the departed, which have been recited." (Liturg. Gall. 221). Again: "Let us commemorate the names of those who offer and of those who are at rest" (255). Similarly in Mozarabic Oraciones post Nomina: "Offerentibus venia et defunctis requies condonetur" (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 17); "Nominibus sanctorum martyrum offerentiumque fidelium atque eorum qui ab hoc sæculo transierunt, a ministris jam sacri ordinis recensitis" (27); etc. That the names were all offered about the same time is also implied whenever petitions for the living and the dead occur in the same collect, as Miss. Goth. u.s. 191, 194, 201, &c.; Miss. Gall. Vet. 365, 571; Miss. Moz. u. s. 34, 43, 46, &c. In the Mozarabic Missal the Post Nomina follows the names of a long series of confessors: "Let the presbyter say, Our priests offer an oblation to the Lord God. . . Making a commemoration of the most blessed apostles and martyrs, the glorious holy Virgin Mary. . . Also for the spirits of those at rest, Hilary, Athanasius, Martin, Ambrose, Augustine," &c. (46 names). There is no direction for the recital of the names of the offerers or others, but after the Post Nomina, the following constant form, from which the practice appears, is said, "Let the presbyter say, For Thou art the life of the living, the health of the sick, and the rest of the faithful departed, for ever and ever" (Leslie, 4). So of the Post Nomina itself, St. Isidore, 610, says, "Effunditur pro offerentibus sive pro defunctis fidelibus" (De Eccl. Off. i. 15).

The later Roman rule and the reason for it were, as we learn from Pseudo-Innocent, as follows: "Thou mayest know of thyself, of thine own good sense, how superfluous it is for thee to mention the name of him whose oblation thou offerest to God (though nothing be hid from Him) previously; (that is), before the priest makes the prayers (PRECES), and by his petitions commends the oblations of those whose names are to be recited. The oblations are therefore to be commended first, and then the names of those, whose oblations they are, to be given out: that they may be named in the holy mysteries [i.e., in the Missa Fidelium, or anaphora], and not among the other forms [as in the secreta, or collectio post nomina] which we put before them, that by the mysteries themselves we may open the way for our subsequent prayers" (Ep. ad Decent. 2). Hence the origin of the Commemoratio pro vivis before the consecration, and the Commemoratio pro defunctis after it in the Roman canon. In both, the priest may still call up silently the names of any for whom he desires to pray (Ritus Celebr. viii. 3; ix. 2); but when the change was first made, the canon was still said, and therefore the names would be recited, aloud. See Notitia Eucharistica, ed. 2, p. 565. In the Vatican MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, printed by Rocca (Opp. Greg. V. 63; ed. 1615), the former commemoration runs as follows: "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum, Ill. et Ill. et omnium circum astantium, quorum Tibi fides cognita est et nota devotio, qui Tibi offerunt hoc sacrificium laudis pro se suisque omnibus." The Eligian codex resembles this (Ménard in Opp. Greg., ed. Ben. iii. 3). In the margin of the Othobonian, and in every vacant space about the pages, are many names of the living who sought the prayers of the church, especially of the sick, as well as of deceased persons (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 73; ii. 2). One of the Cologne MSS., used by Pamelius, inserts after "tuarum," in the margin, "et eorum quorum nomina ad memorandum conscripsimus, ac super sanctum altare Tuum scripta adesse videntur" (Rituale PP. ii. 180). In the canon as given by Amalarius (Eclogae de Off. Miss. in fine) we have, after "tuarum," "Illorum et Illarum [Hic nomina vivorum memorentur, si volueris; sed non dominica die, nisi certis diebus], et omnium," etc. Sim. a Saltzburg Pontifical, cited by Martene (Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. iv. viii. 15). The old Ambrosian canon here resembles the old Roman, but contains an additional clause which has been borrowed by the later Roman: "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque Tuarum [Illorum] et omnium circum astantium quorum tibi fides cognita est et nota devotio, pro quibus Tibi offerimus vel qui Tibi offerunt," etc. (Murat. u. s. 133).

There is no Commemoratio pro Mortuis in the Gelasian canon (Murat. i. 697), nor in several copies of the Gregorian. Gerbert mentions three in which it is altogether wanting, and three others in which it has been supplied by a later hand (Mon. Vet. Lit. Alemann. i. 236). Only in one copy, it is believed, does a memorial of the dead occur in the canon both before and after the consecration; viz., in the Rhenaugen MS. of the 8th century (itself shewn to be a copy of an earlier) from a transcript of which Gerbert prints. The former of these commemorations, which immediately follows that for the living is as follows: "Memento etiam, Domine, et animarum famulorum famularumque tuarum fidelium Catholicorum in Christo quiescentium, qui nos praecesserunt, illorum et illarum, qui per eleemosynam et confessionem Tibi reddunt vota sua" (ibid. 233). The second memorial after the consecration, in this MS. is, "Memento etiam, Domine, et eorum nomina, qui nos praecesserunt cum signo fidei et dormiunt in somno pacis." With this agrees to the letter one Cologne MS., from which Pamelius prints (i. 182), the Romanising Frankish and Besançon Missals (Murat. ii. 694, 779), and the canon given by Amalarius, but the last named adds, "Et recitatur nomina. Dein postquam recitata fuerint dicat," etc. In others the prayer begins thus: "Super Diptycha" (Cod. Vatic. Rocca), "Memento etiam Domine famulorum (N. Cod. Col. 2; Pamel. u. s.) famularumque (N. Cod. Col. 2) Tuarum (Ill. Rocca and Cod. Elig. u. s. 4; Illorum et Illarum (with several names in the margin), Codex Vatic. Bibl. Murat. ii. 4) qui nos . . . pacis." All these proceed thus, "Ipsis, Domine, et omnibus in Christo quiescentibus, locum refrigerii, lucis et pacis ut indulgas deprecamur per," etc.

The Council of Aix in 789, under the influence of Charlemagne, adopted the later rule of Rome as expressed by Pseudo-Innocent (can. 54; see also Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, can. 51).

The early Ambrosian canon did not commemorate the departed (Murat. u. s. 134), but an unvarying prayer, introduced at an unknown period, was said secretly after the oblations were set on the altar, but before the Offerend, Creed and Super Oblatum, in which both living and dead are prayed for: "Receive, holy Trinity, this oblation which we offer unto Thee . . . for the health and safety of Thy servants and handmaidens N., for whom we have promised to implore Thy clemency, and whose alms we have received, and of all faithful Christians, both living and departed" (Pamel. u. s. i. 298).

The liturgies of the East do not shew expressly where the names of offerers were published, but there is every reason to think that it was done when the diptychs were read. St. Mark thus refers to offerers in a prayer before the anaphora, which, following immediately the diptychs of the dead, intercedes for them and for the living also: "Receive, O God, on to Thy holy, supercelestial, and intellectual altar, the greatness of the heavens, through the ministry of Thy archangels, the thank-offerings of those that offer the sacrifices and oblations, of those who desire to offer much and little, secretly, and openly, and are not able; and of those who have this day offered the oblations" (Renaud. i. 150). In St. James these intercessions come after the consecration. As the offerers are mentioned immediately after the diptychs of the living (compare Assem. Codex Lit. v. 43 with 85), we infer that their names had also been recited at the same time. The clause in St. James is, "Vouchsafe also to remember, O Lord, them who have this day offered these oblations on Thy holy altar, and those for whom each has offered, or has in mind, and those whose names have been now read unto Thee" (u. s. 43). The diptychs of the dead follow. In St. Basil, which is derived from St. James, the diptychs of the living and dead are read before any of the intercessions are said. The following is the reference to the offerers: "Remember, O Lord, those who have offered these gifts unto Thee, and those for whom, and by whom, and on account of whom they have offered them" (Goar, 171). This is not preserved in St. Chrysostom, nor in the Armenian, which is also derived from St. Basil. Perhaps it was thought, when all oblations but those of bread and wine had ceased, that the similar clause in the prayer of prothesis ("Remember those who have offered, and those for whom they have offered," Goar, 63), was sufficient. In St. James this prayer is said with the same intention at the great entrance (Assem. u.s. 17). In the Syriac rites derived from St. James the offerers are prayed for, as in that, when the diptychs are read after the consecration (Renaud. ii. 35, 149, 157, &c.). There is no prayer for them in the Nestorian liturgies, but the usual context comes after (Theod. Renaud. i. 620; Nest. 631), except in the Malabar (Raulin, 314), in which it comes before the consecration, though the diopatheen (diptychs) were read even before the anaphora. In the Coptic St. Basil the deacon says, "Pray for —," apparently naming the offerers; and the priest, "pointing to the bread and wine," prays for "those who offer them, and those for whom they offer" (Ren. i. 17). This is after the consecration; and so the Greek Alexandrine Basil and Gregory (Ibid. 71, 108); but in the Coptic Gregory and Cyril and the Ethiopic (32, 42, 515), the intercessions, of which this is one, are said before.

IV. Whose names were not offered.—When an oblation was brought, the publication of the name necessarily depended on its acceptance or rejection. Thus the council of Illiberis in 313 forbids the names of energumens to be given out "with an oblation at the altar" (can. 19). On the rejection of oblations, see OBLATIONS, § III. On the exclusion of names of the living or dead for whom mention was claimed as a token of communion, see DIPTYCHS, § 2.

V. By whom the names were recited.—This was generally the office of the deacon, both in the east and west. We have seen it ascribed to him by St. Jerome. St. Isidore of Seville says, "To him also pertains the office of prayers [PRECES], the recitation of the names" (ad Leudeff. 8). Nor is this irreconcilable with the language of St. Cyprian, "Named at the altar of God in the prayer of the priests;" for we may suppose that in Africa, as in Gaul and Spain, the priest made express reference to the names published by the deacons immediately before. If there was an exception, they were rather published by the subdeacon than by the priest. Thus, in an ancient pontifical the MS. of which dates from the tenth century, "the subdeacons behind the altar name or recite the names of the living and dead" (at the "Memento," Missa Ratoldi in Greg. Sacram. App. u.s. 246). So by an old custom at Rheims, recorded as still existing about 965, the subdeacon daily recited at mass in the ear of the celebrant the names of all bishops of the diocese (Fulcuinus de Abbat. Lobiens. vii.; Spicilegium Dacher. vi. 551).

In the Greek Liturgy the deacon still reads the diptychs, and "makes memorials of whom he will of the dead and of the living" (Euchol. Goar, 78, 170). Compare the Armenian (Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. 594-610). The deacon is ordered to say them in the margin of the Sicilian use of St. James, from which liturgy the foregoing are derived (Assem. v. 85, 86); in St. Mark (Renaud. i. 150), and the Egyptian liturgies, Coptic (Bas. 19), and Greek (Bas. 72, Greg. 112); the Syrian (Ibid. ii. 34-36, 137, 279-282); and the Nestorian (Badger, ii. 222). Only the Ethiopic, which is in other respects in confusion, assigns this duty to the priest.

VI. Notices of the Names in the Collectio post Nomina.—These are often of interest, e.g. "Nomina quorum sunt recitatione complexa, scribi jubeas in aeternitate" (Miss. Goth. in Liturg. Gall. 191); "Offerentium nomina recitata coelesti chirographo in libro vitae jubeas adscribi" (232, comp. 233, 273, 276, 286); "Quorum textit recitatio praemissa sortem, inter electos jubeas adgregari" (207, 209); "Offerentium ac pausantium quae recitata sunt nomina, apostoli sui intercessione sanctificent" (221); "Quorum nomina ante altare sanctum recitata, aeterna quies suscipiat" (288, comp. Sacr. Vet. Gall. 334); "Nomina quae vocabulorum sunt pro aetatis memorata, aeternitatis titulo jubeas praesignari" (234). The last appears to refer to the different ages in which the persons commemorated had lived. "Offerentium nuncupationem compertasque etiam dantium accipientiumque personas nota vocabulorum designatione monstravit [sc. diaconus]. Ad dilecta precum revertamur officia" (Miss. Richenov. Neale and Forbes, 16). This seems to imply a custom of mentioning also the name of the deacon to whose hands an oblation was committed. Many similar references to the nomina occur in the corresponding prayer of the Mozarabic missal (Leslie, 15, 27, 57, &c.).

The Roman, Greek, and Eastern methods of introducing a reference to the offerers in the prayers have been sufficiently illustrated in § III.

NANTES, COUNCIL OF (Nannetense Concilium). Because Flodoard, who was canon of Rheims in the tenth century, speaks of one of the bishops of Rheims, in the seventh, having repaired a church in that diocese, "by common consent of the whole council of the bishops of France, set forth at Nantes," it has been inferred that a council was held there A.D. 658; and because twenty canons were quoted in the ninth and following centuries, as though they had been passed at Nantes, it has been further inferred that these canons may have been the work of this council in the seventh. Whatever may be thought of the first supposition, internal evidence forbids this last (Mansi, xi. 59, and xviii. 165-74; comp. Delaland, Suppl. 69; also RHEIMS, COUNCILS OF.) [E. S. F.]

NARBONNE, COUNCILS OF (Narbonensia Concilia). (1.) A.D. 589, at which Nigetius, bishop of Narbonne, and six others, all subjects of king Reccaud, were present, and fifteen canons passed, agreeably with what had been decreed at the third council of Toledo the same year. By the first the clergy may not wear purple. The second orders the doxology to be repeated at the end of every psalm; or, when a psalm is divided, at the end of every such division. By the third the clergy may not stand gossiping in the streets. The fifth refers to the eighteenth canon of Chalcedon, as though it had been passed at Nicaea. By the eleventh, bishops may not ordain illiterate men. By the last, a superstitious way of keeping Thursday as a holiday is censured (Mansi, ix. 1013 sq.).

(2) Said to have been held A.D. 788, by order of the Emperor Charles, for determining the bounds of that diocese, which alone shews that the account given of it is in part spurious. But further, it purports to have been occasioned by the errors of Felix, bishop of Urgel, and yet he is set down among the subscribers to it. If it ever met, therefore, its records are deserving of no credit as they stand now (Mansi, xiii. 821 sq.).

NARTHEX (νάρθηξ, προνάος, αὐλῶν, (qy. αὐλή) by Paul the Silentiary; στοά by Hesychius; Paradisus.) (1) The word first of all means the plant called giant-fennel, which was used as a cane; then it means a cane or staff, and even a surgeon's splint. In Christian ecclesiology it was used to designate the vestibule of a church. The reason of this application is given in a passage of Procopius of Caesarea (circa 527) in describing the church which the emperor Justinian built at Jerusalem in honour of the Blessed Virgin. "A great quantity of columns, immense in size and in colour resembling a flame of fire, support the church (τὸν νεῶν) on every side, some below and some above, and some about the cloisters (στοάς) which surround the whole precinct (ιερόν), except on the side which is turned towards the east. Of which two stand before the door of the church (τοῦ νεῶν), very fine, and probably second to no columns in the world. Next there follows a kind of cloister (στοά τις) named after the narthex, I suppose, from its not being made wide." (Procopius, de Aedificiis, lib. v. cap. 6, ed. Dindorf in Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, vol. iii. p. 323, Bonn, 1838.) It is laid down by Hofmann (Lex. Univ. s. v.) that the length of the narthex was the whole width of the church.

Another etymology, unnoticed by Bingham and others, but exclusively relied on by the Etymologium Magnum, and the Lexicon of Zonaras, connects the word narthex with νέρθεν (παρὰ τὸ νέρθεν εἶναι τοῦ ναοῦ [al. lect. ἁμβωνος, ed. Gaisford]), because it was on a lower level than the body of the church (see a long note upon the subject by the commentator on the Concordia Regularum of St. Benedict of Anianum, temp. Charlemagne, ed. Migne, Patrol. Cursus, tom. 103, p. 1010). This however does not appear to be in accordance with the fact. For it will be seen lower down, that in some cases the narthex was the receptacle of the female part of the congregation, and that that receptacle was upon a higher, not a lower, level than the body of the church. [NAVE.]

The word is used sometimes of a part within the church, and sometimes of one without; but it always means a part of the church further from the altar than the part where the faithful were assembled. Hence it was a place for the catechumens. Near them the possessed (χειμαζόμενοι, Syn. Ancy. Can. 17) seem anciently to have had their place, also in the narthex. The entrance from the narthex to the nave was, according to Beveridge, by the "beautiful gates" [DOORS, p. 573], near which, as the most honourable part of the narthex, the Audientes stood. The communication of the narthex with the outside was through the "great gates" (μεγάλαι πύλαι). The place of the Catechumeni in the narthex was near these last gates. The Energumens or possessed coming between the Catechumens and the Audientes.

A passage of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus shews distinctly that in his plan the narthex was within the gate of the church. He says that the Audientes were to do their part "within the gate (of the church) in the narthex," (ἐνδοθὶ τῆς πύλης ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι), Epist. Canonica, Can. xi. See a discussion of the several views in the commentary of Du Cange upon Paul the Silentiary, cap. 81.

Leo Allatius wrote a tract upon the narthex, in which he refutes the opinion that the narthex was in the porch, and shews that it was inside the church, near the door, and that it was the place where the Catechumens, the Energumens, and the Penitents were gathered.

Du Cange (Gloss. Graec. s. v. 986) points to a distinction (and possibly to some solution of the discrepancy amongst writers) between monastic and non-monastic churches; and he affirms that in the latter class, the narthex was outside, not inside, the church. In monastic churches, a distinction had to be made between the fraternity and the general public; and accordingly such churches were divided internally into three parts: (1) the Bema (Sacrarium) with the screen; (2) the νὰὸς, for the monks, with rails separating it from (3) the narthex for the non-monastic public. Du Cange quotes a MS. Life of St. Paul Latrensis, which says that his body was buried "in the choir of the church (ναοῦ); we have been accustomed to call the place a narthex." As to the distinction between monastic and non-monastic churches in the East, Magri (Hieroglossicon, s. v.) gives a different account, which he says depends upon his own observation. The narthex, he says, in monastic churches serves for lay monks, and in secular churches for women. In the latter case it is fenced off by grilles and rails.

A search has been made in vain for any transcription of the Greek word by any of the earlier Latin writers. It appears to be always translated by porticus, atrium, or some kindred word. Bingham, indeed (Antiq. viii. cap. 4, s. 2), while he claims great antiquity for the thing, admits that the name itself is "not very ancient." But the passage quoted above from Gregory Thaumaturgus may be thought to shew that even the name was more ancient than Bingham imagined.

It is affirmed, indeed, by Hofmann (Lexicon Univ. s.v.) that the narthex was by the Latins called Paradisus. This, however, seems to be strictly the name for the cloistered court, which in some of the older basilicas stood in front of the entrance to the church proper. In the view of some writers narthex was the name appropriated to that side of the quadrangular cloister which abutted on the church wall. It is not till the 6th century (Greg. Turon. lib. 2, c. 21) that we find any trace of the font being placed in this part of the structure.

NATALE, also Natalis, dies natalis, natalitia; γενέθλιον, ημέρα γενέθλιος. These words designate, in the language of the early church, the death-day of one of the faithful, regarded as a birth into eternal life. Even in the generation which immediately succeeded the apostles, we find the church saying of Polycarp, "we celebrate the birthday of his testimony or martyrdom (τὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου αὐτοῦ ἡμέραν γενέθλιον)" (Mart. Polycarpi, c. 18); and at a somewhat later date, Tertullian tells us (de Corona, 3) "oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, annua die facimus," where the word natalitia seems to be used for the death-day, not of a martyr only, but of any of the faithful.

Pagi (on Baronius, ann. 67, n. 23) contends that the natalis of a martyr in the calendar is rarely his actual death-day, but commonly that of the translation of his relics, as in time of persecution the actual death-day could not generally be discovered. Muratori, on the contrary (De SS. Mart. Natalitiis) believes that the church took all possible pains to determine this very point. The writer of the Acta S. Ignatii, for instance, communicates to the faithful the very day of the saint's martyrdom, that they might hold an assembly on that day (Acta Ign. c. 6). Cyprian, too, (Epist. 37) required that the death-days of such of the faithful as died in prison should be communicated to him, in order that they might be commemorated by an oblation on that day. In this way were formed CALENDARS and MARTYROLOGIES. Calendars of this kind were also common among pagans. In the records, for instance, of the collegium of Lanuvium, published by Mommsen (de Collegiis, p. 112), we find the death-days which were to be celebrated by members of the collegium set down thus: "xiii. Kal. Sept. natali Caesenni Silviri patris," etc. Here we have the form adopted in the oldest Christian calendars (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 210). We have but to substitute some such name as "Callisti" for "Caesenni" and we have at once a Christian entry. [Compare MARTYR, pp. 1123, 1127.]

In inscriptions, Natale or natalis is very common.

To take two examples out of a multitude; the inscription SANCTIS MARTYRIBVS TIBVRTIO || BALERIANO ET MAXIMO QVORVM || NATALES [natalis] EST XVIII. KALENDAS MAIAS tells us that the death-day of the martyrs Tiburtius, Valerianus and Maximus was on the eighteenth day before the calends of May; and the inscription PARENTES FILIO MERCVRIO FECE||RVNT QVI VIXIT ANN. V. ET MESES VIII. || NATVS IN PACE IDVS FEBRV, that the child Mercurius was "born in peace"—i.e. died—on the ides of February (Mamachi, Origines, ii. 230; Marangoni, Acta S. Vict. p. 88). It was in accordance with this feeling that the anniversary of a Christian's death-day was celebrated with the rejoicing which generally accompanies a birthday [CELLA MEMORIAE]. It will be observed in the two inscriptions given above—and the same is the case with all inscriptions of that antiquity—that no year-date is given; it was sufficient to mark the day on which the annual commemoration was to be held.

The natalia of distinguished persons naturally soon came to be used themselves as dates. Thus in an inscription given by De Rossi, Studentia is said to have died on the natale of pope Marcellus (Jan. 16).

In process of time, the word natalis came to mean little more than an annual festival, and was applied to commemorations to which in the strict sense it was inapplicable; thus the Kalendarium Bucherianum (Ruinart, p. 617) has "VIII. Kal. Mart. Natale Petri de Cathedra," for the festival of the Chair of St. Peter. And the word was also not unfrequently used for the anniversary of the ordination of a bishop. It designated also, with a certain appropriateness, the anniversary festival of the foundation of a city.

The day of the Institution of the Lord's Supper is called Natalis Calicis, or Dies Natalis Eucharistiae. [MAUNDY THURSDAY, p. 1160.]

The Natalis Domini is the birthday of the Lord in the flesh [CHRISTMAS DAY, p. 356]; the entrance into the life of this world of St. JOHN BAPTIST [p. 881] is also a festival.

In Sidonius Apollinaris it is found in its ordinary sense for a swimming bath. (Epist. lib. ii. Ep. 2). "Natatoria" is the translation of κολυμβήθρα Joh. ix. 7. Vulg. and Joh. v. 2. Vet. Lat. NATIVITY, THE (IN ART). It has been remarked in a previous article (MARY, THE VIRGIN, IN ART) that while the Adoration of the Magi is one of the commonest subjects in early Christian art, the Nativity, with the contemporaneous gospel fact, the Adoration of the Shepherds, is one of the very rarest. Indeed it cannot be said to belong to pictorial art at all. It does not once appear in the innumerable catacomb frescoes. It is equally absent from the mosaics of the basilicas and churches. The only examples of the subject are sculptural, and must be looked for on minor works, such as sarcophagi, ivories, and gems, and even here it is by no means frequent.

The representations of this scene generally follow one type. We usually see the Divine Child wrapped in its swaddling bands as the central object, lying either in a basket-work manger, or on a tall stool, vested with hangings. The Babe is sometimes recumbent; but more usually the head and shoulders are raised without any support, in supposed allusion to Matt. viii. 20, Luke ix. 58. The star appears above. The virgin mother sometimes lies on a rude couch as a newly delivered woman, either above or below the Infant, on which she lays her right hand, sometimes sits by the manger. Joseph, when present, is seated at its foot, rapt in thought, his head resting on his hand. The ox and the ass, the traditional accompaniments of the nativity, in allusion to Isai. i. 3, Habak. iii. (cf. Baron. Annot. i. § 3; Tillemont, i. 423) appear either behind, or at the head and foot of the manger. The shepherds, with curved staves in their hands, stand by adoring.

The representations of the nativity on sarcophagi are rare. The pediment of that which forms the substructure of the pulpit of the basilica of St. Ambrose at Milan, offers an example. The divine Babe lies on a bed, unattended, the star resting on its head, while at its feet couch the ox and the ass (Allegranza, Monum. di Milan, p. 63, tav. v.; Martigny, Dictionn.

No. 1. Nativity. Sarcophagus under Pulpit, St. Ambrogio, Milan.

p. 89; woodcut No. 1). We find the same subject very rudely portrayed on a sarcophagus at Arles, figured by Millin (Midi de la France, pl. lxvi. No. 4). Christ here lies on a wicker-work cradle, to the left of which His mother is seated, and on the right stands one of the shepherds with his right arm extended, holding his pastoral staff in his left hand. The ox and ass are seen in the background. Joseph is absent. In a compartment below we find the three Magi, with Phrygian bonnets. The ox and ass are also represented in adoration on a sepulchral fragment assigned to A.D. 343, given by De Rossi (Inscr. Christ. Rom. i. p. 51, No. 73). Here the Infant lies on the ground, and we have two shepherds standing with hands outstretched in adoration. The scene is similarly represented on two Roman sarcophagi (Aringhi, i. p. 615, ii. 355; Bottari, tav. lxxxv. and xciii.; Bosio, pp. 327, 589). The former, of which we give a woodcut (No. 2), is a double subject; the left-hand half representing the Adoration of the Magi. It will be noticed that one of the shepherds kisses his hand in token of worship. On the sarcophagi it is not at all unusual to find, by a continuation of the two subjects, the accessories of the nativity, the ox and the ass, together with the swaddled babe and the manger, forming part of the Adoration of the Magi (Bottari, tav. xxii., lxxxv., lxxxvi.; Aringhi, i. pp. 295, 617; Bosio, 63.)

The nativity is a somewhat frequent subject on ivories. The great collection of Gori (Thesaur. vet. diptych. vol. iii.) presents several examples. He gives the ivory sheath of a knife (tab. x.), on one side of which are carved scenes from the opening of the Gospel history—the Annunciation, Nativity, Adoration of the Magi, Presentation in the Temple, and on the other side scenes from the Passion. The nativity follows the type given below (woodcut No. 3), only that the Virgin lies on a higher couch than the child. In the background are two pensile lamps, and the star. An ivory tablet in the treasury of the cathedral of Milan (tab. xxxii) represents the same scene, the Virgin lying below; unnimbéd angels stand at the head and foot of the manger. Joseph sits in deep thought. In the foreground are placed a basin and flagon for water. It is inscribed H. FENHCIC. Another ivory from the Cospian Museum at Bologna (tab. xxxv.) corresponds with this in almost all its details, but the workmanship is very coarse (cf. tab. xxxix.). The treatment in the ivory given (tab. xi.) is somewhat different. The Virgin, half standing, half kneeling, supports her Child on the manger. Joseph sits meditating. Angels, unnimbéd, stand by the manger, above which the star casts a trail of light, on which one of two shepherds below is gazing with elevated eyes, while his companion kneels, with his offering of a lamb standing by.

A gem engraved by Vettori (Numm. Aen. Explic. p. 37; Perret, Catacombes, tom. iv. pl. xvi. No. 84) furnishes a good example of the type described above (woodcut No. 3). Both angels and shepherds are absent. The moon appears as well as the star. The whole scene breathes a holy calm. Cut No. 4 gives one half of a much mutilated green cameo of the 6th century, representing the same type. It is engraved and described by Venuti (Accadem. di Cortona, tom. vii. p. 45, tav. ii. 14). The mutilated inscription below the subject refers to the lost half of the cameo, on which was cut the visitation, Η ΥΠΑΠΑΥΤΕ ηπα μητρος χρηστου. NATIVITY. [CHRISTMAS.]

NAULIS. [NAVALIS.]

NAVALIS, martyr with Valentinus and Agricola; commemorated at Ravenna Dec. 17 (Hieron. Mart.); Naulis (Usuard. Mart.).

[C. H.]

NAVE. (Gr. νᾶος: ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ λαοῦ; Lat. Navis, Capsum; Fr. Nef; Ital. Nave; Germ. Schiff, Langhaus.) Authorities are not agreed upon the etymology of the word, some deriving it from (1) νᾶος, temple, which is the ordinary Greek term for what we should call "the body of the church;" and others from (2) navis, a ship. The fact that in several European languages (e. g. French and Italian), the corresponding word is used to designate both "ship," and "part of a church," may be thought to favour the latter hypothesis. As being distinct from the Sanctuary upon the one hand (the place for clergy), and from the Porch (the place for certain exceptional classes of people) upon the other, it was spoken of as the "quadrangular oratory of the people" (ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ λαοῦ τετραγώνον). As being the receptacle of the people, for whose salvation the church existed, it was no great stretch of fancy to speak of it under the figure of a ship. The Ark was at all times the Old Testament figure of the Church. The idea of the comparison between the church and a ship was elaborated very early. There is a long parallel in the so-called letter of Clement I. to James, the Lord's brother (Labbe, i. 86, 87), in which the laity are represented as the passengers occupying the body of the ship. The same idea is worked at length in the directions to bishops, given in the Apostolic Constitutions, lib. ii. cap. 57 (Labbe, i.), "And first let the house be oblong, turned towards the east, the Pastophoria on either side towards the east, seeing it resembles a ship" (ὅστις ὅμοιος νηὶ). In the sixth century St. Gregory the Great casually (Expos. Moralit in Job, lib. xvii. cap. 14) connects the same imagery with the church as containing an audience whose safety had to be secured. The resemblance of nave to its Greek equivalent (νᾶος) may be nothing more than accidental. The earliest description of the architecture of a church which Christian literature presents is, according to Fleury (Hist. Eccl. vol. iii.), the account of the church at Tyre restored by its bishop, Paulinus (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. x. cap. 4). In this church, the nave was entered from the cloistered area outside by three doors, of which (as in many modern churches) the centre one far exceeded the other two both in size and in magnificence, for it was overlaid with brazen plates and divers carvings. In the nave the place of the women was distinct from that of the men—it was on a different story (ὑπερῶον) of the structure, so that the women were not visible to the men. This design of making the women invisible gives colour to the opinion of some writers that the position of the women was at the lower end of the nave farthest from the sanctuary towards which the faces of the men would naturally be turned. (See a note of Billius upon the 19th oration of St. Gregory of Nazianzum. Works, vol. ii. p. 728, ed. Colon.) [GALLERY.]

In early days the right of asylum for criminals extended to the nave as well as to the altar of the church. See SANCTUARY.

In later days the nave has often been put to base purposes (e. g. buying and selling). Δ search has been made in vain for any trace of similar desecration within the period embraced in this Dictionary; unless indeed such a prohibition as that in the 42nd of the African canons be taken as a proof that a habit was growing in Africa of converting the body of the church into a banqueting hall. (Labbe, vol. ii. p. 1070, ed. Paris.)

The plans of an early church that have been worked out from ancient writers by Goad and our own learned Bishop Beveridge differ from each other in several respects; but they both agree in assigning the nave as the place of the Ambo or Pulpit. Not only were the Scripture Lessons read from this pulpit, but it was sometimes (not always) used for preaching, so that some of St. Chrysostom's famous harangues were delivered from it. A phrase of Socrates the historian shews why the nave was chosen as the locality for it. He says (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 5, circa med.), that St. Chrysostom had been in the habit of preaching from this position, "for the sake of being completely heard."

Some idea of the size which a nave sometimes assumed in early days may be gathered from the description given by Evagrius Scholasticus of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, which was built by Justinian in the fifth century. "The length from the door opposite the sacred apse, wherein the function of the bloodless sacrifice is celebrated, up to the apse itself, is a hundred and ninety feet (this probably included a Narthex as well as a Nave); and the breadth from north to south is a hundred and fifteen feet." (Evagr. Hist. lib. iv. cap. 31.)

An early church, which is described to us is that built in the time of king Childeric over the sepulchre of St. Martin, at Tours, by Perpetuus, the fifth bishop of the see from St. Martin himself. Its total length was a hundred and sixty feet, its breadth sixty feet, and its height forty-five feet. Its nave had twenty windows and five doors. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. ii. cap. 14.) Another church of the same period was that of Arverne. It was a hundred and fifty feet long, sixty feet wide, and fifty feet high. This church likewise had eight doors, of which Mabillon (De Liturgiâ Gallicanâ, lib. i. cap. 8) concludes that five were in the nave, that is to say, three in the western façade, and one upon each side.

It is stated by Henke that the word Navis was first used to designate a part of a church by the Latin writers of the ninth and tenth centuries. He does not give the passages upon which he relies; but unless he refers to other passages than those which are given by Du Fresne, s. v. 'Navis,' or by Magri (Hierolexicon), it is perhaps open to question whether the date should not be placed still a little later. See his view in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, art. 'Baukunst,' p. 731, near the end. [H. T. A.]

NECROLOGIUM. The book in which were entered the names of the dead for whom prayer was made in religious houses. It was a survival of the primitive DIPTYCHS, but admitted generally only the names of members of the house, of its benefactors, and those with whom the community had entered into a compact for mutual intercession.

This book had no settled name within our period, and afterwards it was variously called. necrologium, obitarius, obituarium, liber obitarius (all late mediaeval), Kalendarium (as, e.g., in a letter of communion between the monks of St. Remigius and those of St. Benignus, "We do for their dead as for our own; except that briefs are not sent, nor are they put in the kalendar among our own people," Litterae ad ineundam Suffragiorum Societatem, v., in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 160, ed. 2; Anselm: "Tell us his name and the day of his death, that it may be written in our Kalendar," Epist. i. 21).—Liber Vitae (e.g., Bertram, bishop of Mans, A.D. 616, made bequests to several churches, on condition that his name and the names of certain others should be "recited in the book of life in the said church," Act. Pontif. Cenom. c. 11, in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 257, 261, 263).—Martyrologium ("anniversario quod in nostro martyrologio scribitur," Litterae, iv. u.s.), which was common,—and Memoriale ("Postquam defuncti fuerint, post patres nostros defunctos in memoriali defunctorum scribantur," Litterae, iii. u.s.; "Fratrum Memoriale," Bernardi Ordo Clun. i. 27 in Vet. Discipl. Mon. Hergott, 208), or Liber Memorialis (in libro memoriali quemcumque vult (prior), facit notari," S. Wilhelmi Constit. Hirsaug. ii. 17, Hergott, u.s. 494).

In the Disciplina Farfarensis of Guido (ad calc.) may be seen formulae, under which names of different classes were entered. One direction runs thus: "In martyrologio taliter scribendi sunt monachi, vel amici. Obierunt Adalgerius, Gerbertus nostrae congregationis monachus, et de-positio Domni Conradi Regis, et Henrici Ducis, amicorum nostrorum. Ididimus nostrae congr. monachus, et sic de aliis." (Hergott, 132.)

Proofs are numerous of the use of necrology, though not under a fixed name, within our period. Thus, according to Bede, a boy living in a monastery was told in a vision (about A.D. 686) to direct the monks, "quaerere in suis codicibus in quibus defunctorum annotata est depositio," for the day of St. Oswald's death, 642. The priest to whom he told this accordingly "searched for it in his year-book" (annali; Hist. Eccl. iv. 14.) Bede, who died in 735, to Eadfred, the bishop, and the monks of Lindisfarne: "When I am dead deign to pray and celebrate masses for the redemption of my soul, as for one of your own family and house, and to write my name among your own" (Vita Cuthberti, praef. 2). Boniface, in 752, writing to an abbat: "We pray that you will cause to be celebrated helpful prayers and masses for the souls of our brethren, fellow-labourers in the Lord, who have fallen asleep, whose names the bearer of this letter has made known to you" (Epist. 100, ed. Würdtwein). In 755, king Alhred promises Lullus of Mentz that he will, in return for prayers to be offered in his diocese for the king, his queen, and several of his friends and kin, undertake that prayers shall daily be offered in all the monasteries in his dominions for Lullus, and others whose names he had sent to the king. These names, he says, in general terms, would be committed "perpetuis literarum monumentis," from which we infer that no specific name for the monastic obituary was known to him (Epist. 108 inter Epp. Bonif., see also 115, 121, 127, 160, &c.).

From the expression "year-book," used by Bede, we might infer that generally the name of a deceased person was read out of the necrology once a year, viz., on the anniversary of their death. This is confirmed by documentary evidence; as e.g., by the "Litterae Societatis" between two monasteries in France (Acta O.S.B. saec. II. 1093): "Nomina vero defunctorum fratrum Stabulensis coenobii Martyrologio Solemniaciensis per singulos dies cum suorum fratrum anniversariis recitabuntur" (cited by Martene, de Antiq. Monach. Rit. i. v. 27). But other days might be fixed by special covenant or injunction. Thus Bertram of Mans (u. s. 263): "Nomen meum ac sacerdotes illorum (supra-scriptorum locorum) in libro vitae jubent ascribere, et per singulas festivitates recitari."

The names for the day were read from the necrology in the chapter of the monks after prime. They came after a lesson from the martyrology (properly so-called), and were followed by the psalm De Profundis, with a suitable prayer (Bona, Rer. Liturg. II. xiv. 2). De Moleon (Le Brun Desmarests) found this custom surviving among the canons of Notre Dame at Rouen, in the middle of the last century (Voyages Liturgiques, 282).

When the notice of a death was sent for entry in a necrologium, the document was called Breve or Brevis (Litterae Societatis, i. v. u.s.) or Liber Rotularis (Hariulfus, Chronica. Centulense, iii. 9, in Spicil. Dacher. ii. 316, ed. 2).

A special messenger was sent with the brief. When Rolfe (their abbat) died the monks of Centule are said to have sent a book roll to announce his departure "through the churches and places of the saints with whom he had entered into a fellowship of mutual prayers" (Hariulf, u.s.). The messenger who carried it was called breviger, brevigerulus, rotularius, rotuliger, rotliger, rotlifer, rolliger, rollifer (Ducange in vv.). At each monastery he received a written promise of prayers, which document was called titulus. This was sometimes in verse, an example of which may be seen in Ducange, under Rollifer. At length it was brought back to the house that sent it forth, and there kept. Such a brief, issued by the nuns of Lillechurch at Higham in Kent, accompanied by the tituli of no less than 363 religious houses, is preserved in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge. The following is one of the tituli:—"Titulus Ecclesiae Sancti Augustini Cant. Anima dominae Amphelise priorissae de Lillechurch, et Animae omnium fidelium defunctorum per misericordiam Dei requiescant in pace. Amen. Concedimus ei commune beneficium ecclesiae nostrae. Oramus pro vestris: orate pro nostris." The last two clauses, "Oramus," &c., are common to all the tituli. "Haeftenius supplies examples of these briefs in Disquisitionum Monasticorum tom. ii. p. 793" (Mabillon, Observ. in Anal. Vet. 160).

Short notices of this subject may be seen in the Annal. Benedict. (ad ann. 859), iii. 76; Bona, Rer. Liturg. ii. 14, § 2; Martene, de Ant. Monach. Rit. I. v. 22-33; Merati, Novae Observat. ad Gavanti in Rubr. Breviar. V. xxi. 6. Mabillon, Observ. in Analect. Vetera, 160; and Salig, de Diptychis, cap. xix., have treated it at somewhat greater length. [W. E. S.]

NECROMANTIA 'Barb. Nigromantia' (νεκρομαντεία, νεκυρομαντεία, νεκρία). There are two methods of divination by means of the dead, of which we read within the Christian era. The first was by the inspection of the viscera. Thus, Juvenal (vi. 551):—

"Pectora pullorum mirabitur, exta catelli Interdum et pueri."

Dionysius, of Alexandria, affirms that Valerian, at the instance of an Egyptian archimage, "slew miserable boys, sacrificed the children of unhappy parents, and divided the newly born entrails" (Euseb. Hist. vii. 10). Eusebius relates that Maxentius "at one time opened the bodies of pregnant women, at another searched the viscera of newly born infants" (De Vita Const. i. 36; sim. Hist. viii. 14). Theodoret says that after the death of Julian, it was found that he had just before, in a heathen temple, drawn an omen for the battle from the liver of a woman, murdered for that purpose (Hist. Eccl. iii. 26). Socrates also tells us that during the reign of Julian, the heathen at Athens, Alexandria, and in other places "sacrificed children, both male and female, and inspected their entrails" (Hist. Eccl. iii. 13).

The second method was to raise the souls of the dead, and obtain direct answers from them. Of this we read much more frequently. Thus, Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, appeals to "necromancies and inspections of incorrupt boys and the calling of human souls," as a testimony to the consciousness of the soul after death (Apol. i. 18). In the Recognitions of Clement (perhaps about A.D. 180) the writer, who speaks in the first person, represents himself as considering whether, in the search of truth, he shall go to Egypt, the chief seat of such studies, and by gifts induce a priest there "to bring up a soul from the lower regions, by that which they call necromancy" (i. 5; sim. Hon. Clem. i. 4; De Gest. Petri, 5). These "animarum suscitioes" were alleged as a counterpoise to the appearance of angels, as believed by Christians (ibid. viii. 53). Tertullian, citing the Greek historians, says that "the Nasamonies endeavoured to obtain oracles of their own, by staying at the sepulchres of their fathers;" and that, "the Celts spend the night with the same object among the tombs of men of valour" (De Anim. 57). Constantius, in a law of 357, denounces those "qui manibus accitis audent ventilare" (Codex Theod. ix. xvi. De Malef. 5), where the last word is understood of the motions and gesticulations (beating the air) with which the necromancer accompanied his incantation. Ammianus relates that Maximin, a high official afterwards put to death by Gratian, was reputed to have in his service (about 368) a Sardinian, who was "exceedingly skilful in bringing up harmful spirits, and obtaining the presages of ghosts" (Hist. xxviii. 1). Prudentius, A.D. 405 (c. Symm. i. p. 249; ed. 1596):

"Murmure nam magico tenues excire figuras,
Atque sepulchrales scire incantare favillas,
Vitâ itidem spoliare alios, ars noxia novit."

This kind of Necromancy, which was often called ψυχαγωγία, was thought to be most successful when the answer came from the soul of a person murdered for the purpose. Thus in the Recognitions of Clement already quoted, Simon Magus is made to state that his power depended on the aid he received from the soul of "an uncorrupted boy slain by violence," which he "called up and made to assist him by adjurations unutterable" (ii. 13; sim. iii. 44; Hon. Clem. ii. 26; Gest. Petr. 27). The soul immediately on death was supposed to have many new powers, and among them "prescience, on which account it was called up for the purposes of Necromancy" (Recogn. ii. 13). Tertullian, who recognises the practice (Apol. 23), says that a peculiar malignity, and, therefore, readiness to assist in evil, was ascribed to souls early and violently parted from the body (De Animâ, 57). St. Chrysostom speaks of a popular belief that many of the γόητες took and slew children that they might have their souls to help them afterwards" (Hom. 28, § 2, in S. Matt. viii. 29); and says that "many of the weaker sort thought that the souls of those who had died a violent death became demons" (De Lazaro, Conc. ii. 1). Ammianus says, that one Pollentianus, in the time of Valens (A.D. 371), having cut the foetus from the womb of a pregnant woman yet alive, and "having called up the Manes below, presumed to inquire about a change of government" (Hist. xxix. ii. 2). Here it is probably meant that this dreadful rite gave him power over other departed spirits, or over the infernal gods themselves. See St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53.

When apparitions and responses were said to be granted to the necromancer, Christian writers were unanimous in replying that, supposing it to be true an evil spirit personated the soul invoked and deceived the magician. So the author of the Recognitions (iii. 49), Tertullian (daemones operantur sub obtentu eorum, De An. 57), St. Chrysostom (Hom. 28, in S. Matt. § 2), and others.

From the 6th century downwards, the word necromancy appears to have been used vaguely to denote any pretended exercise of supernatural power. Thus Gregory of Tours, A.D. 575, speaking of one who affected to cure disease, says that he "sought to mock men by the delusion of necromantic device" (Hist. Franc. ix. 6). Adhelm, 709, says that St. Peter went through the provinces extirpating from the root the deadly wild vines of the Simonian Necromancy" (De Laud. Virg. 25). The same writer (ibid. 24) calls the "spirit of divination," of Acts xvi. 16, a "spirit of necromancy," and again (50) applies the term to arts by which the reason of a person was supposed to be affected. NEMESIUS (1) Martyr, with Potamius in Cyprus; commemorated Feb. 20 (Usuard. Mart.).

(2) One of the seven sons of Symphorosa, martyrs at Tibur; commemorated June 27 (Usuard. Mart.); July 21 (Bed. Mart.).

(3) Confessor, commemorated in Lieuvain, Aug. 1 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 46).

(4) Deacon, martyr at Rome, with his daughter Lucilla; commemorated Oct. 31 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(5) Martyr, commemorated at Nicomedia Nov. 9 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr, in Egypt, commemorated Dec. 19 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

NEO (1) Martyr, with Leonilla and Jonilla at Lingon, commemorated Jan. 17 (Usuard. Mart.).

(2) Martyr, with Zeno, Eusebius, Vitalius; commemorated April 28 (Basil. Menol.).

(3) Martyr with Agia, Claudius, Asterius; commemorated in Cilicia, Aug. 23 (Hieron. Mart.); in the city of Egea in Lycia (Usuard. Mart.); under Lysias praefect of Cilicia in the reign of Diocletian, Oct. 29 (Basil. Menol.).

(4) Martyr, with Nico and Heliodorus; commemorated Sept. 28 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

NEO-CAESAREA, COUNCILS OF (NEO-CAESARIENSIA CONCILIA). Two are recorded.

(1) A.D. 315, or some years later, as Hefele thinks (Councils, Eng. Tr. 223) from its fourteen canons, and there is no reason to think it passed more, containing nothing about the lapsed. Yet their case may have been passed over designedly, from having had so much space given to it at Ancyra. This, however, would bring it about midway between the councils of Ancyra and Nicaea, where it has always been placed. If the signatures appended to it in the Latin version of Isidore Mercator may be relied on, the Neo-Caesarea where it was held was in Pontus, and it was attended by several of the bishops who had previously met at Ancyra. By the first of its canons any priest marrying is to forfeit his order. The third is directed against all persons who have been several times married, yet couched in the spirit of the first of Laodicea. The seventh forbids priests attending second marriages. By the eleventh nobody may be ordained priest who is not thirty years old. By the thirteenth country presbyters are restricted in their ministrations, much as country bishops had been by the thirteenth Ancyran. (Mansi, ii. 539-52.)

(2) A.D. 358, or thereabouts, at which Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, was condemned. Other synods held in his case were Gangra and Melitene (Mansi, iii. 291). [E. S. Ff.]

NEONILLA (1) (NEONILA), grandmother of the martyrs Peusippus, Elisippus, Mesippus, martyr, commemorated Jan. 16 (Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 17 (Basil. Menol.).

(2) Martyr, with Terentius; commemorated Oct. 28 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 272). [C. H.]

NEOPHYTE (νεόφυτος). I. A newly baptized person was so called, as being newly engrafted on Christ (Zonar. Comm. in Can. 10, Conc. Sard.). The usage was suggested by the employment of the word in 1 Tim. iii. 6. St. Augustine, in the same context, says that the gifts and privileges mentioned in Heb. vi. 1, 2 are "eorum qui baptizantur initia" and "initia neophytorum" (De Fide et Oper. xi. § 17). Elsewhere he says that it is sanctioned by the custom of the church that "the eight days of the neophytes be distinguished from the rest; i.e., that the eighth agree with the first" (Epist. 55, ad Januar. xvii. § 32). The eight days were those during which the newly baptized wore their white dress. [BAPTISM, §§ 60-63, vol. i. 163.] St. Augustine's words above cited are thus explained by Amalarius: "The eight offices, which are celebrated on account of the neophytes, are distinguished from the rest that follow down to Pentecost. The first has two lauds, i.e., Alleluia, Confitemini Domino, and the tract, Laudate Domi- num, omnes gentes. The eighth has two, Alleluia, Haec dies and Laudate pueri Dominum, which is not the case on any other sabbath from that day to Pentecost" (De Eccl. Off. I. 32; copied by Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 21). Pellicia (de Eccles. Politia, I. i. 1, § 6, "Baptizatis τῶν νεοφύτων nomen per integram Paschatis hebdomadem erat") and others appear to think that the baptized were not called neophytes (except with reference to an early ordination) beyond the first week. This is improbable in itself, and had it been so, it would not have been necessary to distinguish them during that period by the title of *albat*i (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 11; Amalar. u.s. 29; Ps.-Alc. u.s.), or as positi in albis (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. 67), or the like. The contrary is also implied in the following canon: "Neophyti aliquamdiu a lautioribus epulis et spectaculis et conjugibus abstineant" (Conc. Carth. iv. A.D. 398, can. 86; Gratian, de Consecr. v. 12).

Neophytes were often called νεοφώτιστοι (recently illuminated). Balsamon explains the former word by the latter (Comm. in Can. 10 Conc. Sard.). The Catecheses Mystagogicae of Cyril of Jerusalem are addressed, πρὸς τοὺς νεοφωτιστούς (p. 277, ed. Milles). They were called infantes for an obvious reason, "Infantes appellamini, quoniam regenerati estis, et novam vitam ingressi estis, et ad vitam aeternam renati estis" (August. Serm. 260). "Hodie Octavae dicuntur infantium. . . Isti senes, juvenes, adolescentuli, omnes infantes" (Serm. 376, § 2, Domin. in Oct. Pasch.). In the Mozarabic rite, after the consecration of the water, the priest prays that those washed therewith "may be restored by a new infancy" (Leslie, 189). In the Roman prayer of consecration he says, "Omnes in unam pariat gratia mater infantiam;" after it "In verâ innocentia nova infantia renascatur" (Sacram. Gelas. Murat.; Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 569, 570; Greg. ii. 63-5).

After their baptism the neophytes were conducted in their white dresses to the altar, about which they were stationed during the services of the following week, and where they received daily. Thus in a sermon preached at Easter, 355, (perhaps by St. Hilary), "Novi homines effecti, sanctum altare circumdant" (Vet. Script. Coll. Ampliss. Mart. et Dur. ix. 78, cited by Leslie, Notae ad Miss. Mozar. 533). St. Ambrose reminds a nun who had made her profession on Easter day, that she had "offered herself to be veiled at the altar of God, . . . among the shining lights of the neophytes, among the candidates (an allusion to their dress) of the heavenly kingdom" (De Lapsu Virg. v. § 19). The author De Mysteriis (ascribed to Ambrose): "His abluta plebs dives insignibus ad Christi contendit altare" (viii. § 43). But more fully Paulinus (Epist. xxxii. ad Sever. § 5):

"Inde parens sacro ducit de fonte sacerdos
Infantes niveos corpore, corde, habitu;
Circumstansque rudes festis altariis agnos
Cruda salutaribus imbuat ova cibis."

Many epitaphs of persons who died while neophytes are extant, in which the fact is recorded. E.g. "Junius Bassus V.C. qui vixit annis xlii. men. ii. in ipsâ praefectura urbi neofitus iit ad Deum" (A.D. 359; Bottari, Roma Sotterranea, tav. xv.). See other examples of males in Gruter's Corpus Inscript. p. 1051 n. 9 (aged 8 years), p. 1060 n. 3 (aged 11), in Bosio, Roma Sott. p. 433 (aged 6), &c. The following is the epitaph of a married woman, "Hoctavie conjugē neofite bisomus maritus fecit" (Grut. p. 1053 n. 7). Other instances of female neophytes occur in several collections, as, e.g., in Gruter, p. 1054 n. 1 (3 years), p. 1057 n. 6 (a wife). The last is called "legitima neophyta." Does this mean that she died after the eight days, and so had fulfilled all the special observances imposed on neophytes? Sometimes they were said to have died in albis. For example, "Hic jacet puer nomene Valentiano qui vixit anno iii. et me ses et dies xvi. et in albis cum pace recessit" (Le Blant, Inscript. Chrét. de la Gaule, i. 476, who also refers to Fabretti, Inscr. Antiq. Explic. pp. 577, 735). It is reasonably inferred that such persons had, as a rule, received clinic baptism. [SICK, VISITATION OF THE.]

II. It frequently happened in the early ages that the fittest person for the office of bishop or priest in a vacant church was one who had not passed through the lower orders, or at least not through all of them. At first it is probable that laymen and inferior clerks were ordained priests and bishops freely in such cases; but at length the liberty became an occasion of ambition, and was restrained by the canons, in accordance with the injunction of St. Paul (1 Tim. iii. 6), from whom also the name of neophyte (in this use of it a term of reproach) was borrowed to describe the premature ruler of the church. The earliest prohibition occurs in the 80th of the so-called apostolic canons. "It is not right that one who has come out of paganism and been baptized, or who has left a sinful course of life, should forthwith be ordained a bishop. For it is unfit that one who has not yet given proof of himself should be a teacher of others; unless, indeed, this take place through the grace of God." The council of Nicaea, 325, premising that this "rule of the church" had been often broken, "either from necessity or because men urged it, so that they led men but lately come over to the faith from paganism, and in the catechumenate for a short time, to the spiritual laver, and further promoted them as soon as baptized, to the episcopate or presbyterate," decreed that such practices should be tolerated no longer (can. 2). The Arabic canons of Nicaea depose both the ordainer and the ordained in such a case (can. 12, vers. Ecchell. Hard. Conc. i. 480). The council of Sardica, 347, forbade any one to be made a bishop who had not before "served as reader and deacon and presbyter; . . . for so he would with reason be regarded as a neophyte" (can. 10). The council of Laodicea, of uncertain date, but probably about 365: "Persons lately illuminated (i.e. baptized [BAPTISM, § 5; vol. i. p. 156]) must not be promoted in the hieratic order" (can. 3); which is thus rendered by Dionysius Exiguus, A.D. 533; "Non oportet neophytum promoveri ad ordinem sacerdotalem" (Hard. i. 782).

Gaul seems to have been notorious for offences against this law of the church. Gregory I. in 598 says to queen Brunichilda, "their office has there, as we have understood, come to be such an object of ambition, that bishops (sacerdotes), which is too grievous, are at once ordained out of laymen" (Epist. vii. Ind. ii. 115). Instances of this are found in Gregory of Tours: "Nice-tius tamen ex laico, qui prius ab Chilperico rege praeceptum ellicerat, in ipsa urbe (Matis-censi) episcopatum adeptus est" (Hist. Franc. viii. 20). Again: "Laban, bishop of Eause, died this year, whom Desiderius succeeded from a layman, though the king had promised with an oath that he would never ordain a bishop out of the laity. Sed quid pectora humana non cogat auri sacra fames" (ibid. 22)?

The Apostolic canon, it will be observed, makes an exception in favour of those who, like Timothy (1 Tim. i. 18; iv. 14), were supposed to receive some divine attestation to their fitness. Cyprian, Athanasius, Nectarius, and Ambrose are instances. The first named had indeed been baptized and made deacon and priest in succession, but all in so short a time, that his biographer says of him "Judicio Dei et plebis favore ad officium sacer-dotii, et episcopatus gradum (A.D. 248), adhuc neophytus, et ut putabatur, novellus electus est" (Vita auct. Pontio, Opp. Cypr. praef. 3, ed. Fell.). The council of Neocaesarea had in 315 forbidden even a priest to be ordained under thirty years of age (can. 11); yet only eleven years after that, the great Athanasius, in obedience, it was believed, to a divine intimation conveyed through his dying predecessor, who called out his name repeatedly with his last breath, was ordained bishop of Alexandria at the age of twenty-eight (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. ii. 17). Nectarius was not baptized when, in 381, he was chosen to succeed Gregory Nazianzen at Constantinople; but was then "initiated by baptism," and while yet clothed in the typical dress (of the neophytes) was declared bishop of Constantinople by the common voice of the synod, then assembled in that city (Sozom. vii. 8). Nor was St. Ambrose more than a catechumen, when (A.D. 374) the people of Milan insisted on his becoming their bishop; but, "being baptized, he is said to have filled all the ecclesiastical offices, and on the eighth day he was ordained with the greatest favour and joy of all" (Vita a Paulino conscr. § 9). Some twenty years later, referring to these circumstances and to his great unwillingness to accept the office, he says: "Nevertheless the bishops of the west approved my ordination by their judgment; those of the east by their example also. And yet a neophyte is forbidden to be ordained, lest he should be lifted up with pride;" but (he urges) if there be a suitable humility, the defect is healed, "ubi causa non haeret, vitium non imputatur" (Epist. 73 ad Eccl. Vercell. § 65).

NEUMA. [PNEUMA.]

NEW MOON. "Let not any one fear to take up any kind of work at the new moon; for God made the moon to regulate the times, and temper the darkness of the night" (Eliquis, de Rect. Cathol. Convers. 5). The superstition to which St. Eloy here refers was extended by some who are condemned by St. Ambrose to the fifth day of the moon ("quantum esse fugiendam, nihilque in ea inchoandum"; Ambr. Epist. 23, § 4; comp. Virg. Georg. i. 276), and for special purposes to the seventh and the ninth: "Septimā lunā instrumenta confici non debent, nonā iterum lunā servum emptum, ut puta, domum duci non oportet" (Hilar. Diacon. Comm. in Ep. ad Gal. iv. 10). Such superstitions were of purely pagan origin, Christians after the destruction of Jerusalem being under no temptation to observe the new moons of the Jews. "They are wont to blame us," says Hilary the deacon, A.D. 354, "because we despise their feast days, or because we do not observe the beginnings of the months, which they call neomeniae" (Comm. in Ep. ad Coloss. ii. 17). The observances peculiar to the Kalends of January throughout the Roman world must have been originally connected with the first day of the lunar month. [CIRCUMCISION; NEW YEAR'S DAY.] [W. E. S.]

NEW YEAR'S DAY. It was ruled by the Julian Reformation that the year should begin with the Kalends of January, and such was thenceforth the popular usage. But this was not, for long time, accepted by the churches of East and West. The epoch of the ecclesiastical year, it was thought, was prescribed by the requirements of the Easter reckoning, in accordance with the law given by Moses that the Paschal month should be the first month of the year. Thus Anatolius, in the fragment of his Paschal Canon (A.D. 277), ap. Eus. H. E. vii. 32, gives as the epoch of his (Metonic) cycle, "New moon of first month in its first year, which falls on the 26 Phamenoth in the Egyptian reckoning, by Macedonian months is 22 Dystus, i.e. Roman xi. kal. April" (= 22 March), and adds that "the first month is that of the Hebrews, in which the vernal equinox falls." Hence in Victorius, Dionysius Exiguus, Bede, mensis primus is often synonymous with mensis paschalis. In the East, as the Romanised Syrian Calendar made Xanthicus (= Nisan) identical with the Roman April, this month was taken as the first: and it is in terms of this reckoning that the Constitut. Apost. (v. 13), appoint that the Feast of the Nativity (i.e. 25th December) shall be kept in the ninth month; Epiphany (viz. 6th January) on the sixth of the tenth month; as again, ibid. 14, 17, Xanthicus and Dystus are respectively first and twelfth month. Epiphanius also seems to follow this reckoning, when he says (Haer. lxx. c. 11) πρὸ ἰσημερίας οὐ πληρωθήσεται τὸ ἔτος. "the year must not end before the (vernal) equinox." But in the West, in accordance with the old Roman practice and the numerical names of the months (Quintilis—December—comp. Ovid. Fasti, ii. 4, 7), March was taken as the first or paschal month; thus St. Leo and Gelasius speak of the ember seasons as fasts of the first, fourth, seventh and tenth months. As late as A.D. 755, a canon of a council in France (Mansi, Coll. Concc.

xii. 550) has, "mense primo, quod est, Martiis kalendis." In Italy this practice seems to have been only ecclesiastical, in France it was also civil; thus Gregory of Tours makes July the fifth, and December the tenth month, and from a contemporary writer de Mirac. S. Marcellini, Mabillon (de Re diplomat. ii. 23) has the words, "Ad mensem Martium qui apud nos primus sine dubio vocatur." The successive continuators of the history of Gregory of Tours, Fredegar and others, keep to the same reckoning from 1st March. Yet here and there Gregory falls into the popular way of making the year begin with the first of January (Ideler, Hdb. 2, 327).

The Roman New Year's Day, Calends of January, was the one great festival universally kept throughout the empire, as Libanius testifies (Opp. i. 256, iv. 1950, Reiske); μῆν αὖ οἶδα, κοινὴν ἅπαντων ὁπόσοι ζῶσιν ὑπὸ τὴν Ῥωμαίων ἀρχήν· γίγνεται δὲ ἐνιαυτοῦ τοῦ μὲν πεπραμένου, τοῦ δὲ ἀρχομένου. He, as a moralist, reproaches the riotous excesses and superstitions against which the church long kept up its protest. So early as the end of the 2nd century, Tertullian (de Idololatr. c. 14) has to lament the countenance given by Christians to the old practices at this season (nobis Saturnalia et Januariae et Brumae et Matronales frequentantur, munera comestant, strenae consonant, lusus, convivia conestrepunt), which they excused to themselves as merely civil and social observances, nowise pagan superstitions. Petrus Chrysologus (c. 433), Serm. 155, protests similarly: "Dicit aliquis, non sunt haec sacrilegorum studia, vota sunt haec jocorum; et hoc esse novitatis laetitiam non vetustatis errorem, esse hoc anni principium, non gentilitatis offensam. Erras homo! non sunt haec ludicra, sunt crimina." How long and earnestly the protest against this conformity of Christians to these old-established customs was kept up by the church may be seen in Homilies of St. Chrysostom (A.D. 387), in Kalendas, t. i. 697, and de Lazaro, i. ibid. 707, in the opening of which he calls the feast of the Calends ἐορτὴν σατανικὴν; Asterius Amasenus (cir. 400) in Kalendas, p. 55; St. Augustin, Serm. 198, de Cal. Jan. (t. v. 907). Maximus of Turin (A.D. 422) Hom. xvi. de Circumcisione Domini, p. 46; Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502), de Kal. Jan. Serm. 129, 130, ap. St. Augustini, Opp. Append. t. v. 233 sqq.; Eligius of Limoges (A.D. 640), Serm. de Rectitud. Cathol. Conversationes, c. 5, ap. St. Augustini Opp. Append. t. vi. 267, c. (mostly a cento of passages from the homilies of Caesarius). The protest is enforced by the Concilium Quinisexum (Trullanum), A.D. 692, canon 62, τὰς οὕτω λεγόμενας Καλάνδας, καὶ τὰ λεγόμενα Βότα (vota), καὶ τὰ καλούμενα Βρουμάλια (Brunalia) . . . καθάπαξ ἐκ τῆς τῶν πιστῶν πολιτείας περαιρεθῆναι βουλόμεθα, κ.τ.λ. And down to the end of our period, the church (even after that the 1st of January as the Octave of the Nativity was entitled to rank as a festival, viz. of the Circumcision) confronted the heathen festivities with a three days' fast. Thus the second Council of Tours (A.D. 567) can. 17, enacts "triduum illud quo ad calendam gentilium consuetudinem patres nostri statuerunt privatas in kalendis Januariis fieri litanias, ut in ecclesiis psallatur, et hora viii. in ipsis kalendis circumcisionis missa Deo propitio celebretur"; and Isidore of Seville (A.D. 595) de div. Offic. Eccles. i. 40, says that "jejunium Januarius kalendarius propter errorem gentilitatis statuit ecclesia . . . per quod agnoscerent homines in tantum se prave agere ut pro eorum peccatis necesse sit omnibus ecclesiis jejunare." (Large extracts from most of the authorities cited may be seen in Rheinwald, Die kirchliche Archäologie, p. 223 sqq.)

When the 25th December had come to be generally received as the day of the Nativity [CHRISTMAS], the Calends of January acquired a Christian character, and Dionysius Exiguus dates the years of his era (our A.D.) a Circumcisione Domini. But the churches long shrank from making the New Year's Day of Christians the same with that of the heathen, and it was deemed preferable to commence the year a Nativitate (25th December), an epoch which continued in use far into the middle ages. Others, however, found it more suitable that the year should begin 25th March, which, if 25th December was the day of Christ's Nativity, would be the day of the Conception, the θελα ἀνθρώπου, the Incarnation. Hence the epoch ab annunciatione, or a conceptione. These two epochs were further recommended (in the astronomical point of view) by their supposed coincidence with the bruma (25th December) and the vernal equinox (25th March). But, according to an ancient Latin tradition, the Passion befell 25th March. St. Augustin, de Trin. iv. 5: "Octavo Kal. Apr. conceptus creditur Christus quo et passus. Natus traditur octavo kal. Dec." Hence, perhaps, the epoch a resurrectione (or a passione) Christi, was originally intended for the fixed date, 25th March. Bede relates (de Temp. rat. c. 45), that in Gaul, at first, this was kept as the day "quando Christi resurrectio fuisse tradebatur": and Zeno of Verona, cir. A.D. 360, Serm. 46, speaking of this as the day of the resurrection says, in his mystical way, "idem sui successor itemque decessor, longaeva semper aetate novellus, anni parens annique progenies, antecedit sequiturque tempora et saecula infinita." Certain it is, that the dating of the years of our Lord from Easter—the moveable feast—(inconvenient as it was, as so shifting from year to year, that any Julian day within the paschal limits, say 1st April, might fall twice in the same year or not at all*) prevailed far into the middle ages, in France down to the sixteenth century. In this reckoning, the first instant of the New Year was signalised by the consecration of the tapers in the night preceding Easter morning. (Du Cange, s. v. Cereus Paschalis, and Mabillon de Re diplom. ii. 23-6.) In Spain and Portugal the years were dated from the Annunciation down to the fourteenth century, in Germany down to the eleventh, then from the Nativity. Conversely, the English, in Bede's time, began the year with 25th December; after the thirteenth century, with the 25th March, which continued to be the legal civil reckoning down to 1752. In Italy, besides the ecclesiastical epoch, 1st March (see above), 25th March was the customary civil epoch, with this curious variation, viz. that in one reckoning (Calculus Pisanus) a given year of our Lord was made to begin on the 25th March preceding, and in the other (C. Florentinus) on the 25th March following the 1st January, from which, in the now received reckoning, the given year bears date.^b The multiplicity and fluctuation of epochs (against which the Calendar of Charlemagne, commencing the year with 1st January, was an ineffectual protest) was a matter of sore perplexity to later historians: thus Ger-vase of Canterbury, early in the 13th century (Hist. Anglicanae Script. x. col. 1336) complains, "Chronicae scriptores ipsos Domini annos diversis modis et terminis numerant. . . . Quidam enim annos Domini incipiunt computare ab Annuntiatione, alii a Nativitate, quidam a Circumcissione, quidam vero a Passione. Cui ergo istorum magis credendum est?"

* To meet this inconvenience, it was usual to add to the month-day ante pascha or post pascha. If the date includes the year of the INDICION, this generally removes all doubt.

In the East the year, in various forms of the Julianized Macedonian Calendar, began 24th September, but in that "of the Greeks, i.e. Syrians," constantly used for the "year of the Greeks" = era of the Seleucidae, the year begins 1st October. But the "Indictions," from their first commencement at Constantinople, bore date from 1st September, and from the fifth century this came to be received as the first day of the year, not, however, at once superseding the older epoch, 24th September; while in Syria, the old Seleucidian epoch, 1st October, has continued in use to this day, except among Syrian Catholics, who use the 1st September. But the Syrian Evagrius, the historian (A.D. 594), who uses the "era of Antioch," dates its years from 1st September, the use of which epoch by Greek-writing Syrians, in place of the true Syrian epoch, 1st October, is to be explained by the influence of the Indictions in public acts and records (Ideler, i. p. 463 sqq.). The 1st September is the year-epoch of the Constantinopolitan mundane era, and as New Year's Day continued in Russia down to A.D. 1700, in Greece to 1821. For the Copts, Abyssinians, and Armenians using the Alexandrine Calendar, the year begins 29th August.

Year-dating. During the first centuries in the West, the only consecutive ERA [p. 622] was that ab urbe condita; the other notes of the current year were given by the reckoning from the accession of the reigning emperor, or more commonly by the names of the consuls of the 1st January (cons. ordinarii). From the beginning of the fourth century, as may be seen in Clinton, Fasti Romani, the latter note of time began to fail; no consuls being appointed, the year was marked post consulatum of the last named; thus, after A.D. 307, Constantio IX. et Constantino Coss., the notes are (308) Constantio X. et Maximiano VII.; (309) post consul. X. et VII.; (310) anno ii. p. c. X. et VII. If the given year had consuls (or a consul) it was named accordingly. Thus the first council of Toledo bears date Stilicone Consule (A.D.) 400. By a law of Constantine, A.D. 322, no constitution was valid without name of consuls and month-day. In 537, when the consulship was all but extinct, Justinian enlarged this law by prescribing that, in all instruments, first the year of the reigning Caesar, then the names of the consuls, and, lastly, indiction, month and day must be noted (Cod. Theodos. i. i. Const. 1; Novell. xlvii.). [H. B.]

NEW YEAR'S GIFTS. The custom of making gifts on New Year's Day, with an appropriate wish, prevailed extensively in the Roman empire in the early days of Christianity. Many remains, such as medals, lamps, tesserae of metal or of earthenware, bear inscriptions testifying that they were designed for New Year's gifts, generally in some such form as: ANNUM NOVVM FAVSTVM FELICEM TIBI. Gori (The-saurus Dipt. i. p. 202) figures a tessera of rock-crystal which was, as its inscription testifies (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 286, 2nd edition), a New Year's gift to the emperor Commodus. It does not appear that any of those which have been described bear any words or symbols especially indicative of a Christian origin; there was in fact no reason why Christians should not adopt the simple inscriptions on articles manufactured for the general market.

The Christian fathers, however, censure the giving of strenae, together with other pagan customs which tended to give the kalends of January a licentious character (see Augustine, Sermm. 197, 198, and CIRCUMCISION, p. 394), and a council of Auxerre in A.D. 578 (c. 1) distinctly forbade Christians "strenas diabolicas observare." The objects given were probably sometimes tainted with paganism or indecency.

Another reason for disapproving of strenae is furnished by Maximus of Turin (Hom. v. in Mabillon, Iter Ital. ii. 18), who dwells on the injustice occasioned by the gifts given by the rich to persons in power, such as the poor could not emulate. The giving of New Year's gifts had become, he intimates, an onerous system of bribery and corruption.

Jerome (in Ephes. vi. 4) notices the practice of schoolboys giving strenae to their masters, and begs bishops and priests not to send their children to pagan schools, lest the revenues of the church should be offered to heathen teachers, and so perhaps ultimately aid in heathen worship or licentiousness. NICAËA, COUNCILS OF (NICAËNA CONCILIA). There were two councils held at Nicaea, the metropolis of Bithynia, both general; the first and the last to be received as general by the Eastern and Western churches alike; the first under Constantine I., and the second under Constantine VI. (1.) The first met A.D. 325, in the consulship of Paulinus and Julianus, so far all are agreed, and there was a law published by Constantine, dated Nicaea, May 23 (x. Kal. Jun. in I. Cod. Theod. ii. 3, with Godfrey's note), shewing that he was there then. According to Socrates, who professes to have got his information from the chronological notices affixed to it in a work he calls the Synodicon of St. Athanasius, it met three days earlier, or May 20 (i. 13). It was going on when the emperor celebrated his 20th anniversary (July 25) according to Clinton, on which day he invited all the bishops present to a banquet, as we learn from Eusebius (Vit. Const. iii. 15). This covers the date prefixed to its creed in the acts of the fourth council; and it was closed some time subsequently to this—a note to the Cresconian collection says, just a month later, or August 25—by a speech from him (Ib. 21, comp. Pagi ad Baron., A.D. 325, n. 4). All the principal documents relating to it may be seen in Mansi's Concilia or Beveridge's Synodicon, vol. ii. in each case. Of authentic and contemporary documents relating to it, indeed, there are but few; of apocryphal, a bewildering host. As it was the first of its kind, we cannot be surprised that its acts were not written down at the time, as was afterwards customary. There was no book kept of the acts of the first or even of the second council, as there was from the third onwards. Only what was agreed upon in common, was committed to writing, and subscribed to by all, as Eusebius says (Vit. c. iii. 14). In this limited class were comprehended only the creed, canons, and synodical letter. As Valesius well observes, had anything more been extant, St. Athanasius would never have been at the pains of recalling so many particulars of what passed in reply to his friend, but would have told him simply where he could find them recorded. The 'Copies of the Nicene Council' (ῥα), transmitted A.D. 419 to the African church from Constantinople, contained no more than its creed and canons. Its synodical letter is extant in Socrates and Theodoret (i. 9), as are two letters issued by the emperor at its close. His circulars in convening it have not been preserved; but if we may trust to what Eusebius tells us of their substance (Vit. C. iii. 10; and Vales. ad l.), his own letter to Chrestus, bishop of Syracuse (E. H. x. 5) for assembling the council of Arles, may serve to illustrate their form. The letters of Eusebius to his own diocese, besides his life of the emperor, and of St. Athanasius to his friends and to the African bishops are first-class authorities also for what passed, as far as they go, though from opposite sides. What Socrates calls the 'Synodicon' of St. Athanasius is not now extant, and, being only mentioned and quoted by Socrates, cannot be placed on the same footing with his acknowledged works. For anything like certainty we must be content with what we can glean from these.

The emperor, Eusebius tells us, wrote flattering letters to the bishops everywhere, begging them to meet at Nicaea with all speed (Vit. C. iii. 6). St. Athanasius tells the Africans (l. 2) that bishops to the number of 318 came. The council has gone by the name of the 318 (τρῆς) Fathers ever since, though other accounts of its numbers had been current. It met in a church (οἶκος ἐκκλησίᾳ), one of the largest then known, and situated in the very midst of the palace (Vit. C. iii. 7 and 10), whither its members could adjourn easily, when the emperor desired their presence. A solitary plane-tree marks its site still; and within the village church of Is-nik is a rude picture commemorative of the event (Stanley's E. C. p. 121). But if we may trust the envoys of Gregory IX., they were received, A.D. 1233, in the actual church in which the event took place (Mansi, xxiii. 280 sq.). The causes which led to it were threefold; the heresy of Arius, the schism of Meletius, and the moot question of keeping Easter. The first of these was the newest and most absorbing of all; but who suggested the novel experiment of a general council for dealing with it? The council of Antioch, A.D. 272, at which its then bishop, Paul of Samosata, was deposed, had been the nearest approach to a general council in earlier times; and this had been preceded by a number of smaller meetings, as we learn from Eusebius (E. H. vii. 28), and so grew out of them in due course. But that of Nicaea, the same authority tells us (Vit. C. iii. 6), was the act of one man; and "God it was," says the emperor, "on whose suggestion I acted in summoning the bishops to meet in such numbers" (Soc. i. 9). It was "by the grace of God, and the piety of the emperor in assembling us out of different cities and provinces, that the great and holy synod came together," say they in recounting its issues (ib.). No two accounts of the same thing could be more consistent. Later writers insisted on supplementing them with a gloss of their own. Sulpitius Severus, indeed, argued from contemporary facts, when he talked of the council originating with Hosius of Cordova (ii. 40); the fathers of the sixth council argued from the usages of their own times simply, when they talked, in their prosphonic address, of its having been assembled by pope Silvester and Constantine. Silvester, of course, concurred in assembling it, so far that he sent representatives thither, being unable, through old age, to attend in person. They who "filled his place" were presbyters, according to the same authority; and they subscribed second. Hosius, designating himself merely bishop of Cordova, subscribed first. He subscribed first at Sardica similarly. No less a witness than St. Athanasius attests this last (Apol. c. Arian. 49 sq.); and the 'Prisca versio' makes him head its list of subscribers at both. He was revered on both sides even then; he was in the highest favour of any bishop at court now; he must have been the oldest bishop, by far, present at either, if, as St. Athanasius says, he was 100 years old, and had been bishop more than sixty years, A.D. 357, when his lapse took place. Hence, the order in which bishops should sit at general councils being as yet undetermined by rule, he who was the most ancient would be placed first, as Eusebius expressly says had been done by Palmas (E. H. v. 23), and was a custom in Africa much later (Can. Afric. 86; comp. St. Aug. Ep. lix.); add to which, that Hosius had been a confessor under Maximian, as he says himself. Persons talked of him, said the Arians—at least this is what St. Athanasius puts into their mouths—as one who presided at synods; whose letters were respected everywhere, who had formulated the Nicene Creed (Ep. ad Sol. § 43-5). Taking all these facts into consideration, it is difficult to conceive that Eusebius can mean any but Hosius when he tells us that the bishop who "sat first in the right row" delivered the opening speech (Vit. C. iii. 11); especially when it is remembered that Hosius had been the only bishop personally noticed by him in enumerating those present, only three chapters earlier, and also that the very next thing we are told, after this notice of him, is that the bishop of the reigning city was not present, but that his place was filled by his presbyters, who were the next to subscribe after Hosius. Again, there is proof positive from Eusebius of Hosius having acted for Constantine several times before (E. H. x. 6; Vit. C. ii. 63; comp. Soc. i. 7), but no contemporary proof whatever of his having ever acted for pope Silvester. If Eusebius had delivered the opening speech himself, he would not have left us to learn this from Sozomen, nor would Socrates have passed it over in silence. Theodoret led the way in attributing it to Eustathius of Antioch, which is not surprising in one who was both a native and a suffragan of that see. In later times, a speech was invented for Eustathius, on his authority, which is still extant.

Up to the last quarter of the 5th century—notwithstanding all that had been written on the council by St. Athanasius, and other fathers, by the one Latin and three Greek ecclesiastical historians who followed Eusebius, all also that had been cited from it by the councils of Ephesus, Chalcedon, and other places—not a word had been said, or a hint dropped, of Hosius having represented anybody there but himself. A.D. 476, or thereabouts, the statement that pope Silvester was represented there by him, as well as by his own true presbyters, was adventured on by Gelasius of Cyzicus, a writer of the poorest credit, who makes Constantinople the seat of empire when the council met, and Rufinus, the historian, one of those present; and to this statement bishop Hefele gravely calls upon us to assent still (Introd. pp. 36–41 and 46).

The emperor, we learn from Eusebius, on entering, took up a central position in front of the first row, and for a time remained standing with the rest, who rose to receive him; afterwards, a chair of gold having been placed before him, he seated himself, at the request of the bishops, when all sat down likewise. The opening speech made to him on their part has not been preserved; his answer has. It was a short exhortation to peace, delivered in Latin, and interpreted into Greek as he spoke. When he had finished, he let the “presidents of the council”—in other words, the bishops—speak. As there were multitudes present besides bishops, there can be no more doubt that this is what Eusebius means here by that phrase, than that bishops frequently went by that name. Endless discussions between them ensued, the emperor acting the part of moderator all through, conversing with them in Greek, to display his familiarity with their own language, though he had previously spoken in Latin, and getting them to be of one mind and opinion on all the disputed points at last. They gave due proof of this in their creed and canons—Eusebius tells the faithful of his diocese—and St. Athanasius vouches for his account (De Dec. Syn. Nic. § 3 and the P.S.) how the creed was formed. First, the creed of his own church of Caesarea, and, therefore, probably that of the church of Jerusalem also, which he had received from his predecessors, had been taught as a catechumen, had taught and professed himself ever since, was recited before the emperor, and found substantially correct; then, some additions to it having been agreed upon, it was published in the name of the council. Both forms are given; but as all creeds had been oral, and not written hitherto, we must not suppose that the original form had never varied or received additions before. Besides, being about to be committed to writing for the first time, and used as a public document from that time forth, the natural thing would be that it should be revised previously. The only question in revising it that seems to have created any difficulty, was the introduction of the word ‘Homousios,’ and this the emperor at length succeeded in getting accepted. No doubt it was on this point that Hosius and Eusebius measured influences with him, and the former prevailed, which no one else could have done, though the latter was too politic to resent his defeat. The emperor, he tells his people, put a sense on this word which he could admit; and it was, no doubt, for having got this word inserted, that St. Athanasius credits his rival with having formulated the creed itself. The new and the old creed agreed in this: that they commenced “We (not I) believe,” and ended with a simple profession of belief in the Holy Ghost. To this, in the new one, was subjoined an anathema; but, instead of being commensurate with the creed, it was confined, as all subsequent anathemas of general councils were, to the maintainers of the particular heresy then condemned, in this case the Arian. All the bishops present subscribed to the new formula, says Socrates, except five; says Theodoret, except two; and these falling under the anathema subjoined to it, and refusing to condemn Arius, shared his exile, decreed by the emperor. The names of those who subscribed are not extant in Greek, except in the short list of Gelasius (Mansi, ii. 927), which is purely fictitious. No more than 228 names are preserved in any of the Latin lists, which also have an artificial appearance, being grouped in provinces, a classification which is at variance with all the Greek lists of every general council extant, whatever cardinal Pitra (Spic. Sol. i. 511) or bishop Hefele (p. 296) may say. The leading bishops known from other sources to have been present were Hosius of Cordova, Alexander of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, Alexander of Constantinople, Macarius of Jerusalem, Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Eusebius of Caesarea, the historian; St. Athanasius, though one of the foremost there, was a deacon only then.

After the creed had been agreed upon, twenty canons on discipline were passed. Of their number there can be no dispute, founded, at least, on any document that is both ancient and authentic. The pretended letter of St. Athanasius to pope Mark, and the pretended eighty or eighty-four canons in Arabic, therefore, proclaim their fictitious character. But we must not conclude from the mere existence of the latter, and without further proof, with bishop Hefele, that the “Greek church” ever attributed “more than twenty canons” to this council, still less ever quoted other canons as Nicene, “by mistake,” which were not Nicene, as popes Zosimus, Innocent, and Leo did (ib. 360–372).

The canon meriting attention most is the sixth, being the principal of those framed with reference to Meletius, whose case, the bishops in their synodical letter may be supposed to say, engaged them next after Arius. Meletius had ordained priests and deacons in dioceses outside his own, and consecrated bishops at his sole discretion (Hefele, § 40). The council deprived him of all power in consequence, but dealt more leniently with his followers; and to prevent any similar irregularities in future, passed its fourth, fifth, and sixth canons. Of these, the fourth orders that the consecration of a bishop should, in general, be the act of all (the bishops) of the province (in which the vacant see was situate); or, if that could not be, that the absent (bishops) should express their assent in writing, and three (bishops), not of the province necessarily, come together in every case to lay hands on him; yet so that the ratification of all that took place should, in every province, be given to the metropolitan. In other words, so long as the bishops of the province were consenting parties, the consecrators no fewer than three, and the metropolitan confirmed their act, it was not indispensable that the consecrators, when circumstances would have made this inconvenient, should be of the same province. Such, at least, was the interpretation put upon it by the fathers of the second general council (Theodoret, E. H. v. 9, near the end). This canon, again, it will be seen at a glance, must refer to the same act throughout; that one act, namely, which bishops alone, who are the only persons mentioned here, could perform. Consequently, the interpretation given to it by the fathers of the second Nicene council, in their third canon, is irrelevant, and need not be noticed, except so far as this—viz. that the provincial bishops in consecrating a new bishop, confirmed his election, and their metropolitan, in approving of his consecration, confirmed both. But this is the only reference to his election which this canon contains. The fifth canon, similarly concerns another episcopal act relevant to this case. Meletius having been for his offences excommunicated by the bishops of his province, it is ordered that the canon interdicting any that have been excommunicated by some from being received by others (Can. Apost. 10), should rule cases of this kind; but that enquiry might always be made whether any persons had been excommunicated unfairly by their bishop, synods of all the bishops in each province are directed to be held twice a year, in the spring and autumn, for that purpose. The sixth canon is not merely concerned with episcopal acts alone, but with episcopal acts only between bishops and their metropolitan, in other words, with episcopal jurisdiction. Had it, therefore, been always designated by its proper title “bishops and their metropolitans”—the only persons named in it, and the latter the highest dignitaries known to the church as yet—its meaning would have remained clear. As it is, few subjects have provoked a wider or a wilder literature. Moreover, the first half of the canon enacts merely that what had long been customary with respect to such persons in every province, should become law, beginning with the province where this principle had been infringed; while the second half declares what was in future to be received as law on two points, which custom had not as yet expressly ruled. “This is plain to all, that if any become bishop without consent of his metropolitan, the great synod has defined that he ought not to be bishop. But should two or three, from simple contentiousness, oppose what has been agreed upon in common by all, and is in accordance with ecclesiastical law, and reasonable, let the vote of the majority prevail,” that is, become law. Nobody disputes the meaning of this last half; nor, in fact, would the meaning of the first half have been questioned, had it not included Rome. “Let ancient customs prevail”—or become law—in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis—provinces then subject to the Augustal prefect, and in which Meletius had been creating disturbances—“so that the bishop of Alexandria should have the power (which he has by custom) over all these . . . and in like manner at Antioch, and in all other provinces, let the churches be maintained in their privileges.” Nobody can dispute the meaning of this either, as it stands. Nobody can maintain that the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria were called patriarchs then, or that the jurisdiction they had then was co-extensive with what they had afterwards, when they were so called. “Since this is usual also for the bishop in the (capital) city, Rome.” It is on this clause, standing parenthetically between what is decreed for the particular cases of Egypt and Antioch, and in consequence of the interpretation given to it by Rufinus, more particularly, that so much strife has been raised. Rufinus may rank low as a translator, yet, being a native of Aquileia, he cannot have been ignorant of Roman ways, nor, on the other hand, had he greatly misrepresented them, would his version have waited till the seventeenth century to be impeached. What is called the “Prisca versio Latina” cannot dispute, though it tries to disarm his paraphrase by a gloss of its own, his being “Ut apud Alexandriam et in urbe Roma vetusta consuetudo servetur, ut vel ille Aegypti, vel hic suburbicariarum ecclesiarum sollicitudinem gerat,” that of the “Prisca versio,” which is undoubtedly the later of the two, by some fifty years according to Gieseler, § 91: “Antiqui moris est, ut urbis Romae episcopus habeat principatum, et suburbicaria loca, et omnem provinciam suam (al. sua) sollicitudine gubernet.” Moreover, the title given to it in this version runs as follows: “De primatu ecclesiae Romanae vel aliarum civitatum episcopis.” “Suburbicary churches” were the churches of the suburban or “suburbicary places,” or “regions,” over which the jurisdiction of the city praefect extended (Cave, Ch. Govt. iii. 2–3), embracing a circuit in every direction to the hundredth milestone. The bishop of Rome, therefore, stood at the head of the bishops of those churches in heathen times, and before the regular institution of metropolitans. This was one fact; afterwards it was a fact no less, that his jurisdiction became commensurate with that of the city vicar, and was spread over ten provinces: 1. Campania; 2. Tuscany, with Umbria; 3. Picenum; 4. Sicily; 5. Calabria, with Apulia; 6. Lucania, with the Bruttians; 7. Samnium; 8. Sardinia; 9. Corsica; 10. Valeria. These ten provinces the “Prisca versio” calls “omnem provinciam suam,” which, accordingly, went no farther northwards than the gulf of Spezzia on the west coast, and the mouth of the Rubicon on the east, leaving the sees of Aquileia, Milan, and Ravenna, similar centres in their own neighbourhood of the seven northern provinces to which the jurisdiction of the vicar of Italy was then confined (Panciroli, Notit. Dign. ii. 2). The composition of the Roman synod at one time bore testimony to its original, at another to its extended limits; and now and then its dimensions were enlarged exceptionally, as will be pointed out under that head. [POPE; ROME, COUNCILS OF.]

The remaining canons need not occupy much space. Canons eight to fifteen relate to the lapsed principally—those that had concealed or abjured their faith to escape persecution. The Novatians, or Puritans, as they styled themselves, had incurred censure for refusing to communicate with those who had been twice married and also with the lapsed, even after they had performed their penance. The manner of restoring all such was now settled; but the ordination of any whose crimes should have debarred them from the priesthood was declared invalid. To the dying, indeed, according to the old rule of the church, the Eucharist, or "last and most necessary viaticum," is not to be denied under any circumstances; but they are not to take rank with communicants proper should they recover. By the sixteenth, translations of the clergy from one diocese to another are forbidden. By the seventeenth, lenders on usury are to be struck off the rolls of the clergy. By the eighteenth, deacons are forbidden to usurp any functions that belong to priests, especially that of giving the Eucharist. By the nineteenth, it is decreed that all the clerical followers of Paul of Samosata, deaconesses included, must be re-baptized before they can be re-ordained. Deaconesses indeed, never having received imposition of hands, can only be treated as lay personages. That this is the true meaning of the phrase ὅπως ἐκτίθεται, viz. 'a decree has now been made,' is clear from the application of the words ὅπως, in canon seventeen, and ὅπως, in canon six. It has been a pure mistake, therefore, which bishop Hefele blindly follows, to understand it of some canon previously passed, whether at Arles or elsewhere. In the 'Prisca Versio' this enactment about deaconesses is reckoned a separate canon, making twenty-one in all. By the twentieth, all are directed to pray standing on Sundays, and the whole time between Easter and Pentecost.

The three first canons, having nothing to do with the causes which led to the council, may be considered here more conveniently than where they stand. The first decrees that such as have made themselves eunuchs may not be ordained, or, if ordained, must resign their post. The second that none should be raised to the office of priest or bishop, who had not been long baptized, or after full instruction; and even after ordination, should any crime be proved against a person, he must forfeit his place among the clergy. By the third, no bishop, priest or deacon, or clerk of any sort, may have living with him—συνεῖσατον—as an inmate of his house, any woman less nearly related to him than a mother, sister, or aunt; or, in any case, such persons as are quite beyond suspicion. It used to be maintained that clerical celibacy was imposed by this canon; and in the same breath, that the story told by Socrates and Sozomen of the venerable bishop Paphnutius was a fiction. In fact, the marked omission in this canon of all reference to the wife amongst the female relatives of the clergy, is explained at once by his protest against any separation of man and wife.

On the Easter question there was no canon passed, but only the understanding entered into, which the bishops in their synodical letter, and the emperor in his circular, record—viz. "that all the brethren in the East, who formerly celebrated Easter with the Jews, will henceforth keep it agreeably with the Romans and ourselves, and all who from ancient time have kept Easter as we" (Soc. i. 9). In other words, that they would all celebrate the festival of the resurrection of our Lord always on the first day of the week, though never on the 14th day of the month

Nisan, even when that day fell on a Sunday, but the Sunday after. [EASTER.]

The authority which this council obtained everywhere gave rise to continual tamperings with its decrees, or with its history from interested motives. Nine-tenths of such tamperings, at least, have been in the Latin interest; and if their origin cannot be brought home positively to the popes themselves, it cannot be denied that they have been foremost in using them. The interpolation of the sixth canon, as has been said, began with the legates of the first Leo. He himself originated another gloss upon it—viz. that it decided that of the three sees mentioned in it Rome had the first place, Alexandria the second, and Antioch the third. The Sardican canons were first cited as Nicene by popes Zosimus, Innocent, and the same Leo. The preface to the Nicene council in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection was penned in their interest. The seventy-first of the Arabian canons, according to one version of them (Mansi, ii. 1005), was framed in their interest. Pope Silvester, of course, learnt from his presbyters all to which his assent had been given through them, and received from them a copy of the synodical letter addressed to the church of Alexandria, for whose special benefit the council had met. But the council addressed no letter to him, nor received any letter from him in particular. Later ages invented three such letters, in which his confirmation of the acts of the council is asked and imparted, and they are still extant (ib. 719–22). As if this was not enough, a third Roman synod, in addition to a first and second, of still more ambitious purpose (ib. 551 and 615–32) was feigned to have been held, in which he anathematized all who dared to contravene the Nicene definition (ib. 1081). Pope Adrian I. is the first who quotes or refers to these documents. One more point may be mentioned, in conclusion, as having an interest for English readers—viz. that probably the earliest MS. of its kind extant ("cui nullum aliud simile invenire uspiam licuit," say the Ballerini themselves of it) is one preserved in the Bodleian archives (Justellus, 100–2), being a fine and nearly complete transcript of the old Latin, or pre-Dionysian, version of the Nicene and other canons, in three parts. It may be seen printed, but unfaithfully printed, in the Bibl. Jur. Can. Vet. i. 277 sq., by Voel and H. Justellus, or reprinted by the Ballerini, in their edition of St. Leo, iii. 478–563.

That this version was the 'Prisca translatio,' which, Dionysius Exiguus tells us, he had been asked to improve upon, is clear enough from internal evidence; and has long been accepted as such by the learned. But, according to Dr. Maassen (Can. Recht, § 8–11) this was by no means the earliest version of the Nicene decrees then extant in Latin: as he assumes there were Latin translations of them sent by St. Cyril of Alexandria and Atticus of Constantinople respectively to the African bishops in the 5th century, when appeals were being argued between them and Rome, and that even a contemporary translation of them was brought home by Cæcilian, bishop of Carthage, from the Nicene council. It is true that we have Latin versions of them given in the Isidorian collection, and several MSS. of uncertain date, which are so headed: but even so, the statements made respecting them are vague and conflicting: and it might be shewn on similar evidence, that a Latin translation of these canons was supplied by the Nicene Fathers to Pope Silvester himself. Again, how comes it, if so many cut and dried versions of the Nicene canons were thus early made, that not one is ever cited at length, either in these versions or any other, by members of the African or of the Roman Church, or by any Western synod, in pre-Dionysian times: to say nothing of these versions being unknown to Dionysius himself, by whom the African code was first brought into notice? The fact is, Dionysius is an inconvenient authority for modern theories respecting the Sardinian canons, which the Popes endeavoured to pass as Nicene, till the appearance of his collection, as will be shewn further on. [SARDICIA, COUNCIL OF; comp. DICT. CHRIST. BIOG. art. 'Dionysius Exiguus.'] [E. S. Ff.]

NICAËA (2) the 2nd council of, the 7th and last general; being the last to be received as such finally by the Western churches in communion with Rome, and the Eastern churches in communion with Constantinople; as well as the only general council which has at times been condemned by both, exclusive of Rome. (Palmer, On the Church, iv. 10. 4.) Met in the 8th year of the empress Irene and her son Constantine, A.D. 787. It contrasts with the first council in that its acts are extant and fill a volume, to say nothing of their having been translated by Anastasius, the Roman librarian, and dedicated by him in a preface of singular interest to pope John VIII.; while those of the first were not even committed to writing.

To understand its decrees, some previous phases of the contest about images must be recalled. The emperor Leo III., surnamed the Isaurian, had taken a violent part against images and their defenders, which had been bitterly resented in his own capital, and still more by pope Gregory II., who challenged him in two fiery letters to attempt similar measures in Italy. The emperor replied by confiscating all the papal domains in Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily. His son and grandson following in his steps retained them. But his great-grandson was a minor, in dependence upon his mother, and she, yielding to the instances of the retiring patriarch Paul, and of the new patriarch Tarasius, took steps for reversing all that had been decreed against images in a council held under his grandfather Constantine, surnamed Copronymus, A.D. 754, and which then passed for the 7th council. She wrote, therefore, to pope Adrian I. in their joint names A.D. 784, inviting him to a council which she proposed assembling at Constantinople for that purpose; but her letter remained unanswered for two years. At length, A.D. 786, two presbyters arrived from Rome to be present at it on behalf of the pope. Even then, the council had no sooner met than it had to be closed on account of the disturbances to which it gave rise. The year following it was transferred to Nicaea, where its proceedings occupied no more than a month, as has been said. According to the lists given in Mansi, 260 bishops or their representatives attended its first action or session, and 310 subscribed to what was defined at its 7th and last. The first place was assigned to the legates of the pope, though presbyters. Tarasius, who had just been appointed patriarch, while yet a layman, by the civil power, sat second, and was the chief speaker throughout. Two presbyters, representing the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, who were kept away by the Saracens, sat next. The see of Jerusalem, being vacant, was not represented. The rest, with very few exceptions—and none farther west than Italy—came from the east. At the request of the bishops of Sicily, Tarasius opened proceedings in a short speech. The imperial letter, or Sacra, was then read, in which reference was made to his consecration, to the petition that had been made by him for a council, and to the steps which had been taken for assembling this. Lastly, several bishops who had attended the iconoclastic council under Copronymus, or been consecrated by those that had, on confessing their errors, and professing the faith of the six previous councils, were received.

At the second action, two letters from pope Adrian were read; one to the empress and her son, the other to Tarasius. The first begins with a faltering reference to the exaltation of the Roman see by the first emperor Constantine and his mother, together with his recovery from leprosy through pope Silvester, whose acts are then quoted in favour of images, supplemented by other authorities. Afterwards, if Anastasius, or rather the anonymous somebody who professes to record his words, is to be trusted, the pope commented on the consecration of Tarasius, and on his being styled oecumenical patriarch in passages which the Greeks suppressed, and concluded by protesting against the detention of his rights and patrimony, contrasting with it all the provinces and cities and provinces which he had just received in perpetuity from Charlemagne, besides what he had regained through him from the Lombards. But all this is suspicious, being only preserved in a Latin version, and in any case should be compared with a letter written to Charlemagne by the same pope nine years before (Cod. Carol. Ep. lx.), for the marked abstention from any reference to the contents of the papal archives in one, and the palmary reference to the donation of Constantine preserved there in the other. Even if genuine, the Greeks might well have suppressed this passage, no general council having ever been asked before to occupy itself with such subjects. The letter to Tarasius is said to have been similarly mutilated; but in this case the Latin version contains nothing of any sort which is not found in the Greek. The pope merely speaks in it of the synodical epistle received from Tarasius announcing his election and containing his profession. As this last was in entire harmony with the faith of the six previous councils, and had taken the right view of images, he would not insist on the twofold blots of his election—at least, if the patriarch will engage to do three things: (1) to get the pseudo-synod against images condemned; (2) to seek union with the Roman see to that extent as to make profession of his devotion to it as head of all the churches of God; (3) to get images restored by an imperial edict to their accustomed places in all the churches of the capital and throughout the East, conformably with the tradition of the Roman church. Both letters were accepted enthusiastically by the council, and the bishops, in subscribing to them, declared them a standard of orthodoxy for what they contained.

In the third action, Gregory, bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, recanted his former opinions, and was received. Then a copy of the synodical letter sent by Tarasius to his brother patriarchs having been read out, it was pronounced identical with what had been sent to the pope, whose answer to it they had just heard and accepted accordingly. Two points in it deserve some notice—1. It asserted procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, through or by the Son. 2. It anathematised pope Honorius with other monothelite leaders by name, and their dogmas, as well as their followers. The reply to this letter from the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, and with it the synodical letter they had themselves received from the late patriarch of Jerusalem, on his election, followed. In the latter of these the Holy Ghost is said to proceed eternally from the Father: the teaching of the six previous councils is epitomised and professed: while pope Honorius is distinctly said to have been anathematised by the sixth. Both letters were declared in accordance with the profession of Tarasius, and subscribed to by all.

With the fourth action commenced the real work of the council. Passages from the Old and New Testament were read out favourable to visible representations of things absent or unseen. Passages from the fathers, mentioning images or pictures with approval followed. Several of these passages, indeed, were drawn from works of no credit; some from confessedly spurious works, as Cave points out (i. 650) forcibly. Still, the eighty-second Trullan canon, which they considered oecumenical, alone covers their decision in principle; and this again had been acted upon in the preceding century, when a picture of our Lord was borne before the apostle of England, as he entered Canterbury. Art, in general, might have been lost to the church had they decided otherwise. Finally, where they state their inferences (Mansi, xiii. 131) and say that they "honour such representations of holy persons and holy things, as leading to the perpetual remembrance of their prototypes," they assert nothing irrational; and even when they add, "as likewise making us sharers of their holiness," they may mean no more than "as exciting people to endeavour to be as good as they were."

The fifth action was occupied with details in the proceedings of the council against images under Copronymus, A.D. 754. First, the worthlessness of its authorities was exposed, and counter-authorities cited in condemnation of them. Next, volumes from which passages in favour of images had been torn out were displayed. Lastly, the reaction against images was traced back to the Saracens. At the 6th action, the refutation of the same council assumed a more formal shape. It was subdivided into six tomes or parts so arranged that in each of them Gregory, bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, one of the recanting prelates, reads out portions of the acts of the pseudo-synod, and one of the deacons of the church of Constantinople their refutation.

The council met for its seventh action on
CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

Oct. 13, when Theodore, bishop of Taormina in Sicily, read out its definition. This, after a short preface, commenced with the creed, in the Constantinopolitan form only, and without the canon enforcing its exclusive use, which we find appended to it at the fourth, fifth, and sixth councils. Long afterwards it was pretended on the Latin side that the insertion of the "Filioque" was decreed at this council; the very thing it was blamed by the council of Frankfort for not having done. Next, it anathematised all the heretics by name, whom the six previous councils had condemned, including pope Honorius. Next, it declared for preserving all ecclesiastical traditions intact, one of which was the employment of symbolical representations. And thereupon it decreed, lastly, that images of our Lord, His mother and His saints, in colours, mosaic, or other material, might, like the cross, be freely placed on church walls and in tablets; on vessels and vestments used at divine service; in private houses or by the roadside, and have candles or incense burnt, according to custom before them, and be kissed and saluted with all reverence, saving only the worship (latria) which is due to God alone, deposing all bishops and clergy, and excommunicating all monks and laymen who maintained the contrary. [IMAGES.]

This, followed by corresponding acclamations and anathemas, a joint letter to the empress and her son from Tarasius and the assembled bishops, and a synodical letter to the faithful, terminated the more formal work of the council. Its members met for a supplemental or eighth session at the palace called Magnaura in the capital, Oct. 23, when the definition was again read out, this time in the hearing of the empress and her son, who were present, and twenty-two canons passed. Of these the first insists on the observance of the canons by all, but seems to point rather to dogma than discipline. If it is held to confirm all the canons of the six previous councils, it must, of course, be understood to confirm the Trullan or Quini-sexth canons. The second ordains that no bishop shall be consecrated who has not a thorough knowledge of the Psalter, the canons, and Holy Scripture in general. The third declares all appointments of bishops by the civil power void, as being contrary to the canons. Thus Tarasius effectually barred his own case from becoming a precedent. The fourth and fifth are strong against simony. The sixth renews the rule that a provincial synod shall be held at least once a year. The seventh ordains that any bishop consecrating a church in future without relics of the saints shall be deposed. The eighth decrees against receiving any Jews who are not sincere converts. The ninth orders that all books against images should be brought to the residence of the patriarch at Constantinople, and there stowed away with all other heretical works. Any bishop, priest, or deacon concealing such books is to be deposed, and any monk or layman anathematised. The remaining thirteen, being of less consequence, may be passed over.

Anastasius is allowed to have translated these canons, whether he translated the proceedings of the eighth session or not, which some deny. The Latin version, which used to be thought anterior to his, omits them certainly. But if the titles given at the end of his preface are his, it is plain that he looked upon the eighth session as one with the seventh, and such is, apparently, the view which Theophanes, who was present, takes of it in his Chronographia. The other pieces in connection with it, also given in Latin and Greek, are: 1. A complimentary speech addressed to the council by Epiphanius, deacon of the church of Catania, in Sicily. 2. A letter from Tarasius to pope Adrian, tersely describing the council, which "by placing a copy of the Gospels in its midst, constituted Christ its head, and by causing the letters of the pope to be read first in order, constituted him its eye." 3. A second, and still more remarkable letter from the same to the same, bristles with denunciations from Scripture, the canons, and the fathers, against simony, thus not merely throwing light upon the fourth and fifth canons passed at this council, but suggesting that they may have been as much needed just now for the West as the East. 4. A letter from the same to an anchorite dignitary, named John, announcing and expounding to him the decrees of the Council. The latter standing last in Mansi, which purports to have been addressed to the church of Alexandria by this council, was probably written to bring about its commemoration in a later age. It now stands for commemoration in the Greek Menology on Oct. 12, and is there said to have been attended by 367 fathers. For the letter written in defence of it by pope Adrian to Charlemagne, which Mansi prints last but one, see 'Council of Frankfort.' (Mansi, xii. 951 ad. f. and xiii. 1-820; Beveridge, Synod II. 165-9; Hefele, III. 410-57.)

NICE, martyr, A.D. 303; commemorated by the Greeks Ap. 25. (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. iii. 361.) [C. H.]

NICE (Níken), a town so called in Thrace not far from Adrianople, where the Arians held a council, A.D. 359, Oct. 10, on their way home from Rimini, to publish the creed brought thither by Valens, in order that from the name which it would thus get it might be confounded with the Nicene. (Soc. ii. 37.) Instead of which it was condemned in the West, as soon as known. It betrayed its character by condemning the use of the word 'Homousios'; besides which it contained "the descent into hell," which had not as yet appeared in any church creed. It is extant in Theodore (H. E. ii. 21), and was repeated almost word for word at Constantinople the year following (Soc. ii. 41.) St. Hilary (Fragm. viii.) gives the fullest account of what took place. The sentence passed on Valens and Ursacius at Rimini was rescinded at the same time. (Mansi, iii. 309-314.) [E. S. Ff.]

NILUS (1) Martyr, with Peleus and Helias; commemorated Sept. 19 (Basil. Menol.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.); named in Hieron. Mart. on this day with Capileus and others.

(2) "Our father;" commemorated Nov. 12 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

NIMBUS (IN CHRISTIAN ART), a disc or plate, commonly golden, sometimes red, blue, or green, or banded like a rainbow, placed vertically behind the heads of persons of special dignity or sanctity as a symbol of honour. This disc is sometimes reduced to a mere ring, single or double, showing the background through. It is, as a rule, perfectly plain, except in the case of our Saviour, whose nimbus is commonly distinguished by a cross. The cross is sometimes, but rarely, depicted immediately above the Sacred Head, either just without or just within the circumference of the disc (as in the mosaics of the arch of the tribune at St. Maria Maggiore), but it is almost universally inscribed within the circle. After the eighth century living persons were, in Italy, distinguished by a square nimbus, which sometimes assumed the form of a scroll, partly unrolled.

The nimbus is undoubtedly of ethnic origin. It is the visible expression in art of the luminous nebula supposed to emanate from and to clothe a Divine Being. It originally invested the whole body. Thus Virgil describes Juno as "nimbo succincta" (Aen. x. 634). By degrees, however, it was restricted to the head, which was naturally regarded as the chief seat of this divine radiance. The heads of the statues of the gods (Lucian, de Dea Syr. 675; Timon, c. 51, 154), and of the emperors, after they began to claim divine honours, were decorated with a crown of rays, or brilliant circlet. Servius (ad Aen. ii. 615) defines the nimbus with which Pallas was distinguished at the destruction of Troy, as "fulgidum lumen, quo deorum capita cinguntur: sic enim pingi solent;" and again (ibid. iii. 587), "proprie nimbus est qui deorum vel imperantium capita quasi clara nebula ambire fingitur." We also find in the 'Panegyricus Maximiani,' which passes under the name of Mamertinus, "lux divinum verticem claro orbe complectens," associated with the trabee and the fasces and the curule chair as symbols of imperial dignity. From the resemblance of the nimbus as commonly depicted to a circular plate of metal, it has been derived by some from the μνίσκος of the Greeks, a metal disk placed above the heads of statues to prevent birds from settling on them, and polluting them (cf. interpr. ad Aristoph. Aves, v. 1114); but though similar in form and position the connection is probably only apparent, not real (Ciampini Vet. Mon. i. 112). Buonarruoti (Osservaz. p. 60) is of opinion that the nimbus was borrowed from the Egyptians, which is also the view of Pignorius (Ciampini, u. s. i. 112). Others hold that it was of Etruscan origin, and others again derive it from India, where it was certainly used to encircle the deities of the Hindu mythology (Didron, Iconogr. Chrét. pp. 43, 136); but from whatever quarter it was derived, the nimbus was regarded in the early ages of Christianity as a mere symbol of honour and dignity, and was not at all associated with divinity or special sanctity. In the East especially it was considered as an attribute of mere power, whether good or evil, and was used much more prodigally than in the West. Thus we find it assigned in Byzantine art to Satan (Didron, p. 163, fig. 46), and to the beast in the Apocalypse (ib. p. 165, fig. 47). In the West it may be seen encircling the bust of the emperor Claudius (Montfaucon, Antiquité expliquée, v. 162); the head of Trajan, and several medallions on the arch of Constantine, and of Antoninus Pius on the reverse of one of his medals (Oisell. Thes. Numism. tab. lxvii. 1). Herod is distinguished by the nimbus in the mosaics of St. Mary Major's at Rome, as are Justinian and Theodora in those of St. Vitalis, and Constantine Pogonatus, Heraclius and Tiberius at St. Apollinaris in Classe, and Justinian at St. Apollinaris in Urbe, at Ravenna; and Constantine and Charles the Great in those of the Lateran Triclinium (Agincourt, Peinture, xvi. 18). On medals the nimbus is frequently found surrounding the heads of the Christian emperors. We may instance Constantine the Great on the reverse of a great bronze of Crispus (Sanclemente, Numm. Select. iii. p. 182, fig. 1), the obverse of a gold coin of Constantine (Morelli, Nov. Spec. tab. vii. No. 1); and one of Fausta (Ibid. tab. iv. No. 4); Cavedoni, Ricerche, p. 53). Constans, Constantius and the later emperors are similarly distinguished. On the great shield of Theodosius he and his two sons have the nimbus. (Buonarruoti, Osservazioni, pp. 60 sq.). A silver shield discovered in the ancient bed of the Arve, near Geneva in 1721, figured by Montfaucon (Antiq. Expliq. xiv. p. xxviii. p. 51), representing Valentinian making gifts to his soldiers after a victory, shews the emperor with his head surrounded by a plain nimbus. The statues of the Merovingian kings which formerly decorated the chief portal of the abbey of St. Germain des Prés at Paris are also described as having their heads surmounted with this symbol of royal dignity (Mabillon, Annal. Ord. Bened. ann. 557, tom. i. p. 169).

In illuminated MSS. after the sixth century, the secular use of the nimbus is very frequent. It does not appear in a MS. of Genesis of the fourth or fifth century, in the Library at Vienna (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xix.); but Priam and Cassandra have it in the Vatican Virgil (Ciampini, u. s. 1, tab. xxxvi. 16, 17), and in a MS. of the book of Joshua of the seventh or eighth century from the same collection (No. 405), Joshua himself, as well as the cities of Jericho, Gibeon, &c., represented as females, is thus decorated. In the Alexandrine MS. and in a MS. Bible of St. Paul's at Rome, of the 8th or 9th century (Agincourt, Peinture, xxviii.-xxx.), not only sacred and quasi-sacred personages, e.g. Moses, Joshua, Eli, Samuel, Balaam, &c., but kings, such as Pharaoh and Ahab, bear it (Buonarruoti, u. s. p. 62). The case is the same in the Menologium of Basil of the tenth century, where the nimbus is given without distinction to the saints, and to the emperors, to Herod and other poten-tates. Medea is nimbed on a patera mentioned by Muratori (ii. 21), and Circe in a fresco at Herculanum, described by Didron (p. 150). The annexed woodcut of a nimbed head of Mercury, from a fragment of a bas-relief given by Montfaucon (u. s. i. part. 2, pl. ccxiv.), representing the twelve signs of the Zodiac, and the twelve chief deities, the last all depicted with the nimbus.

Mercury with Circular Nimbus. (Didron.)

Familiar as the use of the nimbus was as a symbol of dignity or power, especially in the East, it was unknown as a distinctive mark of divinity or sanctity to the earlier ages of Christian art. As Didron remarks (Iconogr. Chrét. p. 100), "the most ancient monuments in France and Italy present divine and sacred personages without the nimbus." The first five centuries offer few, if any, genuine examples. Didron indeed asserts (ib. p. 101), that "before the sixth century the Christian nimbus is not to be seen on authentic monuments." It is of the extremest rarity on Christian sarcophagi, and in the frescoes of the catacombs, excepting those of later date, and such (unfortunately a numerous class), as have been subjected to modern restoration. As there is no class of christian monuments which have come down to us in such unaltered state, there is none whose authority is so weighty as the sarcophagi. From these the nimbus is almost universally totally absent. There is not a single example of this symbol on any of the sarcophagi engraved by Bosio and Aringhi, or in those of the Lateran Museum. Not only the angels and holy personages, but Christ Himself is devoid of it. It is equally absent from the sarcophagi of Arles, Saint Maximin, and Marseilles. At Ravenna, however, there are two sarcophagi, both of the seventh century, which present our Lord nimbed; that of the exarch Isaac at St. Vitalis, A.D. 644, representing the adoration of the Magi (Appell. Monuments of early Christian Art, p. 27, No. 9), and one in the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe, on which we see a youthful, beardless figure of Christ enthroned between the apostles. He has a plain nimbus, but they are without any (ibid. p. 28, No. 10).

The testimony of the glass vessels discovered in the catacombs, belonging probably to the fourth century, is equally decisive as to the late introduction of the nimbus. There are a few examples in Garrucci's great collection in which Christ is nimbed (Vetri Ornati, tav. viii. 7, tav. xvi. 5, tav. xvii. 6, tav. xxiii. 7), but in the vast majority of instances He is destitute of it. Buonarruoti gives a very curious glass (Osservaz. xvii. 1), on which St. Stephen is represented sitting listening to the teaching of Christ, also seated, neither of them wearing the nimbus; but between them is a small figure of Christ in the act of benediction, which is nimbed. The reason of the distinction between these two figures of our Lord is evidently that the one is intended for Christ as a Teacher on earth, the other shews Him as seen by St. Stephen in vision from heaven. Other saintly personages are still less frequently thus distinguished. The apostles St. Peter and St. Paul are constantly without it in Garrucci's collection, and only once with it (tav. xiv. 6), where the character of the art is late. Among the multitudinous glasses on which female figures are depicted, that inscribed "Mara," which may perhaps be intended for the Blessed Virgin, has it (tav. ix. 11), and St. Agnes is also once nimbed (tav. xxii. 3).

Turning to another department of Christian art, the nimbus is found on Christian ivories of the sixth and subsequent centuries. Martigny refers to a diptych of the sixth century, in the treasury of the cathedral of Milan, on which various scenes of the gospel history are carved, our Lord always wearing the nimbus. The same ornament is also given to the Holy Lamb, and to the evangelistic symbols. (Bugati, Memorie di San Celso, in fin.)

The same distinction holds good in the catacomb frescoes. The immense majority of them do not exhibit the nimbus, even in the case of our Lord and His apostles. When found, the character of the painting points to a date subsequent to the fifth century, often to a considerably later period. In some cases, where it does appear, it is certainly due to the modern restorations by which the value of the evidence of the catacomb pictures has been so seriously damaged. To instance some of the more remarkable examples. The beautiful youthful head of Christ from the cemetery of St. Callistus is destitute of the nimbus (Aringhi, i. 561; JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS OF, p. 875). The same is the case with all the figures in the fresco of Christ in the midst of His apostles with the scrinium before them (Aringhi, 529), and with the famous Virgin and Child from St. Agnes (ibid. ii. 208). [See MARY, VIRGIN, IN ART, p. 1150.] To discover a nimbed figure in the catacombs we must descend to a comparatively late date. It appears abundantly in the frescoes assigned to the second half of the ninth century which decorate the baptistry in the catacomb of St. Pontianus and the adjacent parts. In the fresco of the Baptism of Christ our Lord, the Baptist and the attendant angels have the entire nimbus (ibid. i. 381; DOVE, p. 576), which also encircles the heads of the saints Abdon and Sennen and their companions in the adjacent fresco, where Christ has the cruciform nimbus (see ABDON and SENNEN, p. 8; Aringhi, i. 383, 385). The fine head of Christ from the same catacomb (ibid. 379) is distinguished by a cruciform nimbus formed of pearls. A late fresco from St. Agnes shews us Christ seated between two apostles (Perret, tom. ii. pl. 4), and St. Peter between St. Praxedes and St. Pudentiana (ib. tom. iii. pl. xii.), and St. Pudentiana and her saints (ib. pl. xiii.) are similarly nimbed. Perret's plates present the Blessed Virgin twice with the nimbus (ibid. tom. iv. pl. xxi. 1, 17). No reliance can be placed on the appearance of the nimbus surrounding the head of our Lord in the famous early picture preserved in the Vatican Library, or in that in the Platonica beneath St. Sebastian. They are in both cases modern additions. This unauthorised tampering with early monuments is severely condemned by Perret (tom. vi. p. 32).

Turning to the mosaics we find the nimbus equally rare in all the earlier examples. Where it does appear in works before the sixth century, it may usually be considered an unauthorised addition ("On a tant retouché les mosaïques," Didron, p. 33, note 2). As a token of sanctity it is at first generally limited to our Lord, and, somewhat later, to His attendant angels, though it still continues to be given to kings as a mark of secular power. Our Lord wears the cruciform nimbus on the arch of St. Sabina in Rome, A.D. 424, and on that of St. Paul, A.D. 441, where the nimbus is surrounded with rays. In the important mosaic pictures which decorate the arch of the tribune of St. Mary Major's, A.D. 440, Christ and the attendant angels, and, as has been already remarked, King Herod, are the only figures that wear the nimbus. The Virgin Mary is always without it. In the Ravenna baptistery, A.D. 430, our Lord and perhaps the Baptist are alone furnished with the nimbus. The case is the same in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, A.D. 450. The vaulted ceilings of the chapels of the Lateran Baptistery, A.D. 462, exhibit the Holy Lamb with the cruciform nimbus.

In the earliest mosaic pictures of the next century at Rome, those of the church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, the only heads distinguished with the nimbus are those of Christ and the angels and the Holy Lamb. The church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, A.D. 547, shews the gradual extension of the employment of the nimbus. It is given not merely to our Lord (Whose nimbus is cruciform) and the angels, but also to St. Vitalis, and to the evangelists and prophets on the walls of the sacrum. Melchizedek as a priest wears the nimbus, but not Abel or Abraham. The nimbus surrounding the heads of Justinian and Theodora has already been noticed (see for these the article CROWN, vol. i. p. 306 b). In the Arian baptistery at Ravenna, where the mosaics are a close copy of those in the orthodox baptistery, the later date is indicated by the nimbus being assigned to the apostles, as well as to Christ. In St. Apollinaris in Urbe, A.D. 566, every individual of the long procession of male and female saints on either side of the nave is thus distinguished. From this time onwards the use of the nimbus for holy personages became universal, the only distinction being that the nimbus of Christ was usually cruciform, that of other individuals plain.

The result of our examination of dated examples is that, as Didron has laid down, the nimbus, however frequent previously as a token of dignity, does not appear as a Christian emblem before the sixth century. That during and after the sixth century the nimbus was gradually adopted as a mark of sanctity, though not by any invariable law. That the seventh and two succeeding centuries witnessed the transition from the complete absence to the constant presence of the nimbus, the same monument presenting personages sometimes with and sometimes without it. (Didron, Iconogr. Chrét. pp. 101-102.) We see also that (setting aside the secular use of the nimbus) the image of our Lord was the first to be thus distinguished; that those of the angels attending upon Him were the next in succession ("lumen quod circa angelorum capita pingitur nimbus vocatur," Isidor. Hispal. Orig. lib. xix. c. 31); and that these were followed by the evangelists and their symbolical animals, then by the apostles, and that ultimately, towards the end of the seventh or beginning of the eighth century, this honour was extended to all saints. No superior dignity in this respect was originally accorded to the Virgin Mary, nor does any definite rule seem to have been followed. She is not marked by the nimbus in the fifth-century mosaics at St. Mary Major's, nor commonly in the representations of the adoration of the Magi. On the tomb of the exarch Isaac at Ravenna, A.D. 644, she is unimbed, while the Holy Child has the nimbus, while in the mosaics of St. Apollinaris in Urbe of the preceding century, A.D. 566, both are thus distinguished. In the mosaics of the chapel of St. Venantius at the Lateran, A.D. 642, the Virgin as well as the sixteen apostles and saintly personages who stand on either side of her wear the nimbus. In some examples of Byzantine Art, however, the growth of the cultus of the Virgin is indicated by the nimbus being assigned to her while the apostles are without it. As examples of this distinction we may refer to the mosaic representing the Ascension on the cupola of St. Sophia at Salonica, of the 6th century; and an illumination of the same scene from the Zagba MS. of the Syrian Gospels in the Medicean Library at Florence, of which a cut is given, article ANGELS, I. 85. In early examples there was frequently no distinction between the nimbus of the Saviour and that of the angels and the others to whom it was assigned. In each case it was a simple disk, or a ring surrounding the head, allowing the ground to be seen through. Subsequently the Saviour was always distinguished by a cruciform nimbus, the field of the disk being divided into four quadrants by a cross, the sides of which are often concave. This cross, as well as the circumference of the disk, is not unfrequently formed of round beads or pearls, as in the annexed example from the catacomb of St. Pontianus. A further development was the inserting the letters A and Ω on the disk, with the addition sometimes of the Christian monogram. We give an example from the fifth-century mosaics of the chapel of St. Aquilinus, at Milan (No. 3). A later Greek development inscribed the three arms of the cross with the three letters forming δ ω ν (No. 4).

No. 4. Fresco; Thessaly; 14th cent. (From Didron.)

A nimbus of a triangular form, in allusion to the Trinity, was constantly given in later works of art to the Divine Being; this, however, is not found during the first ten centuries. In the mosaics of the cathedral of Capua, where the head of the Holy Dove is surrounded by a triangular nimbus, it is almost undoubtedly a modern alteration. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 168; Didron, p. 33, note 2.)

A nimbus of a square or rectangular shape, from the 9th century onwards, was the mark of a living person. Ciampini (u. s. ii. 14 b) expresses some doubts on this point, but the following passage from Paulus Diaconus in the life of St. Gregory is decisive, "circa verticem vero tabulae similitudinem, quod viventis insigne est, praefertentis, non coronam." (Div. Off. lib. i. c. 3). This, instead of a thin tablet, sometimes assumes the form of a block of very substantial thickness. As examples we may cite the head of pope John I., A.D. 705-708 (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvii. No. 6) and those of pope Paschal I., A.D. 807-824, on the mosaics of St. Maria in Dominica, and St. Praxedes. [See MOSAICS, fig. 14.] On the celebrated palliotto of the church of St.

Ambrose, archbishop Agilbert, the donor, is represented with the quadrangular nimbus, offering the altar to St. Ambrose, whose nimbus is circular. (Ferrario, Memorie di Sant' Ambrogio; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. xxvi. c. 15.) We find the square nimbus surrounding the heads of pope Leo III. and the emperors Charles the Great, and Constantine, in the mosaics of the Lateran Triclinium. Charles the Great also had a nimbus of the same form in a mosaic now destroyed at St. Susanna (Alemanni, de Lateransibus parietinis, p. 12; Didron, pp. 34-83). Didron asserts that the square nimbus is not found anywhere save in Italy, and expresses his regret at its absence, as depriving works of art of this evidence of their date. Another singular variety of the nimbus is that which presents it in the form of a scroll partially unrolled at either end. Examples of this remarkable configuration, which seems only to be found in MSS. or in painted glass, are given by Agincourt from a Latin Pontificale of the 9th century in the Library of the Minerva at Rome (Peinture, pl. xxxvii., xxxviii). In each of the twelve compartments depicting various episcopal acts the bishop is distinguished by a nimbus of this form. (See cut No. 5.)

No. 5. Nimbus. Latin MSS. 9th century. (From Didron.)

The nimbus is given not only to divine and sacred personages, but also to allegorical animals. We may instance the Holy Lamb in the two chapels of the Lateran Baptistery, the apse of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and the vaulted roof of St. Vitalis; the holy dove on the dossier of an episcopal throne (Bosio, p. 327); and the evangelistic symbols, as at St. Paul's and the chapel of St. John the Baptist at the Lateran. The phoenix, a favourite emblem of immortal life through death, has a stellate nimbus in the apses of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and those of St. Praxedes and St. Cecilia, and on a coin of Faustina (Ciampini, tab. xxxvi. fig. 14). De Rossi furnishes other examples (Rom. Sotter. ii. p. 313).

The aureole (aureola, the golden reward of special holiness) may be defined as the nimbus of the body, as the ordinary nimbus is that of the head. To adapt it to the shape of the body, the aureole is usually of an oval form, and often pointed at each end, of the shape known as the Vesica piscis. Its duration in Christian art was but brief. It appeared after the nimbus, and disappeared before it. A singular example is found in one of the wall mosaics of St. Mary Major's at Rome, where it assumes the character of a solid shield protecting the persons of Moses and Aaron from the stones hurled at them by the adherents of Korah and his companions. It is very often found encircling the form of the Deity, or of our Lord.

NORUNT FIDELES, or INITIATI, ἡσασιν οἱ μεμνημένοι, a formula of repeated recurrence in the writings of the Fathers to indicate the sacred mysteries of the faith which were not to be openly published before the uninitiated. The frequency of the phrase is a valuable evidence of the "reserve" in religious teaching practised by the early Church, which indicated a doctrine of the faith with sufficient clearness to be intelligible to their Christian hearers without exposing it to the irreverent handling of those who were not yet admitted within the Christian pale. Casaubon writes of it (Exercit. ad Baron. xvi. No. 43, p. 490): "Quis ita hospes in patrum lectione cui sit ignota formula in mentione sacramentorum potissimum usitata, ἵσασιν οἱ μεμνημένοι, norunt initiati?" It is of repeated occurrence in the writings of Chrysostom, and is found, though less often, in St. Augustine. (Cf. Chrysost. Homil. in Genes. xlix. 11; Ps. cxl.; Homil. in Matt. lxxii.; in Joann. xv. xlvii. lxxxv.)

Isidore Hispalensis (Etymol. i. 22) says that Ennius invented 1100 characters (notas) for the purpose of abbreviating, so that they could readily be recorded, that the system was improved and added to by others, and that Seneca extended the number of characters to 5000. Socrates (H. E. vi. 4) says that the sermons of St. Chrysostom were preserved by such shorthand writers (ὀξύγραφοι). Augustine (De Doct. Christ. ii. 26) says that those who have learned short-hand (notae) are called "notarii." Again (Epist. 21, Class. iii. Migne, Patrol.) he says that the notaries of the church take down what is said, so that neither his own speech nor the acclamations of the people were lost. He also (Epist. 172, Class. iii.) complains of a great dearth of notaries who could write the Latin language, and (Epist. 152) speaks of four notaries being appointed on either side, in one of his conferences with the Donatists.

In this capacity they were officially employed in courts of justice. Augustine (In Collat. Donat. die ii, c. 3) represents the Donatists as pleading that they were ignorant of short-hand writing—"notas ignorare"—and the president of the court commanding that what the official notaries had taken down should be read to them. Sometimes also they appear to have been sent in a judicial capacity to take evidence or make a report. Thus Augustine (Epist. 128, Class. iii.) calls one Marcellinus a tribune and notary, and (Epist. 134, Class. iii.) speaks of certain Donatist clergy and fanatics being brought to trial after an official report previously made (praemissa notaria). In the acts of the council of Chalcedon (Act 9) mention is made of one Damascius, tribune and notary.

And also in the councils of the church. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 4), in ordering the proceedings to be observed at councils, mentions, amongst other officials, the notaries, whose duty it was to take down the proceedings and read them aloud if required. Archbishop Theodore, in his account of the council at Hertford, A.D. 670 (Bede, H. E. iv. 5) says that the decisions of the councils were written down from his dictation by the notary Titillus. Eusebius (H. E. vii. 29) speaks of the ready-writers (ταχύγραφοι), who took down the controversy between Paul of Samosata, at the council of Antioch, A.D. 269, and Socrates (H. E. ii. 30) also mentions them as being present at the controversy between Basil and Photinus, at the council of Sirmium, A.D. 351.

II. But notaries were often simple secretaries. In this capacity they were attached to courts. Thus Socrates (H. E. vii. 23) says that John, who attempted to seize the empire after the death of Honorius, was previously the chief of the royal secretaries, πρωτοστάτης ὑπογραφῶν τῶν βασιλικῶν. Charles the Great (Capitul. i. c. 3) provided that every bishop and abbat should have his own notary. In the life of John Damascene, by John the patriarch of Jerusalem, it is said that some of the royal notaries (ὑπογραφῶν) were employed to forge the false accusation brought against him. Thus Proclus was notary (ὑπογράφους) to Atticus (Soc. H. E. vii. 41), and Athanasius to Alexander of Alexandria (Soz. H. E. ii. 17). Part of their duty appears to have been to act as readers to their masters, and they seem to have entered on their office at a very early age. Ennodius says that Epiphanius of Ticino became a lector at eight years of age, and from that time discharged also the duties of a notary till his 16th year (Vita Epiph. Ticin. Migne, Patrol. vol. 62, p. 208). Evodius, writing to Augustine (August. Epist. 158, Class. iii.), speaking of a youth whom he had employed as reader and notary, says that he was indefatigable in note-taking, and was accustomed to read to him even during the hours of the night, adding that so diligent and careful was he that he began to regard him rather as a familiar friend than as merely a youth and a notary. The notaries belonging to the see of Rome appear to have held a more important position, and to have been sent on important missions, sometimes with extensive powers entrusted to them. Instances of this will be found in the letters of Gregory the Great; thus (Epist. viii. 26, Migne, Patrol.) we find him sending Pantaleon, the notary, to Apulia to inquire into an accusation brought against a bishop of Sipontum, with power to inflict punishment in case the accusation was proved. The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (Praefat.), speaks of Juribius, a notary of the see of Rome, by whom Leo sent certain rescripts against the Priscillianists to the synod of Gallicia. Sometimes, too, they seemed to have signed the letters of the bishop of Rome (Greg. Mag. Epist. Appendix, Migne, Patrol. vol. 77, p. 11,345, § 1299).

III. In Rome were certain notaries called "notarii regionarii," to whom peculiar duties were allotted. Anastasius, the librarian (Vita S. Clementis) speaks of seven notaries appointed to the seven regiones, whose office it was to collect and register the deeds of the martyrs, and (Vit. S. Anteros) says that the acts of the martyrs were diligently collected by notaries. Again (Vita S. Fabiani) he says that the districts were divided among the deacons, and that seven sub-deacons were appointed to superintend the seven notaries, and (Vita S. Julii) that Julius I. ordered that the registers belonging to each church, "notitia quae pro fide ecclesiastica est," should be collected for safe custody by the notaries, and that all deeds and records should be in the custody of the chief "Primicerius" of the notaries. They also discharged certain functions in connexion with the services of the church. Gregory the Great (Liber Sacrament. § 70) speaks of the lighting of two candles held by two notaries. Messianus Presbyter (Vita Caesarii Arelat. ii. c. 2, § 18, Migne, Patrol. v. 67, p. 1034) says that it was the duty of the notary to precede the bishop, carrying his pastoral staff.

IV. They do not appear to have been reckoned among the clergy. Socrates (H. E. vii. 41) narrates that Atticus made Proclus his notary, and, after he had made great progress, promoted him to the diaconate. Gregory the Great (Epist. iii. 34) speaks of a subdeacon who could not keep his vow of continency and therefore retired from his monastery, gave up his office as subdeacon, and performed the duties of a notary for the rest of his life. But it was reckoned one of the steps to the clerical office. Gelasius (Decret. c. 2) says that a monk, who wished to enter holy orders, should serve for three months as a lector, or notary, or defensor, after that he might be made an acolyte. But they seem occasionally to have retained their title, and probably their office, after ordination. In the acts of the council of Antioch, read out at the council of Chalcedon (Act 14) mention is made of one Tarianus, deacon and notary. The chapter of Sozomen (H. E. iv. 3) which relates the martyrdom of Martyrius, the subdeacon, and Marcan, the lector, is headed 'The Martyrdom of the Notaries,' and Nicephorus (H. E. ix. 30) distinctly says that they were notaries of Paul, the bishop of Constantinople. It is alleged, on the authority of a letter of Julius, that Martyrius was a deacon (Vales, Not. in Soz., H. E. iv. 3; Thomassin, Ecclesiae Disciplina). [P. O.]

NOTHELMUS, archbishop of Canterbury; commemorated Oct. 17 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 117). [C. H.]

NOTITIA. The word notitia is technically used for a sort of list or court-almanac of places and officials, and the earliest and most famous notitiae are of a purely civil character. The most famous of all is, of course, the Notitia Dignitatum, compiled in the time of Arcadius or Honorius, circa 400 A.D. (see Gibbon, ii. 303, note 72. Pancirolus and Böcking), which is a complete list of the provinces with their subdivisions, and of the whole official staff of the empire. This has been edited by Pancirolus, whose work has, however, been quite superseded by the editions of Böcking (2 vols. Bonn, 1839–1853) and Seck (Berlin, 1876). This great notitia is of a purely civil character, and its interest for the student of Christian antiquities lies solely in its giving him a ready means of testing the closeness with which the local divisions and gradations of power in the church were modelled on those of the state. It is well known how the ecclesiastical archbishoprics and bishoprics followed the limits of the greater and lesser provincial governorships—the archbishop whose seat was at Narbonne for instance exercising spiritual jurisdiction exactly over the country which had formed the province of Gallia Narbonensis. [ORDERS, HOLY, III.] So towns in Asia Minor which had been metropoles in the old sense (for the civil sense of the word, cf. Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, i. 185) became metropoles in the new sense. Bingham has a lengthy discussion of this point. There is a good deal also to be gleaned from Marquardt's first volume; see especially pp. 216, 269. Boissière in his L'Afrique Romaine (Paris, 1878), p. 424, has some interesting remarks on the subject of the civil and ecclesiastical dioceses, from an unpublished lecture of Léon Renier. Besides the Notitia Dignitatum there is the important Notitia Provinciarum et Civitatum Galliae, compiled about the same time as the Notitia Dignitatum during the reign of Honorius (Marquardt, i. 129, note 3), or at all events some time between 386 and 450 A.D. (Brambach in Rheinisches Museum, xxiii. p. 262 sqq.; Riese, Geographi Latini Minores, p. xxxiii.). This notitia is also of a purely civil character. It is edited in Seck's edition of the Notitia Dignitatum, and in Riese's Geog. Lat. Min. (Heilbronn, 1878). The Notitia Urbis Constantinopolitanae, also edited by Seck and Riese, gives the positions of the fourteen ecclesiae in Constantinople, but is otherwise purely civil.

The earliest undoubted ecclesiastical notitia that we possess is that of Leo Sapiens, A.D. 891. But there can be little doubt that such notitiae existed at a much earlier date, and the Hieroclis Synedemus, or Hierocles' Travelling Companion, has distinct traces of an ecclesiastical character in it. This work was shewn by Wesseling to have been written before A.D. 535. The genitives of places which occur six times in the lists, and the genitive δημων which occurs nine times, look as if they should be preceded by the word ἐπίσκοπος, as in an ordinary notitia. This is further confirmed by the occurrence of the definite article in one instance, ὁ Τιμβριδων (Parthey, Hieroclis Synedemus et notitiae Graecae Episcopatum, Berlin, 1866, p. v. Hierocles is also edited in Fortia d'Urban's Recueil des Itinéraires Anciens, Paris, 1845, with the modern names subjoined. For some remarks on the personality of Hierocles, see Schelstrate's Antiquitas Ecclesiae, ii. 720). The notitia of Leo Sapiens is full for the East, but not equally perfect for the West. It has been edited many times. Carolus a S. Paulo for instance, in his Geographia Sacra (Amsterdam, 1704), prints it, in an imperfect form, along with other notitiae in an appendix; Beveridge prints it on p. 135 of his annotationes in canones at the end of the second volume of his Synodikon; Goar in his edition of Codinus (Venice, 1729), p. 287, foll., gives the notitiae from that of Leo to that of Andronicus Palaeologus; Schelstrate, ii. 632 (Rome, 1697), prints the chief civil and ecclesiastical notitiae; Bingham gives the notitia of Leo in the third volume of his Christian Antiquities; unfortunately he is extremely inaccurate (see Neale, Holy Eastern Church, vol. i. p. xii. of the preface). The critical edition, however, which so far will supersede all others, as well of Leo's notitia as of the other Eastern notitiae, is that in the work of Parthey above-mentioned. The later notitiae hardly come within the scope of this dictionary, but may be found in any of the works mentioned above, and best of all in Parthey. A useful introduction to the study of the notitiae would be to read the account which Fabricius (Scholaris Lux Evangelii, p. 342, foll. Hamburg, 1731) gives of the contents and bibliography of each of the more important of them.

It is obvious that the notitiæ are not the only sources from which a list of bishoprics could be compiled. The subscriptions to the councils are at least of equal importance. These can be obtained from any of the ordinary editions of the councils, such as that of Harduin or Mansi. The modern comprehensive book on the subject is Gams's Series Episcoporum (Ratisbon, 1873), a work of learning, but to be used with caution on account of a tendency to antedate the first establishments of bishoprics, and now and then to interpose a conjectural bishop. An attempt is made to give a complete notitiæ of the Christian world in Migne's Première Encyclopédie Théologique (Paris, 1862), vol. xxviii. p. 759. Other sources will be referred to in the following brief notes on the different parts of the Christian world taken separately.

1. Spain. All the old books bearing upon the subject, e.g. the editions of councils, &c., go upon the forged list of Wamba, which is greatly antedated, being put in the 7th, while it really belongs to the 12th century. A new critical edition of this list is shortly to be expected from the distinguished Spanish scholar Aureliano Fernandez Guerra. Meanwhile the materials for a judgment are to be found in Florez's admirable fourth volume which "contiene el origen y progreso de los obispos . . . y divisiones antiguas de sus Sillas." Florez was the first to throw doubt upon the supposed date of Wamba's list, and his opinion is now universally accepted. Gams's Kirchengeschichte Spaniens (Ratisbon, 1864) is the modern work on Spanish ecclesiastical history, written, however, it must be remembered, from the ultramontane point of view. Cortez y Lopez's Diccionario geográfico-histórico de la España antigua contains many facts, but should be read critically. Tejada y Ramiro's Coleccion de Canones de la Iglesia Española (Madrid, 1850), and Hübner's Inscriptiones Hispaniæ Christianæ (Berlin, 1871), should be referred to.

2. France. The great authority is Sammarthan's Gallia Christiana, a huge work in many folios (Paris, 1715), a revised and enlarged edition of which is now being published by Piolin. The first volume appeared at Paris in 1870, and vols. 1-5, and 11-13 have so far appeared. Piolin's Origines chrétiennes de la Gaule (Paris, 1855) will be found valuable. Longnon's Géographie de la Gaule au VI^e siècle (Paris, 1878) would be useful in attempting to fix the localities and circumscriptions of doubtful sees. See also Le Blant's Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule, 2 vols. (Paris, 1856).

3. England. See Stubbs's Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum (Oxford, 1858). Reference may also be made to Haddan and Stubbs's Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland (Oxford, 1869). Three volumes of this work have so far appeared. It will not be completed on the original plan, owing to Mr. Haddan's death.

4. Italy. Ughelli's Italia Sacra is the great authority. The second edition of this work, by Colet (Venice, 1717-1722) is a great improvement on the first. Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia (Venice, 1844-1871), corrects Ughelli in many places, and adds later and more trustworthy information. But the work is very unequally done, and some of it must be accepted with caution.

5. Asia Minor and the East generally. Neale's History of the Holy Eastern Church contains a great deal of matter. See especially p. 72 of the first introductory volume, where a notitiæ of Constantinople, including the dioceses of Caesarea, Ephesus, Thrace, and Illyricum orientale is given. On p. 115 of the same volume there is a list of the sees of Egypt, and on p. 131 another of the ancient and modern sees of the diocese of Antioch. Le Quien's Oriens Christianus (Paris, 1740) is still however the great source of authority, except so far as he has in some points been superseded by Parthey's edition of the notitiæ. Le Quien's conscientious accuracy in these matters is both rare and admirable. See an account of his life and labours by Neale in the preface to his Introduction, p. xii. The great work of Le Bas and Waddington, Voyage archéologique en Asie Mineure, would have to be used if it was desired to compile a complete notitiæ. The Synecdemus of Hierocles, and the notitiæ of Leo Sapiens, will be found, as already mentioned, best edited in Parthey. Kuhn, Die städtische und bürgerliche Verfassung des Römischen Reichs (Leipsic, 1865), is full of matter. See especially his section on Egypt, ii. 454 foll., and the section on Syria, passim.

6. Africa. Schelstrate, ii. 652, makes out a notitiæ of Africa from the council of Carthage in 411. Sirmond in his Opuscula (Paris, 1675), vol. i. p. 207, gives a late notitiæ of Africa, which may be of service, if critically used. There is a study entitled L'Afrique chrétienne by Yanoski, in a volume of L'Univers (Paris, 1844) containing other studies by French writers on the history and antiquities of Africa. Léon Renier's Inscriptions Romaines de l'Algérie (Paris, 1855) contains a certain amount of Christian inscriptions, and would repay examination. Dupin's Geographia Sacra Africae, seu Notitia Omnium Episcopatum Ecclesiæ Africanæ, is printed in the eleventh volume of Migne's Patrologiæ Cursus Completus (Paris, 1845), p. 823. Kuhn, ii. 431 foll., collects a great deal of valuable material for Africa. [W. T. A.]

NOVATUS, brother of Timotheus presbyter; commemorated at Rome, June 20 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. June iv. 4). [C. H.]

NOVENDIALE. [MOURNING; OBSEQUES.]

NOVICE.

1. Introduction; 2. Reception of Novices; 3. Duration and Discipline of the Noviciate; 4. Rite of Admission; 5. Renunciation of Property; 6. Limitation of Age; 7. Disqualifications; 8. Cases of Retrogression, &c.; 9. Summary.

1. As soon as the monastic life began to assume its coenobitic form, all persons desirous of admission into the community had to undergo a period of probation. During this time they were called "novitii," less commonly "incipientes," "ἀρχαίοι," "νεοπαῖς" (Alteserræ Asceticon, iv. 1), or "novelli" (Reg. Mag. c. 90; cf. Athanas. Echort. ad Spous. Christi, where Adam is called "rudis et novellus"), all terms expressing inexperience in a vocation. They were called also "pulsantes" (Mabillon, Praef. saec. iii. i. 21), as knocking at the door to be let in; and sometimes in the East, ἡσυχαστοὶ, a semi-barbarous word of the later empire, curiously descriptive of the intermediate state which they occupied, wearing the monk's tunic, by way of trial, under their ordinary outer robe, which they retained till formally admitted. They were also called "conversi" or converts. The "conversi" were distinct from those who were received into a monastery under age, "pueri oblati" or "nutriti." This use of "conversi" and "oblati" must not be confounded with the use of these words to designate lay-brothers (Mabillon, Praef. iii. i. 21; iv. iv. 59).

2. In instituting a noviciate for all who wished to become monks, the founders of monasticism followed, as usual, the precedent set by some ancient schools of philosophy. The Pythagoreans required a noviciate of five years (Maury, Histoire des Religions de la Grèce antique); the Druids, in some cases, one of twenty years (Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois). It was necessary as a safeguard for stability of purpose. On the one hand, none were to be rejected except for some insuperable impediment; on the other hand, none were to be lightly accepted, lest the community should be disgraced by the inconsistencies of its members. On the one side there was the gracious invitation of Him who says, "Come unto me all that labour and are heavy laden," and on the other there was the Psalmist's anxious misgiving, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord?" (Basil, Reg. c. 6). Thus Benedict of Monte Casino wisely orders that ingress into the monastery must not be too easy (Bened. Reg. c. 58), and three centuries later the great Frankish legislator repeats the injunction, adding that no one is to be forced to become a monk against his will (Car. Mag. Capitular. Monast. A.D. 789, c. 11). It was difficult to gain admittance into the monastery, because it was still more difficult, once there, to leave it. "Vestigia nulla retrorsum."

The would-be monk had to wait as a suppliant at the door of the monastery—by the rule of Pachomius of Tabennae and of other Egyptian ascetics of his age—seven days (Reg. c. 49; Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 28; Reg. Serap. Macar. etc. c. 7); according to Cassian, ten days (Instit. iv. 3, 36; Collat. xx. 1); by the rule of Fructuosus (bishop of Bracara [Braga], in Portugal, in the 8th century), ten days (Reg. c. 21), afterwards modified to three days and nights (2^{da} Reg. c. 4). He was to lie there prostrate, by the rules of Pachomius and Fructuosus, and, by the latter rule, fasting and praying, and the porter was to test his sincerity and patience by insults and revilings (Fruct. ib. cc. 4, 21). If ignorant of it, he was to be taught the Lord's Prayer (Pachom. ib.). He was also to be questioned about his motive for seeking admission, and in particular, lest he should prove to be a fugitive from justice, whether he had committed any crime which had made him liable to punishment (Pachom. ib.; Ferreoli Reg. c. 5; Fruct. Reg. cc. 4, 21). In course of time a less austere reception was accorded to postulants. Mabillon explains the passage in the Benedictine rule which orders them to wait a few days (five days, in his interpretation) at the gate ("ad portam," Bened. Reg. c. 34) to mean not outside the monastery, but in a cell specially set apart for this purpose within the cloister (Mabillon, Praef. i. saec. iv. vii. 150).

3. Though allowed to enter the monastery, the postulant was still an alien there. At first he was placed in the strangers' cell or guest-chamber, "cella hospitum," near the gateway (Cass. Inst. iv. 7) for a year (Cass. ib.; Fruct. Reg. c. 21), or, according to the rule of Isidorus (bishop of Seville in the 7th century), for three months (Isid. Reg. c. 5). In Mabillon's exposition of the Benedictine rule, the postulant was to stay only two months in the strangers' cell before being transferred to the cell of the novices (Mabillon, Praef. i. v. s.). Under the orders of the superintendent of the strangers, "custos hospitum," he was to be busily employed in menial offices for their comfort (Bened. Reg. c. 58; Fruct. Reg. c. 21). Thence he passed, after a shorter or longer sojourn according to the rules of the monastery, to the cell of the novices, sometimes called the "pulsatorium," or chamber of those who were still, as it were, knocking to be let in (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Capitul. Aquisgr. A.D. 780).

The period of probation varied in its duration and the severity of its discipline. It lasted three years by the rule of Pachomius (Pallad. Hist. Laus.) and by the code of Justinian (Novell. v. 2); but a latter decree makes this term of three years necessary for strangers only, that is, persons coming from a distance; only one year by the rules of Ferreolus (bishop of Uceta [Uzès], in Southern France in the 6th century) (Reg. c. 5), of Fructuosus (Reg. c. 21), and by the so-called rule of Magister (Reg. Mag. c. 90). The former allowed even a shorter term, five months, at the abbat's discretion (v. s.); and the latter even permitted the novice to reside in a cell not within but near the monastery (v. s.). Gregory the Great found some abbats in his time too facile in the admission of novices; to correct this laxity, he insisted on a probation of two years at least (Epp. x. 24), and in the case of men that had been soldiers, three (ib. viii. 5). Benedict had been content with a noviciate of one year (Reg. c. 58), of which, according to Mabillon, two months were to be passed in the "cella hospitum," and the remaining ten in the "cella novitiorum" (Praef. iv. vii. 150), but, according to Martene, all the year in the novices' chamber (Reg. Comment. c. 58). This was usually, but not always, on the east side of the cloister or quadrangle, between the gateway and the east end of the chapel, next to the room of correction, and facing the scholars' chamber, and the "scriptorium" or copyists' room on the west (Altes. Ascet. iv. 3, ix. 7). In some of the larger monasteries the novices had their own quadrangle, almost like a separate monastery, with their own refectory, dormitory, infirmary, and even, in rare instances, their own chapel; but this ceased with the decrease in the number of candidates for admission (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 58).

All the time of his noviciate the aspirant for the cowl was under very strict tutelage. On entering the monastery, he was assigned to the guardianship of one of the older and more experienced of the brethren, who was to report of his behaviour to the abbat (Bened. Reg. c. 58; Basil. Reg. c. 15; Isidor. Reg. c. 4; Fruct. Reg. c. 21; Reg. Magist. c. 87; Gregor. Magn. Epp.

v. 49). As it would be hardly possible for each novice to have his own senior, it has been supposed that the older monk, spoken of in the rules, was either one of the decani or deans (Fruct. Reg. v. s.), or, more probably, the "master of the novices" [MAGISTER NOVITIUM], whose special task it was to look after them (Reg. Bened. Comment. v. s.). They were never to stir out of their chamber without leave (Cass. Inst. iv. 10). They were never, on any pretext whatever, to go about the monastery at night without a light or without the "master" (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 22). Even so trivial a fault as walking with the head up, instead of bent forward, was to be marked and corrected by "the master" (ib. c. 7). Slight allowance was made for their not being as yet inured to the severe discipline of the cloister. From "lauds" to "prime," when the older monks retired to their cells, the novices, with those monks who had not completed five years in the monastery, were to wait in their dormitory, learning psalms under the eye of the official for the week, or "hebdomadarius" (ib. c. 8). "Leave your bodies outside the gate all ye who enter the monastery" was the stern welcome of Bernard of Clairvaux to postulants (Altes. Ascet. iv. 1). In the same spirit one of the founders of monachism in the East enjoined on novices ignominious hardships of every kind, and the necessity of very frequent confessions to test their perseverance (Basil. Reg. c. 6). In the 11th century the docility and constancy of novices in England were sometimes tested by floggings (Hospinian, Hist. Monach. iii. c. 23).

Opportunities were given to the novice from time to time of reconsidering his determination. On first entering the monastery, before being stripped of the outer garments which he had worn in the world, he was questioned whether, indeed, renouncing all other things, he would obey implicitly his new rule of life (Pachom. Reg. c. 49). By the rule of Aurelian, bishop of Arles in the 7th century, he was to listen in the waiting-room, or "salutatorium," while the rule was read over to him (Reg. c. 1). He was then to be led into the chapter-house, where, after laying aside his arms, if he carried any, he was again to make a profession of his intention in presence of the father-abbat and the brethren. He might, if he pleased, send back a farewell message to the friends left behind (Mab. Præf. iv. viii. 150). At the end of two months, again at the end of eight months, and once again at the end of the year, the "senior" to whose charge he had been committed was to read over the rule to him, bidding him go back at once to the world if he wished (Bened. Reg. c. 58). Finally, in the oratory or chapel, during divine service (Pachom. Reg. c. 49), after laying on the altar with his own hand his written petition for admission, and invoking the saints whose relics were there enshrined, in witness of his sincerity, he was formally admitted by the abbat into the order (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Mabill. Præf. v. s.). If, as might often happen, he could not write, he was to put his mark to the petition in place of signature (Isidor. Reg. c. 5). He was to kneel before the abbat, repeating the verse, "Suscipe me," from the Psalter; and after admission, he was to prostrate himself at the feet of each of the brethren, kissing their hands and begging their prayers (Reg. Bened. Comment.

c. 58; Reg. Magist. c. 88). His secular dress was to be laid by in a wardrobe in case of his ever unhappily needing it again by being expelled (Reg. Bened. ib.). Abbats were forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to take any bribe for admission (Conc. Nicaen. II. A.D. 787, c. 19; Capitul. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 16). In the later developments of monachism, the consent of the brethren in chapter became necessary (Hospin. Hist. Mon. v. s.).

4. The monastic dress was not usually assumed till the noviciate was over (Cassian, Instit. iv. 5; Gregor. Magn. Epp. iv. 44). Originally, indeed, the dress of a monk differed little from that of ordinary people, except so far as it resembled the dress of the philosophers of the Roman empire, or was distinguished by a Quaker-like simplicity from the fashions of the day. When, however, the monastic life began to be organised more systematically, the dress became a not unimportant part of the rite of initiation. In the same way monks at first were only required to keep the hair short, as a protest against luxury and effeminacy; and the tonsure was for them a thing of later date (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). By the rule, so-called, of "Magister," the novice becoming a monk was to receive the tonsure from the abbat's hands, while the brethren stood round singing psalms (Reg. Magist. c. 90). The congregation of Clugny, at a later period, ordered their novices to have the tonsure as well as all the monastic attire, with the exception of the hood or cowl. But this was a deviation from the old Benedictine rule, which reserved the tonsure with the outer robe for the expiration of the noviciate (Bened. Reg. cc. 55, 58; Mabill. Acta Sanctor. O. S. B. tom. i. p. 7, not. a).

5. The novice was in every instance required to divest himself absolutely of all his worldly possessions. He was to be examined very particularly on this point, lest by keeping back a single coin for himself he should incur the guilt of Ananias (Cass. Inst. iv. 4; Aurelian, Reg. c. 1). Even the clothes on his back ceased to be his own (Cass. ib. c. 5). But in the earliest and purest days of monachism, the monastery was not to be the gainer by the novice's liberality, but his own relatives or the poor (Cass. ib.; Fruct. Reg. c. 4). Afterwards he was allowed to choose how his property should be disposed of, provided always that he retained nothing for himself. By the rule of Aurelian he might give it away as he pleased (Reg. c. 1). By the rule of "Magister," the abbat was to exhort him to intrust his worldly goods to the monastery for the use of the poor, or, if he preferred it, for the common fund of the monastery (Reg. Mag. c. 87). There was a curious regulation of the monastery of Ternay in Burgundy (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. i. 30, 71, 73), that property "in kind" was to be converted at once into money, in order, probably, to facilitate the distribution of it. Thus, if a novice brought a flock of sheep, the abbat was first to buy it for the monastery, or to sell it by the agency of the prior, and then to hand over the proceeds to the novice, to be applied by his direction (Reg. Ternat. c. 5). It is easy to understand how, in course of time, as monasteries vied with one another in opulence and magnificence, they absorbed the larger share of what a novice was renouncing. Once theirs, it was sacrilege to deprive them of it in any way. But these acquisitions were not always an unalloyed advantage. Sometimes a novice, presuming on his munificence, made himself troublesome to his brethren and his abbat (Fruct. Reg. c. 18). Sometimes, if faithless to his profession, he would reclaim his property by litigation or by arms (ib.). It was important, therefore, that, whatever he gave to the monastery, he should give by his own act and deed ("ipse sua manu," ib.). And though none might so much as enter the monastery as a postulant, bringing with him anything of his own, the formal and complete renunciation of all that he had in the world was to be made, solemnly, publicly, in writing, before the abbat and chapter, at a later stage of his noviciate (Reg. Mag. c. 87). It was even provided in the rule just quoted that the abbat should record the names of the donor and of the subscribing witnesses in his own last will and testament, lest at any future time the validity of the gift should be called in question (ib. c. 89). In the case of a minor, his parents were to lay his hand, wrapped in the folds of the altar cloth, on the altar, and might either vow away his property from him absolutely, or reserve the life interest till he should come of age (Bened. Reg. Comm. c. 59). When old enough, the novice was bound to execute this promise of renunciation (Aurel. Reg. c. 46). By the rule of "Magister" the parents might either promise all the boy's fortune to the monastery or might divide it in three equal portions between the monastery, the poor, and his own relatives. In either case they swore on the Gospels to bequeath him nothing (Reg. Mag. c. 91).

6. The rules of disqualification for admission varied continually in different countries and at different periods, especially as to the limitations of age. The conflicting decrees of councils and popes on these points testify to the difficulty of a compromise between the conflicting claims of the home or the state on the one side and of asceticism on the other. Basil, in the East, without defining more precisely, allowed children to be received very young to be trained in the monastery (Reg. c. 15); but they might go back to their homes, if they wished, before being finally admitted. Once in the monastery, by Benedict's rule, they could not abandon their vocation (Mabill. Annal. iii. 37; cf. Præf. A.A. O. S. B.). Cassian speaks of young boys occasionally among the Egyptian monks (Collat. ii. 11). Gregory the Great forbade them to be received before eighteen years of age; but the prohibition has been explained as applying only to the islands in the Tuscan Sea, where the discipline was peculiarly trying (Epp. i. 50). The emperor Leo fixed sixteen as the limit (Novell. 6). The rule of Aurelianus, bishop of Arles in the 6th century, excludes children under ten or twelve as thoughtless and as requiring a nurse (Reg. c. 47). A canon to the same effect was passed by the Trullan council at Constantinople, A.D. 692 (Conc. C. P. iii. c. 40). Leo IX., towards the close of the 11th century, prohibited novices before they have arrived at years of discretion; Urban II., rather later, forbade them under twenty. After the beginning of the 9th century they were seldom admitted under seventeen years of age (Hospinian, de Orig. Monach. iii. 23). Boys intended for the priesthood were by a decree of the second council of Toledo, A.D. 531, to be trained in the house of the bishop till they were eighteen years old (Conc. Tolet. ii. c. 1).

7. There is the same uncertainty, and there are similar contradictions, as to the right of the parents to devote a child to the noviciate, and of a child to present himself without the consent of his parents. Basil, in the earliest days of monasticism, forbade children to be admitted unless brought by their parents (Reg. c. 15). At a later date the civil law not only discountenanced parents keeping back their children from the noviciate, but even allowed children to be admitted against or without the consent of their natural guardians (Novell. cxliii. 41). Jerome, in a more than usually declamatory passage, upbraids Heliodorus for permitting his affection for his parents to keep him back from the life of a monk (Hieron. Epp. 14, § 2). The council of Gangra (Kiangari, in Anatolia), A.D. 525, a council not very favourably disposed to monasticism, condemned strongly sons retiring from the world without their parents' leave, anathematising all so doing (Conc. Gangr. c. 16). Alteserra contends, without, however, much shew of reason, that this and similar canons of the council of Gangra were intended only against monks tainted with heresy (Ascocticon, iv. 1). But two councils during the 7th century in Spain, already distinguished among the countries of Europe by its monastic sympathies, decided that children under age were bound by the act of their parents devoting them to the monastery, and must abide by that promise, however unwillingly, in after years (Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, c. 49; Conc. Tolet. x. A.D. 656, c. 6). The former of these councils of Toledo, according to Bingham, is the first council that sanctions this perversion of parental responsibilities and of filial obedience (Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). The latter enacts that up to ten years of age the child may be devoted by the parents; that on attaining that tender age the child has full power to devote himself, with or without their approval; and that, if parents have so much as tacitly allowed a child under ten to wear the monastic dress, he may never return to the world under penalty of excommunication (c. s.).

The marriage tie was another source of perplexity. Basil dissuades married persons from entering the monastic life, unless together, lest the husband or wife left alone in the world should be guilty of adultery (Reg. c. 12). Cassian, relating how Theonas, an Egyptian monk, persisted in becoming a monk in spite of his wife's entreaties, seems by his silence to disapprove (Collat. xxi. 8, 9). The council of Gangra, already quoted, condemns any such disregard of domestic duties on the part of wives or parents (v. s. cc. 14, 15). In the same spirit Gregory the Great cautions husbands against forsaking their wives even for the life of a monk (Gregor. M. Epp. vi. 48). But these salutary cautions were in practice too often neglected in the fervour of monastic propaganda.

The case of slaves was different. There the monastery was interposing to rescue men from degradation. Yet there, too, was danger of a collision between the monastery and social obligations. Canons and decrees give an uncertain sound, and it could hardly be otherwise, on this point. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and the council of Gangra, A.D. 525, forbade slaves to be admitted without their masters' leave (Conc. Chalced. c. 4; Conc. Gangr. c. 3). Justinian ordered them to be kept three years, and then allowed them, if not reclaimed, to become monks (Novell. cxiii. 35; cf. Valentinian. III. Novell. xii.). Basil makes reference to Onesimus, the runaway slave, sent back to his owner by St. Paul (Reg. c. 11). The great Gregory has frequent occasion in his correspondence to advise on this knotty point. Slaves are not to be taken in rashly (Greg. M. App. ad Epist. Decret. v. 6), but if they behave well in the monastery, they may stay (Epp. v. 34); if not, they must be sent back to their masters (ib. ix. 37); a subdeacon, to whom Gregory is writing, is told to pay the money to redeem a slave longing to become a monk (ib. iii. 40). On the whole, without doubt, the influence of the monasteries was often exercised wisely as well as benevolently for the alleviation and gradual extinction of the evils of slavery. For example, a master desiring to become a monk, and bringing a slave with him, found within the walls of the monastery that he had with him "no longer a slave, but a brother in the Lord" (Reg. Serapion. c. 7; Reg. Turnat. c. 5, &c.).

The profession of the monk clashed not infrequently with the duties of the citizen. By a decree of Valentinian and Valens, in the latter part of the 4th century, all persons in monasteries liable to serve in the local senates of the empire ("curiales")* were ordered either to return to public life or to sell their estates to others of a more public spirit (Cod. Theod. xii. 1; Bingh. Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). The council of Chalcedon, in the same century, protested against monks serving in the army or navy (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 7). Gregory wisely discouraged public officers from becoming monks, unless they had first passed their accounts, and so cleared themselves of their civic responsibilities (Greg. M. Epp. iii. 65; viii. 5). Again, the admission of criminals involved questions of some difficulty. There was, on the one hand, the danger of interrupting the course of justice, by preventing the sentence of the law from being carried into effect, and of bringing down on the monastery harbouring criminals the strong arm of the law, as well as the danger, which Dr. Arnold felt so keenly at Rugby, of the moral contagion that might spread itself from an evil example. On the other hand, it might fairly be asked, was not the reformation of offenders one great purpose of the monastery?

* The "curiales," or "curiae subjecti," may in some ways be compared to our aldermen or town-councilmen. When summoned to the office, they could not refuse, and if they endeavoured to evade it, they were compelled to return. They were responsible for the full payment of the impost due from their locality. The office being burdensome was invested with some dignity as a compensation, but came notwithstanding to be regarded as a kind of servitude. (See Ortolan's History of Common Law, translated by Richard and Nasmith, 1841. See particularly Justinian's Codez, i. iii. 12; xxxi. 38; vii. xxxix. 5.)

Cassian speaks of reclaimed robbers and even murderers among the monks of Egypt in his day (Collat. iii. 5). The rule of Fructuosus provides that novices of this character may only be received where the abbat is a man of more than ordinary experience and gravity, and that they must always be subjected to a discipline of more than usual rigour (Fruct. Reg. c. 19). For a somewhat similar reason, as well as not to interfere with a sister institution, monks, by a decree of the council of Agde, in the 6th century, were not to be admitted from one monastery into another (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 58). Old age was sometimes a bar to admission, in the earlier days of monasticism. Cassian says of some who desired to become monks that they were too old to learn (Instit. iv. 30; cf. Pallad. Hist. Laus. cc. 20, 28). Poverty was never a disqualification. The poorest outcast, craving to be let in, with no possessions of any kind to renounce, either for the monastery or for the poor, had simply to vow, like the rest, that he would be obedient, and that he would never go away without leave of the abbat and of the brethren; if naked, he was to be clothed (Reg. Magist. c. 87). The following list of impediments to becoming a novice in some orders is given by Martene; but a good deal was always left to the discretion of the abbat and chapter. Immature age, heresy, schism, need of a dispensation, illegitimacy, debt, evil notoriety, gross wickedness, bodily infirmity, and, in case of a novice aspiring to the diaconate or priesthood, ignorance of Latin (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 58).

8. In the earliest ages there was no vow of perpetuity, in so many words; only a tacit understanding on both sides that the novice would persevere in his vocation (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). If, after making his profession, he turned back to the world, he was to forfeit what he had promised to the monastery, and was to be left to make his peace with God as he could (Justinian, Novell. v.). Short, however, of an irrevocable vow, everything was done to insure his perseverance. Should there, after all, be necessity for his expulsion, his old secular dress was to be given back to him (Bened. Reg. c. 58); and he was either to be ejected ignominiously in the daytime or allowed to steal away under the shadow of night (Cass. Instit. iv. 6). The mediæval treatment of such offenders was more severe; they were to be immured for life (Hospinian, de Orig. Monach. ad loc. cit.; Bened. Reg.). During the noviciate egress was comparatively easy. After two months of it, the novice might, if he wished, depart in peace, with staff, wallet of provisions, and the abbat's benediction (Reg. Mag. c. 88). If, even at the last moment, just before solemnly assuming the monk's habit, he wished to retract, he was free to do so, but under sentence of penance for levity of purpose, and as a man still in God's sight dedicated to the life of a priest, if not to the higher life, as it was regarded, of a monk (Mabill. Praeff. iv. vii. 150). A novice receding within the year was, by the rules of the Benedictine order of "Grandimontenses," never to be allowed to try again (Reg. Comment. c. 29).

Novices generally enjoyed, during this probation, the civil exemptions and immunities of monks (Alteser. Asceticon, iv. 4). Degradation:

to the noviciate was sometimes a punishment for monks who were disobedient (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). Benedict ordered the younger monks, just out of their noviciate, to be corrected for their faults by extraordinary fastings (Reg. 30).

9. All these carefully devised regulations about novices shew that the founders and reformers of monastic orders regarded the noviciate, and rightly, as a very important part of their system. If the authority of the abbat was the keystone of the arch, the rigorous probation before becoming a monk was the cornerstone of the edifice. Thus the admission of a novice ("susceptio novitii") was one of the five principal duties of the abbat and chapter ("praecipua agenda monasterii"); the other four being the expulsion of renegades, the penances for misconduct, the acceptance of donations or bequests, and any proposition for changing any of the rules of the society (Reg. Bened. Commentat. c. 3). Benedict himself lays down the principle, that, while the discipline of novices must not go beyond their power of endurance, still, so far as it goes it must be adhered to strictly (Reg. Prolog.). It was a sagacious remark of Eutropius, a Spanish abbat (Serbitanus or Sirbitanus) towards the end of the 6th century, "we do not want quantity, but quality in our novices"—"non quantos [quot] sed quales" (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. vii. 21). Yet the noviciate and the framing of regulations about it seem to have been left generally to the monastic bodies themselves. The canons of councils, though continually relating to the monks and monasteries, are comparatively silent about the noviciate. It was considered probably an integral part of the internal administration of the monasteries. It may be observed that, while in the commencement of monasticism the age for admission was earlier, and the probation longer, the inverse practice prevailed in course of time. Obviously the younger the novice, the greater the need of long and elaborate preparation.

(1) Among the various designations used by ancient Christian writers for nuns, the most noticeable are these. "Nonna" (Hieron. Epp. 22 ad Eustochium), a term of filial reverence, signifying an aged woman, a mother, or nurse, just as the older monks were called "nonni" by their younger brethren (Bened. Reg. c. 63; cf. Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. c. 70; Menard. ad loc.). The word is perhaps from Egypt, and occurs in the form of νόνις in some editions of Palladius. "Sanctimonialis," or "Castimonialis," expressing the holiness of the vocation; the latter syllables of these words become in later writers the substantive word "monialis." "Monastria," a less usual word, signifying seclusion from the world. "Sponsa Christi," or spouse of Christ. "Ancilla Dei," handmaid of God. "Velata," veiled. "Ascetica," ascetic (Alteser. Asceticon. III. ii.). The names "agapetae," beloved, and "sorores," sisters, degenerated into terms of reproach, as implying familiarity with monks (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. VI. ii. 13; cf. Conc. Ancyra. A.D. 314. c. 18).

(2) There were precedents in paganism for an institution of this kind. The Roman vestals held a very high place in the Roman constitution. Usually admitted very young, between the ages of six and ten, they were bound to fulfil a term of thirty years after admission; ten as novices, ten in the worship of the temple, ten as teachers of those who were to take their places. After the expiration of these thirty years, they were free to marry, but availed themselves of this liberty very rarely (Preller, Les Dieux de l'ancienne Rome). Among the Pythagoreans, also, women consecrating themselves to virginity might attain a very exalted rank in the hierarchy (Maury, Histoire des Religions de la Grèce Antique). Ambrose seeks a precedent in the sacred observances of the Jews (De Virginitas). But the passage in the book of Maccabees is a very slight foundation to build upon (II. Macc. iii. 19).

(3) In one sense the profession of a nun dates from an earlier period than the corresponding profession of a monk. Before the custom of addicting themselves for religious purposes to an unmarried life had made much progress in the Christian church among men, it was already in vogue among women. They had no public duties to renounce; it was easier for them to exchange their ordinary employments for those of charity and devotion; perhaps, too, they were predisposed to understand the exhortations to purity, which are so prominent in the Gospel, as exhortations to virginity, and to take such words about marriage as those of St. Paul to the Corinthians in the most literal sense (1 Cor. vii. 35). The "sacred virgins," or "ecclesiastical virgins," were an important part of the organisation of the church in its first three centuries, and their names were enrolled on the list ("canon" or "matricula") of church officials (Bingham, Origin. Eccles. vii. 4; Hospinian, de Orig. Monachatus, i. 10). The empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, shewed especial respect for these devoted women (Socrat. Hist. Eccles. i. 17). But these "asceticae" were not living together in communities, nor bound by vows (Cyprian, Epp. 4, 62; cf. De Habitu Virg.). Even so late as the close of the 4th century, a canon of the council of Carthage speaks of these virgins as dwelling with their parents (Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 397, c. 33; Gregor. M. Dialog. ii. 7, 14). If orphans, they were to be placed by the bishop in a building set apart for them. Probably the persecutions of the "sacred virgins" by Julian (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 3), by that reaction which inevitably follows persecution, helped to make their vocation at once more popular and more systematic. Some of the Roman ladies, who were induced by Jerome's influence to devote themselves to it, continued in their homes. Others left their homes to give themselves more completely, as they believed, to a life of devotion (Epp. ad Eustoch.; ad Demetriad.; Ambrose, Epp. ad Marcell.). The civil law of the later empire exempted from the capitation tax (à plebeiae capitationis injuriâ) these ecclesiastical virgins, and grants them especial protection from insults, making it a capital offence to offer violence to any one of their number, or even to propose marriage to them (Cod. Theodos. xiii. x. 4, ix. xxv.; Cod. Justinian. i. iii. 5).

(4) Very early in the 5th century Palladius describes several communities of virgins living together in the Scetic desert, in Egypt, and in Tabennae, an island on the Nile. Some of these communities were apparently not under a very careful discipline. Dorotheus, the superintendent of one of them, used to sit at an upper window, looking down on the inmates, to stop their quarrellings (Pallad. Hist. Laus. cc. 34, 36, 38, 137). Chrysostom mentions crowds or associations of virgins (coetus virginum) in Egypt, in those days pre-eminently fertile in asceticism (Homil. in Matt. c. 8). Rufinus speaks of them in Oxyrinchus (Behnesch) in Egypt. Ambrose says that they abounded in Alexandria, in the East, in Italy, and were esteemed very highly (De Virginit. 7, De Virginitibus, 10, De Lapsu Virg.). Jerome complains that parents were apt then, as in later years, to get rid of their sickly or ill-favoured daughters in this way (Hieron. Ep. ad Demetriad.). Augustine mentions nuns, in buildings apart from monasteries, making woollen garments for the monks (De Mor. Eccles. c. 31). In his protests against the excesses of Donatists, he rebukes severely the indecent behaviour of the virgins, unworthy of the name, who accompanied the roving bands of the "Circumcelliones" (Cont. Parmenian. iii. 3; De Bono Viduitat. c. 15). In the last year of the 6th century the pope, Gregory the Great, attributes the preservation of Rome from the Lombards to the prayers of the nuns, about three thousand in number, within its walls (Gregor. M. Epp. vi. 42, vii. 26).

(5) At first, as was the case with monks, and especially in the East, youth was hardly considered a hindrance to self-dedication. Basil draws the line at sixteen or seventeen (Reg. c. 7; Ep. ad Amphilocho. c. 18). Asella and Paula devoted themselves, or were devoted, even earlier (Hieron. Epp.). Ambrose advises that it must not depend on the number of years, but on the maturity of character (De Virginitate. c. 7). The Council of Saragossa, in the close of the 4th century, and the Council of Agde, a little more than a century later, forbid the veil to be assumed before the age of forty (Conc. Caesaraug. A.D. 381, c. 8; Conc. Agathens. A.D. 506, c. 19); and the third Council of Carthage, about the same date as that of Saragossa, before twenty-five (Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 397, c. 4). Gregory the Great writes that nuns may not be veiled before sixty years of age, but the profession might be made sooner (Epp. iv. 11; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. viii. 47). Charlemagne, in order to discourage the practice of taking the veil prematurely, re-enacted the old African canon already quoted, fixing twenty-five years of age as the earliest age for it (Capitul. A.D. 789, c. 46; A.D. 805, c. 14). The Council of Frankfurt allows an earlier age in exceptional cases (Conc. Francof. A.D. 793, c. 46). The Council of Aachen, twenty-two years later, forbids young women to become nuns without the consent of their parents or guardians (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 20). As to the length of time necessary for probation, a Council of Orleans in the 6th century, draws a distinction between convents where the inmates are to stay for ever, and those where they only sojourn for a time. In the latter case the probation is to last three years; in the former, one year is enough (Conc. Aurelian. V. A.D. 549, c. 19). [NOVICE.]

(6) From the first it was understood on all hands that a woman consecrating herself to the profession of virginity ought not to marry; and in accordance, as it was thought, with apostolic precepts (1 Cor. vii.; 1 Tit. ii.), anyone going back from this profession was gravely censured as falling from a higher vocation (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 315, c. 19). But it was not till the Benedictine rule had been established in Europe that the vow of virginity was regarded as absolutely irrevocable.* At first in some cases, if not in all, the distinction was recognised between lawful wedlock and incontinency. In course of time the same stigma of infamy was branded on a nun marrying, as on one guilty of gross immorality, just as a monk was condemned alike for marriage and fornication. The Council of Elvira in Spain, early in the 4th century, allowed nuns forsaking their profession to be restored to communion, if penitent, after offending once, but not in case of the offence being repeated (Conc. Eliberitan. A.D. c. 324, c. 13). Basil ordered a penance of one or two years before restoration to communion; in his eyes, the marriage of one who is already the spouse of Christ is adultery (Ep. ad Amphilocho. c. 18). The Council of Valence, in Southern

* See H. C. Lea's History of Celibacy, Philadelphia, 1867.

France, about the same date, sentenced nuns marrying to a long, but not perpetual, excommunication (Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 2). The Theodosian code allowed them to return to the world at any time before attaining forty years of age, especially if they had been compelled in the first instance by their parents to become nuns (Cod. Theodos. Nov. viii. et ix.). Pope Innocent I., in the commencement of the 5th century, forbids a nun after marrying or being seduced to be restored to communion, unless the partner in her transgression has retired into the cloister ("de saeculo recesserit," understood by Hossinian as if it were "decesserit") (Innoc. I. Ep. 2 ad Victric. Rotomagens.). Epiphanius draws very strongly the distinction, obliterated in later ages, between the marriage of a nun and profligacy; in the former case, after penance done, the ban of excommunication is to be taken off from her (Epiph. Haeres. lxi.). Leo I., in the middle of the century, only allows nuns who have broken their vow before taking the veil to be received after penance to communion; for those who so offend after taking the veil there is no restoration (Ep. 90). Rather earlier in the century Augustine, with characteristic largeness of thought, admits that marriage in these cases, though very culpable, is not invalidated (De Bono Viduitat. 8, 9, 10). Jerome, as characteristically, writes more inexorably (Ep. ad Demetriad.). The Council of Chalcedon, prescribing a period of penance varying in duration according to the discretion of the bishop, recommends the offending sister to mercy (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 16). The second Council of Arles, in the year following, re-enacts the decree, already cited, of the Council of Valence, adding the limitation, "if the offender is over twenty-five years of age" (Conc. Arelat. ii. A.D. 452, c. 33). The decree of the Council of Orange, a few years before this, is of the same purport (Conc. Arausican. A.D. 441, c. 28). A century later the sentences pronounced are more severe. The fifth Council of Orleans excommunicates both parties in the event of a nun marrying after her fourth year in the convent (Conc. Aurelian. V. A.D. 549, c. 19); and the Council of Mâcon makes this an excommunication for ever, except by special dispensation from the bishop in mortal sickness (Conc. Matiscon. A.D. c. 581, c. 12). The third Council of Paris pronounces anathema against any one presuming to tempt a nun to marry (Conc. Paris. A.D. 557, c. 5). Gregory the Great censures in gravest terms the marriage of a nun, as a great wickedness (Ep. v. 24). Nuns otherwise breaking their vow of chastity he orders to be transferred to a stricter monastery for penance (Epp. iv. 9).

(7) The consecration of a nun was a solemn rite, only to be administered by a bishop, or, at least, by his authorisation. The third Council of Carthage, in the end of the 4th century, forbade priests so to officiate, except by the bishop's order; the Council of Paris, under the successor of Charlemagne, forbade abbesses to usurp this function (Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 390, c. 3; Syn. Hippon. A.D. 393, c. 34; Syn. Carthag. A.D. 419, c. 6; Conc. Paris. A.D. 825, c. 41, 43). Ambrose, in the 4th century, cautions women against assuming the veil precipitately and without due consideration (De Virginitate, c. 7). His sister Marcellina was formally admitted in the great basilica of St. Peter at Rome by pope Liberius, and part of the ceremony was her receiving from his hands the robe of virginity (Ep. ad Marcellin.; Innoc. Ep. ad Vict. c. 13). He relates elsewhere how young women came to him at Milan from other parts of Italy and from other countries to be veiled (De Virginitate, i. c. 10; cf. Conc. Carthag. iv. A.D. 398). Hossinian (De Orig. Monach. u. s.) contends that there was no such ceremony before Constantine the Great, and that Tertullian (De Virginitate Velandis) speaks only of the modesty in dress and deportment which becomes Christian maidens generally. The favourite seasons for this ceremony were Epiphany, Easter, and the festivals of Apostles (Gelasius, Ep. 9, ad Episc. Lucan. c. 12). The veil was a sign of belonging to Christ alone (Athanas. Exhortat. ad Spons. Dei). The fillet or riband (vitta), with its gleam of purple or gold, represented the crown of victory (Optatus, de Schismat. Donat. vii. 4), and the tresses gathered up and tied together marked the difference between the bride of Christ and the bride of an earthly bridegroom with her tresses loosened according to the old Roman custom. The ring and bracelet, symbolic also of the betrothal to Christ, as well as the use of a special office for the occasion, were, Bingham argues, of a comparatively modern date (Orig. Eccles. VII. iv.). The Council of Gangra, while correcting several laxities of the day, condemned the practice of nuns dressing like monks (Conc. Gangr. A.D. 365, c. 13, 30). The same council forbade nuns to have their heads shaven (ib. c. 17; cf. Cod. Theodos. XVI. ii. 27); and so decreed two Gallic councils in the 6th and 7th centuries (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. vii. 52, xiii. 7). Ambrose and Optatus write to the same effect (Ambr. de Laps. Virgin. c. 8; Optat. de Schismat. Donatist. vi. 4). On the other hand, Jerome and Augustine imply that the custom in their experience was otherwise (Hieron. Ep. ad Sabinian. August.; Ep. 211). In Egypt and Syria the custom of shaving the head seems to have been adopted for cleanliness, nuns having infrequent opportunities of washing the head (Hieron. u. s.; cf. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. v. 10). The uncertainty of rule, and the diversity of practice on this point arose, perhaps, in part from the apostolic injunctions to the Christian women at Corinth (1 Cor. xi.) conflicting with the monastic tonsure; and partly from the twofold aspect of the vocation of a nun, as, on the one hand, pledged to virginity, and, on the other, betrothed to the Redeemer. Another objection against the tonsure of nuns in Europe was the circumstance that this was an ancient punishment for adulteresses among the Teutonic tribes.

(8) The rules of the conventual life for women resemble closely those for men (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. i. 52). Scholastica, sister of the great Benedict, was esteemed in Europe the foundress of nunneries, according to the legendary tradition (Mabill. Praeff. I. iii.). The nuns were to obey their abbess implicitly (e.g. August. Ep. 211). By the rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, in the 6th century, they were never to go out of the convent; were to have nothing of their own; were to be allowed the luxury of a bath only in sickness (Caesar. Arelat. Reg. cc. 1, 4, 29). The rule of Aurelian, his successor in the see, orders that they may never receive letters without the cognisance of the abbes, and that if anyone brings a maid with her into the convent, the servant, by the very act, becomes free and in all things her equal (Aurelian Arelat. Reg. cc. 4, 13). The rigorous rule called "Cujusdam," not unreasonably ascribed by some to Columba of Iona, prescribes for nuns continual silence, frequent confessions, a very spare diet, very hard labour, under penalty of excommunication (Reg. Cujusd. cc. 6, 9, 10, 12, 18, 19). The rule of Donatus, bishop of Besançon, in the middle of the 7th century, makes mention of female officers corresponding to the abbat, friar, hebdomadarius or septimanarius in a monastery; it allows wives, who have left their husbands, to be admitted (cf. Syn. Carthag. II. A.D. 309, c. 1); it forbids the nuns to keep anything under lock and key; it orders small delinquencies to be punished by slappings (Donat. Vesontionens. Reg. cc. 4, 5, 7, 11, 32, 67). Gregory the Great, in his life of Benedict of Nursia, gives a curious legend, how two nuns were punished grievously for their silly chatterings (Gregor. M. Vit. S. Bened. c. 23).

(9) Nunneries were generally, as might be anticipated, more amenable than monasteries to the control of their bishop. But the occurrence from time to time of a canon on this point shews that they, too, could sometimes be in subordinate (e.g. Conc. Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 5; Conc. Florent. A.D. 791, c. 47; Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 793, c. 47; Conc. Aquisgran. A.D. 816, c. 68; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, c. 13). Again, another council insists that they must account to their bishop for all immunities from episcopal dues (Conc. Vernens. A.D. 755, c. 20). Gregory blames a bishop for not having hindered a nun from leaving her convent (Gregor. M. Epp. ix, 114). He orders the bishops to install new abbesses; to prevent nunneries being founded without sufficient endowment; to keep lay-women out of them (Epp. iii. 9, iv. 4, v. 12, vii. 7). The power of abbesses, like that of abbots, was checked by certain limitations both from within and without. By the rule of Donatus the abbes must take counsel with her nuns (u. s. c. 2). By the decree of an English council in the 8th century the abbes is to be elected by the nuns, either from their own number or from elsewhere, with the advice of the bishop (Conc. Chalcyth. [Chelsea?], A.D. 787, c. 5). Gregory the Great in his day disapproved of young abbesses, and of abbesses from another convent (Epp. iv. 11, vi. 12). By a council near Paris in the 8th century it is ordered that the bishop, as well as the abbes, may send a nun misbehaving herself to a penitentiary; that no abbes is to superintend more than one monastery, or to quit the precincts, except once a year when summoned by her sovereign; and that the abbes must do penance in the monastery for her faults by the bishop's direction (cum consilio episcopi, Conc. Vernens. A.D. 755, c. 6). Charlemagne enacted that the bishop must report to the Crown any abbes guilty of misconduct, in order that she might be deposed (Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 793, c. 47). Abbesses were forbidden, in the reign of his successor, to walk alone, and thus were placed in some degree under the surveillance of the sisterhood (Conc. Moguntin. ii. A.D. 847, c. 16). Charlemagne prohibited abbesses from laying hands on any one, or pronouncing the blessing (Capitul. Carol. M. A.D. 798, c. 76; Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 793, c. 46). Hospinian alleges that some abbesses claimed to ordain, but this can only be understood in the sense of admitting into minor orders or into the sisterhood (Hospinian, u. s.). Bingham states that abbesses are first mentioned as taking part in the proceedings of a synod at the Council of Becanfield (Becanceldae), in Kent, A.D. 694 (Bing. Origin. Eccles. VII. iii.; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xviii. 28). In the feudal system abbesses were liable, like his other vassals, to the king's service, but by proxy, because of their sex and vow of seclusion. They of course exercised lordship over the fiefs belonging to their convents. In each province the convents were under the supreme authority of the abbes of the central convent of that order, just as the monasteries were subject to a "provincial" and "general" of the order.

(10) The routine in a nunnery corresponded very nearly with that of a monastery. There was the same periodical rotation, hour by hour, of sacred services, varied by work, chiefly manual, of one sort or another, with brief intervals at stated times for rest or refectio. The usual occupation, in the way of working, was from the first in wool. Jerome, urging nuns to make their vocation real by strenuous diligence, advises them to have the wool ever in their hands (Ep. ad Eustoch.). The passage in Augustine's writings, where he speaks of them handing through the door of the convent the dresses which they have made for the aged monks waiting there with food for the nuns in exchange (August. de Morib. Eccles. c. 31), recalls the ancient epitaph on the Roman housewife in the simple days of the republic, "domi mansit, lanam fecit." But this primitive employment was apt to degenerate into a preference for fancy-work, which was discouraged as frivolous and vain, except when it was made useful, in ecclesiastical embroidery, &c., for the adornment of the sanctuary (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xvi. 24). The rule of Caesarius enjoins working in wool, but forbids fancy-work (u. s. cc. 14, 42). The rule of Aurelian orders the nuns all to learn reading and writing (litteras discant omnes, u. s. c. 26). In the revival of education under Charlemagne, the nunneries did good service. Hitherto monastic schools had been used chiefly for training monks and clergy only. The great legislator extended the advantages of education to the laity also, instituting for them the "scholae exteriores," and leaving the "scholae interiores" for the others. The schools in the nunneries were already useful for girls in this larger sphere, the training of the young being naturally congenial to the nuns. Their course of lessons differed of course from the "trivium" and "quadrivium" of the monastic system, being confined to an elementary sort of catechism in religious knowledge, music, housework, and, more rarely, Latin (Alteser. Ascetic. v. 10; Herzog, Kloster-Schulen). Nuns were also employed frequently in transcribing and illuminating sacred books, and in the arts of medicine and painting (Mabill. Acta Sanctor. O. S. B. i. p. 646; Praeff. ii. 3, iii. 4). Boniface, during his missionary labours in Germany, sent to his old home in England for a supply of nuns to assist in civilising and Christianising the wild hordes whom he was converting (Othlon. Vit. S. Bonifacii, c. 25; Mabill. Praeff. iii. 2, 4). Hospinian says that he made use of them not for teaching only, but also for the purpose of preaching (u. s.; cf. Mabill. Praeff. ii.).

(11) Great care was necessary from the first to prevent a too close proximity of nunneries and monasteries, as well as any intercourse between the nuns and the other sex generally. Augustine, Jerome, and other fathers of the church reiterate their cautions against these dangers. The Council of Ancyra forbade the consecrated virgins to associate with men even as sisters (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 18; cf. Conc. Carth. A.D. 312, c. 3). Justinian forbade women to enter the conventual buildings of men (Novell. cxxxiii.). In the 5th century canons were made strictly prohibiting any more monasteries to be founded for monks and nuns together, and ordering those already in existence to be partitioned between the sexes (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. v. 23; cf. Herzog, Kloster). The rule of Caesarius allows no other man than the bishop, the clergy officiating, and the steward (provisor) of the convent to enter within its walls (u. s.). The nuns were to make their confession to the bishop through their abbess (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xii. 32). Some nuns were censured in the 6th century for having nursed through his illness a monk of the venerable age of 80 (Mabill. u. s.). The Council of Seville, a little later, forbids a nunnery to be placed too near the monastery to which it is attached for protection; enacts that this arrangement must have the sanction of the bishop or council; that no communication is to pass from the one establishment to the other, except through the abbat and abbess; and, while allowing the nuns to work with their fingers on dresses for the monks, and the monks to minister spiritually to the nuns, precludes all other intercourse whatever (Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 11). The letters of Gregory the Great abound with precautions and directions on this delicate subject. The person acting for the nunnery in its temporal affairs must always be either a monk or a cleric, of high repute and of long experience; he must save them all occasion for going out of the precincts; nuns are never on any pretext to lodge under the roof of a monastery. He denounces severely the custom of nuns being "commatres" with monks (Gregor. M. Epp. iv. 9, 42, viii. 21, 22). The danger, indeed, was one of constant recurrence, and required unceasing vigilance (Syn. Carthag. c. A.D. 346, cc. 3, 4; Conc. Toletan. I. A.D. 400, cc. 6, 9). The second council of Nicaea condemned the double or mixed monasteries already mentioned, and, even in cases of consanguinity, forbade a nun to see a monk, except in the presence of an abbess (Conc. Nicaen. ii. A.D. 787, c. 20). The council of Fréjus forbade the abbat of the protecting monastery to visit the nunnery without the bishop's leave (Conc. Forisjul. A.D. 794, c. 12). Still, in spite of every precaution, the insidious temptation baffled only too often the edicts of councils and reformers. In the 8th century nuns gained admission into monasteries on the ground of being necessary in sickness and similar emergencies, and secular women, on the same excuse, were harboured in convents (Mabill. Praeff. III. i.). In the monastery of St. Maurice (Agaunense), in the Valais, women were in the habit of frequenting the basilica or chapel of the monastery (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. i. 74). In the 10th century the archbishop of Sens, in Champagne, destroyed the separate cells (aediculae), then becoming common, in which nuns lived apart from the restraints of the convent (Mabill. O. S. B. Praeff. V. vi.). The "canonicae" of the 8th and subsequent centuries differed from nuns in retaining more of their secular character. They were not bound by a vow of perpetuity; they repudiated the titles of monachae and matres; and, though engaged, like nuns, in the work of education, they confined their teaching chiefly to the children of the nobles [CANONICI; SCHOOLS]. The "widows," who devoted themselves to the service of the church from its earliest days, belong in many respects to the same category as the "sacred virgins." Like them, they were exempted by the Code of Theodosius from the ordinary capitation tax; but it was expressly provided that this exemption should only be granted to those widows whose advanced age and sobriety of demeanour gave a guarantee that they would not marry again (Cod. Theodos. u. s.). The so-called "Apostolical Constitutions," after saying that a widow does not receive the imposition of hands (ὁ χειροτονεῖται, cf. Gelasius, Ep. 9, c. 13) enact that only those may be admitted into the order who are altogether beyond suspicion of levity or inconstancy (Apostol. Constitut. viii. 25). Similar precautions occur repeatedly in later ages, for instance, in the decrees of the Council of Orange in the 5th century, and of the Frankish kingdom in the 9th century (Conc. Arausican. A.D. 441, c. 27; Conc. Tolet. x. cc. 4, 5; Capital. A.D. 817, c. 21). NUNC DIMITTIS. [CANTICLE.]

NUNCIUS, confessor in the county of Namur, perhaps in the seventh century; commemorated Oct. 10 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 124). [C. H.]

NUNCTUS, abbat and martyr, near Merida, cir. A.D. 580; commemorated Oct. 22 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 596). [C. H.]

NUNILO, martyr, with Elodia, virgins; commemorated at Huesca in Spain, Oct. 22 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

NUNNUS, a surname of Hippolytus, martyr; commemorated "in portu urbis Romae," Aug. 23 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

NUNTIUS. [LEGATE.]

NUPTIAL CONTRACT. Tabulae nuptiales (Tertullian ad Uxorem, ii. 3) were the "deeds" by which dowry was conferred in marriage. In many ancient representations of wedded couples a scroll is represented either in the hand of one of the persons or in some part of the picture, which is commonly supposed to be the nuptial contract. See MARRIAGE, p. 1114. Two are sometimes found in representations on glass. (Buonarroti, tav. xxiii. 3.) (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Tabulae Nuptiales). [C.]

NUT. In the symbolism of the Fathers the nut bears various interpretations, the essential idea being the same in all, viz., a hidden treasure concealed beneath an unpromising exterior. From this point of view it became a very appropriate emblem of Jesus Christ, in whom the Godhead was hidden beneath the veil of the manhood. We find it so employed by St. Augustine (Serm. de temp.; Dominic. ante Nativitatem). In this passage he divides the nut into three parts, the husk, the shell, and the kernel, and finds something corresponding to each in the Person of the Saviour. First, he sees in them the Flesh, Bones, and Soul of Christ; and then refining still further, he regards the husk as the symbol of our Lord's Body; the kernel of the Deity within affording both food and light to the soul; and the shell of the wood of the Cross, which at the same time divides the outward and inward in man, and also by the wood of the Atonement unites the earthly and the heavenly. St. Augustine's friend and correspondent Paulinus of Nola expresses the same conceit in one of his poems (Poema xxvii. In Nat. S. Felic. ix. 277-287). He finds a deep mystery in Jacob's peeled rods, especially in the one which was of hazel (Gen. xxx. 37), on which he thus comments:—

"In nucē Christus,

Virga nucis Christus quoniam in nucibus cibus intus
Testa foris, et amara super viridi cute cortex.
Cerne Deum nostro velatum corpore Christum,
Qui fragilis carne est, verbo cibus, et cruce amarus.
Dura superficies verbum crucis, et crucis esca est,
Coelestem Christi claudens in carne medullam."

Another slightly different line of interpretation regarded the nut as the emblem of the Christian bearing about with him the divine Wisdom in a fleshy body. Thus St. Gregory the Great writes (cap. vi. Cant.): "Quid per nucem nisi perfectos quoque intelligimus, qui dum Divinam Sapientiam intra corpora sua retinent, quasi nucleum in fragili testa portant? Quid isti nisi nuces existunt, qui nuclei dulcedinem intus ferunt; exterius vero carnis utilitatem praetendunt?" We find a similar symbolism in Philo (de Vit. Mos. lib. iii.). Boldetti describes and gives a representation of a nut of amber found by him in a Christian tomb. It opened down the middle, and contained a cameo of the sacrifice of Isaac (Osservaz. p. 298; tav. 1, No. 10, 11; De Rossi, Rom. Sott. vol. iii. p. 595). [E. V.]

NYMPHAEUM, a name for the fountain or cistern usually found in the centre of the atrium before the door of a church, called also "Cantharus" and "Phiala" (FOUNTAINS AT THE ENTRANCE OF CHURCHES, p. 685). Anastasius records that a "Nymphaeum," surrounded by a triple arcade, was erected by pope Hilary in front of the basilica of St. Cross in Rome (Anastas. 69). In Paciaudi (de Sac. Christian.

Balnei, p. 145 sq.) we find an account with an engraving of an oblong marble cistern, found near the site of Pisaurum, ornamented with symbolical bas-reliefs of the 7th century, which he considers to have been a "Nymphaeum" in the atrium of a church. The word is used for ordinary fountains and tanks by Ammianus Marcellinus (lib. xv. p. 324), and Capitolinus (in Gordiano, iii.), "Opera Gordiani Romae nulla extant praeter quaedam nymphaea et balnea." Cedrenus and Zonaras (xiv. 1) used the word for a hall for the public celebration of marriages. Mabillon strangely interprets the passage from Anastasius of the place set apart for females. (Ducange, Constantinop. Christiana, lib. i. c. 26, p. 86 sq.). [E. V.]

NYMPHIA, male or female saint of Laodicea, martyr with Eubulus of Rome in the first century; commemorated Feb. 28 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 719). [C. H.]

NYMPHODORA, martyr, with Menodora and Metrodora; commemorated Sept. 10 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 265). [C. H.]

NYMPODORA, martyr; commemorated at Nicaea, Mar. 13 (Hieron. Mart.); NIMPODORA (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

NYSSA, COUNCIL OF, on the confines of Cappadocia, where a council was held A.D. 375, at the instigation of Demosthenes, the civil vicar, in which St. Gregory, brother of St. Basil and bishop of Nyssa, was condemned. (Basil, Ep. 237; Mansi, iii. 502.) [E. S. Ff.]

OAK, THE, SYNOD OF. [CHALCEDON (1), p. 333.]

OATHS on formal and solemn occasions, or for the purpose of legal attestation, were not prohibited among the early Christians. There were considerable scruples, doubtless, in using them, and their use was regarded with jealousy by more than one of the great church writers. The ground of the aversion to them, as to other practices which have since been held to be generally lawful among Christian people, was the prevalence of idolatry. All adjurations in common use naturally invoked the name of a heathen deity, or were cast in some form which a Christian could not utter without a tacit compliance with heathenism. Tertullian has one passage (De Idololat. c. 11) where, after speaking of lying being the servant of covetousness, he proceeds: "Of false swearing I say nothing, since it is not lawful to swear at all"—a passage which would seem to forbid the use of an oath under any circumstances. It is manifest, however, that Tertullian is not discussing the lawfulness of oaths, but is repeating in a general way the prohibition of our Lord (St. Matt. v. 34) against introducing adjurations into common conversation. Nevertheless, the feeling of that age was strong against the indiscriminate use of oaths. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Stromat. vii. 8, p. 861, ed. Potter) says that no true Christian will ever perjure himself, for he will not even swear; it is an indignity for him to be put upon his oath. And even a century later, Lactantius (Epitome, c. 6) disapproves of the use of oaths on the same ground, lest from constraint or carelessness a man should slip into perjury. The unlawfulness of swearing was one of the views set forth by Pelagius. Augustine (Ep. clvii.) shewed, in reply, that there is scriptural ground for the lawfulness of an oath, but, in common with many of the fathers, he viewed its use with suspicion and disfavour.

2. Coming to the direct evidence that oaths were employed and sanctioned in the early church, Tertullian (Apolog. c. 32) repudiates the charge that Christians could swear by the genius of Caesar, for the genii are nothing else than demons; but, he adds, they do swear by the emperor's safety; and he defends the oath, on the ground that in kings men reverence the appointment of God, and he holds that to be a great oath which involves the safety of what God hath willed. The same oath, "ὑπὲρ τῆς σωτηρίας τοῦ ἐνσεβαστάτου Αὐγουστοῦ Κωνσταντίνου," is mentioned by Athanasius (Ep. ad Monachos, t. i. p. 866, ed. Colon.). Compare the oath of Joseph (Gen. xlii. 15), "By the life of Pharaoh" (ὡς τὴν ὑψίστην Φαραὼ, Septuagint). This form of oath, which was probably adopted as an indirect answer to the charge of disloyalty, so freely cast at the early Christians, was evidently subject to abuse. So the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398, c. 61, orders a clergyman swearing by any creature (per creaturas) to be severely reprimanded, and, if obdurate, to be excommunicated. Athanasius required of Constantius (Apolog. ad Constant. t. i. p. 678) that his accusers should be put upon oath. In Vegetius, who lived at the close of the 4th century, there is a form (Instit. rei Militar. i. 5) of the oath required of Christian soldiers. They swear by God, by Christ, by the Holy Spirit, and by the majesty of the emperor. Other illustrations of the use of oaths, cited by Bingham, will be found in Aug. (Ep. cliv.) ad Publicol.; Id. Serm. xxx. De Verbis Apost.; Greg. Naz. (Ep. cexix.) ad Theodor.; Basil, in Psalms. xiv. t. i. p. 133; Hieron. in Matt. v. The laws of the Christian emperors contain frequent mention of oaths. Constantine confirms (Cod. Theod. ix. i. 4) a promise of reward to those who will inform against the corrupt practices of his ministers by the adjuration, "So may the Almighty be ever merciful to me, and keep me safe." One of the statutes of Arcadius (Cod. Theod. ii. ix. 8), shews that contracts were usually confirmed by an oath, either by the name of God or the emperor's safety. In the conference between the Catholics and Donatists in the time of Honorius (Collat. Carthag. die i. c. 5; Hard. Conc. i. 1052), the emperor's delegate swore to judge impartially "by the marvellous mystery of the Trinity, by the sacrament of the Incarnation, and by the emperor's safety." And indeed, whatever may have been the scruples of individual fathers, there can be no doubt that oaths were invariably required both in civil and criminal causes under the Christian emperors. Constantine laid down a general law (Cod. Theod. II. xxxix. 3) that all witnesses before a court were to bind themselves by an oath before giving evidence. The Justinian Code not only confirmed this law (ibid. IV. xx. 9), but added a clause to it (ibid. IV. lix. 1), that both plaintiff and defendant must swear upon the Gospels; the one, that he brought his action not for the purpose of calumny, but on legitimate grounds; the other, that he had a just defence. By a further enactment, the parties to a cause swore (Justin. Novel. cxxiv. 1) that no bribe had been or would be given to the judge or any other person. Nor was the obligation of an oath confined to lay causes. To check simony in cases of ecclesiastical preferment, the electors were required (Justin. Novel. cxxiii. 1) to take an oath that they did not select their nominee from any improper motive. Also, at the time of ordination, the candidate swore upon the Gospels (Justin. Novel. cxxvii. 2) that he had given no money to the bishop ordaining him. Among the privileges of the bishops was an exemption from appearing in person to give evidence in the public courts. It is not quite clear whether the privilege, as originally conferred by Theodosius, extended so far as this. It was, however, distinctly granted by Justinian (Novel. cxxiii. 7); and the same law enacted, that whenever bishops were examined in private their testimony should be taken not upon oath, but upon their word in presence of the holy Gospels, as becomes priests. With the exception of some of the Spanish synods, scarcely any mention is found of oaths in decrees of councils. In the decree which concludes the acts of the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, the oath of allegiance to kings is insisted upon; and the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653, c. 2, has a long dissertation on the sanctity of oaths, and insists upon the necessity of an oath in making treaties, in the reconciliation of friends, and in giving evidence; and adds, that if no evidence is forthcoming against an accused, then his oath is sufficient to establish his innocence.

3. Profane swearing was not in itself an offence subject to canonical punishment. It was a vice against which preachers frequently inveighed, but amendment was left to each one's conscience. (Tertull. de Pudicit. c. 19.) Its prevalence at Antioch called forth strong remonstrances from Chrysostom; and in one of his sermons (Hom. 22, ad Pop. Ant. t. i. p. 294) he threatened to exclude all swearers from partaking of the Holy Mysteries. A form of oath which the idolatrous adulation of the heathen emperors had brought into vogue was, "By the genius of Caesar," τὴν καίσαρος τυγχῆν, Per genium Caesaris. It had such a hold upon the people that Tertullian declares (Apolog. c. 28) that men would more readily swear falsely by all the gods than by the single genius of Caesar. In the early centuries this oath was one of the tests of recantation. Polycarp was frequently asked by the proconsul (Euseb. H. E. v. 15) to swear by the fortune of Caesar. A similar temptation was put before some African martyrs: "Only swear by the genius of the king, and you will be safe." (Acta Mart. Scyllitan. ap. Baron. an. 202, n. 2.) And for a Christian to utter it was a recognised lapse into idolatry. (Tertull. Apolog. c. 32; Origen, contr. Cels. viii. p. 421.) The form of an oath in common use is an indirect evidence of the soundness of doctrine.

Thus it was urged as a special charge against Donatus (Optatus, iii. p. 65) that he encouraged his followers in swearing by himself, or by the martyrs of his party. The oath of allegiance exacted by Justinian from governors of provinces is a fair indication of the development of the observance paid to the Virgin and to angels: "I swear by Almighty God, and His only-begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by Mary, the holy, glorious, and ever-Virgin Mother of God, and by the four Gospels which I hold in my hands, and by the holy arch-angels, Michael and Gabriel, to pay due allegiance," &c. (Cave, Prim. Christian. III. i. 212; Bingham, Antiq. XVI. vii. 4; Suicer, s. v. ἑρκος.)

4. Oaths of purgation entered largely into the administration of justice in the middle ages. The ordinary term expressing this oath was "sacramentum." "Juramentum, quod mutato nomine appellatur sacramentum, quia in eo id oculis fidei pervidetur, quod corporis oculis non conspiciuntur." (Hincmar, de Divortio Lothar. et Tetiberg, interrog. 6.) The formality was technically called "purgatio canonica," that is to say, a mode of purging approved by the canons, as distinguished from "purgatio vulgaris," such as a duel, or hot iron, or any other ordeal, all of which the church discountenanced. In cases where the evidence was conclusive, an oath of purgation was of no avail; but in all petty causes, in which the evidence was conflicting or insufficient, or was not admitted by the judge, or in which the plaintiff or accuser was absent, the defendant was allowed to purge himself from the charge by a solemn oath. It is obvious that this right might open the road to perjury, but the oath was surrounded with such circumstances of awe and solemnity that it was believed that no one would dare to swear falsely, or that, if he did, the vengeance of God would overtake him. That such interpositions were held to have actually taken place at the shrines where the perjury had been committed, see Gregory of Tours, Miracula, i. 20, 33, 53; and the Life of St. Eloy by Audoen or Owen, bishop of Rouen, A.D. 640, cc. 56, 59, 77. If the cause was sufficiently grave, the accused or the defendant did not swear alone, solâ manu suâ, but others supported him in the oath, the number depending on the gravity of the case. These supporters were variously named. In the laws of the German and Frisian tribes (Leg. Aleman. vi. 2; Leg. Frison. i. 2, 6, 8) they are termed sacramentales. In the Capitularies of Charles the Great (iii. 58), consacramentales; and again (ibid. iii. 64) juratores; and (ibid. iv. 26) conjuratores. Care was taken that they should be people of good report, whose evidence would be trustworthy, and of the same rank and condition as the accused. So that if a priest was under the necessity of purging himself from a charge, his compurgators must be priests also. (Capitular. Aquisgr. A.D. 803, c. 7; Capitular. Carol. Mag. v. 34.) An old Welsh law has an enactment (Leg. Hoëli boni Princip. Walliæ, c. 14), that if a woman is exposed to a charge which cannot be proved, she may clear herself by seven female compurgators, septimâ manu mulierum expurgat; if she is accused a second time, she will require fourteen; but if a third, and there is any probability in the charge, she will need fifty women to join with her in attesting her innocence. The sacramentales or compurgatores were selected partly by the accused, when they were termed advocati; partly by the plaintiff, in which case they were called nominati or denominati. Nominati also expressed the nominees of either side. When a person whose case was in dispute swore alone, he was said jurare suâ manu. If with one witness, unicâ manu, or cum uno sacramentali, or in manu proximî; and so with any number up to a hundred. The third council of Valence, A.D. 855, c. 13, has an instance of an oath, septuagesimâ quartâ manu. The compurgatores at the time of swearing were required to be fasting. (Capitular. Aquisgr. A.D. 787, c. 62.) The mode of conducting the formality is given in Leg. Aleman. vi. 7. The witnesses were to place their hands upon the chest containing the relics, and the principal in the cause alone was to utter the words, and lay his hand upon their hands, and swear that he had right on his side. To add solemnity to the oath, it was always to be taken in a church, either on the cross, or the altar, or the Gospels, or the relics. All the English Penitentials refer (Theodor. I. vi. 4; Bedae, v. 2; Egbert, vi. 2) to an oath thus taken, at the hand of a bishop, or on the altar, or on the cross. An instance of a father swearing, with his hands raised over the altar, to the innocence of his daughter, is given by Gregory of Tours. (Hist. iii. 33.) In the Capitulary of Charles the Great, v. 34, a suspected priest is ordered to purge himself with an oath taken on the Gospels in presence of the people. The practice, however, of requiring an oath from the clergy was not uniform. Thus, the council of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 48, prohibited bishops from swearing upon any sacred object; it was sufficient, apparently, that the oath was taken in presence of the object. And, prior to this, the Capitular. Episcop. A.D. 801, c. 20, had appointed that a priest should not swear at all, but simply make his declaration with gravity and truth. And the Institution. Eccles. p. 92, apud Ducange, s. v. Juramentum, which bears the name of Egbert, puts a special valuation on the oaths of the clergy. In criminal cases the oath of a priest was worth that of 120 serfs; of a deacon, 60; of a monk, 30. In disputes about property the oath of a priest could transfer the land of one serf to the church. In swearing by the Gospels, the ordinary formality was to lay the hands upon the sacred volume, but sometimes the book was held. Thus Pelagius, afterwards pope, A.D. 555-560, when charged by the Roman people of factious conduct towards his predecessor Vigilius, ascended the pulpit of St. Peter's, holding the Gospels and the cross above his head, and swore that he was innocent. Oaths over the tombs and relics of saints were of frequent occurrence. One of the Capitularies (Carol. Magn. vi. 209) required all sacramenta to be administered in a church and over relics, invoking the name of God, and those saints whose remains were below. The hands were to be placed on the relic chest (Leg. Aleman. vi. 7), or on the tomb of the saint (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Confess. c. 93), or were to be extended towards the sacred spot. (Greg. Turon. Miracul. i. 20.) All these oaths, for the confirmation of which some sacred object was beheld or touched, were called corporal oaths, juramenta corporalia, ἑρκoi σωματικοί. For further varieties of such oaths, and details of their use, see Ducange, s. v. Juramentum. They were sometimes mixed up with pagan superstitions. The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, c. 16, condemns oaths taken on the head of a wild or domestic animal. And the council in Trullo, A.D. 692, c. 94, prohibits generally, ὅρκοι Ἑλληνικοί. [G. OBEDIENCE. [DISCIPLINE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

OBITUARY. [NECROLOGIUM.]

OBLATE, (oblata, oblatio; barb. oblada, oblagia, oblia). "Oblata" is a late equivalent to "oblatio" (as proba=probatio, confessa=confessio, missa=missio, &c.). When oblatio was understood of the provision for the Eucharist it generally included both elements, e.g. "Populus dat oblationes suas; id est, panem et vinum" (Ord. Rom. ii. 6 in Mus. Ital. ii. 46); "Oblationem, i.e. panem et vinum, viri et foeminae ad missas offerunt" (Allocutio Episc. 89 in Regino; de Eccl. Discipl. ii. 5; so Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. iii. 19). The offering of bread alone was, however, also called "oblatio," as by Germanus of Paris, 555; "Dum sacerdos oblationem confrangeret" (Expos. Missae Brev. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, Ord. i.); in a Gregorian rubric in one ancient MS., "Offeruntur a populo oblationes et vinum," and by Amalarius, "Cum oblatione calix Domini auferatur de altari" (Ecloga, 22). But "oblata" was the far more common form when the bread only was intended, and from the frequency of its use, when men spoke of sacramental bread, it came at length to be applied to smaller loaves or cakes of bread for ordinary uses. Thus a writer in the 9th century speaks of "rolls of bread which are commonly called oblatae" (Iso, de Mirac. S. Othmari, ii. 3, in Surius, Nov. 16). In Quinquagesima the monks of Clugny received at supper cakes "which by men of the Roman tongue are called nebulae, by our people oblatae" (Consuet. Cluniac. i. 49 in Spicil. Dach. i. 667, ed. 2). Similarly the customs of Evesham allowed in Lent a certain quantity of wheat from the granary "ad oblatas ad caenam," and half as much on Maundy Thursday (Dugdale, Monast. i. 149, ed. 2). At length, when the Eucharistic bread was made very small and thin, wafers for sealing were called oblatae, whence the French oublie and the Spanish oblea.

Oblata was more commonly applied to the unconsecrated loaf, hostia to the consecrated. Thus in the Ordo Romanus, before the consecration, "Pontifex . . . suscipit oblatas de manu presbyteri," "Archidiaconus suscipit oblatas Pontificis" (Ord. i. 15, &c.; Sim. § 48; Ord. ii. 9, 10, iii. 13, 14, v. 8, 10), while "hostia" [HOST] is only used after (as in i. 19, ii. 13; iii. 16), of the "fraction of the hosts." Yet until "hostia" entirely superseded it, "oblata" was also occasionally used of the consecrated element. Thus in the 8th century, when the usage was quite unsettled, "Pontifex autem tangit a latere calicem cum oblata," "Rumpit oblatam ex latere dextro" (Ord. Rom. i. 16, 19). Amalarius: "Fractio oblatarum" (Ecloga, 25).

OBLATI (MONASTICI). Like the terms "conversus" and "donatus," the word "oblatus" in connexion with the monastic system has several meanings, which must be carefully distinguished, as expressing different ideas belonging to different periods in the history of monasticism. In every sense the "oblati" were a link between the world and the monastery.

In the first instance the "oblati" were children brought by their parents to the monastery, and there dedicated to the monastic life. In this sense the "oblati" were distinct from the "conversi," persons of mature age taking on themselves the vows. [CONVERSI; NOVICE.]

When monks, in course of time, ceased to be regarded as laymen, and began, by the very fact of their profession, to be ranked with the clergy, and as the original simplicity of the monastic life began to disappear, the need came to be felt of a class of persons in every monastery who should assist the monks in some of their more ordinary occupations, and so leave them more free for the services of their chapel and the meditations of their cells. At the same time these assistants were useful for purposes outside the walls of the monastery, and could be sent by the abbat or prior on various errands of a secular kind without the monks being disturbed from their devotions (Fructuosi Reg. c. 13; Isidori Reg. c. 20). In this sense the oblati were "lay-brothers," or, as Ménard explains (Commentar. ad Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxx. 5), the servants or domestics of the monastery (servi vel famuli, ib.), receiving their food and a distinctive dress from the abbat, but not bound by the same vows as their brethren in the monastery (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). The third council of Arles (A.D. 455) speaks of a "lay multitude subject to the abbat, but not owing any subjection to the bishop of the diocese" (Conc. Arelat. iii. App.). Sometimes from humility a novice, it might be of high rank, of great learning, or already in sacred orders, chose to be admitted into a monastery on this humbler footing (Alteserrae Asceticon, iii. 5; Du Cange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). Monasteries gradually enlarged their possessions; and the services of laymen were requisite not merely within the precincts, but to superintend and cultivate the land belonging to the monastery (Du Cange, ib.).

At a later period a class of "oblati" came into existence, not so closely attached to the monastic system of which they claimed to be members. In some cases persons, without assuming a distinctive dress, or residing within the monastic precincts, devoted their property to the monastery, reserving to themselves the life interest only; in others they bound themselves and their descendants to be its servants or retainers (Du Cange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). Of course in cases such as these there was no probation. The promise itself sufficed. These "oblati" or "donati" are described by Alteserra as the associates and deputies of the monks (adjuvae et vicarii conversorum), or as their servants (servi monachorum), because they dedicated themselves and their possessions to the monastery without taking on themselves the outward garb either of a cleric or of a monk (Altes.

Ascet. iii. 5). If, however, the oblate assumed the dress, he then became entitled to enjoy the privileges and immunities of the order (ib.). These associates, having been objected to in some quarters, were formally approved by pope Urban II., A.D. 1091 (ib.). Single, and even married, women were sometimes admitted on these conditions (ib.). Mabillon speaks of these "oblatus" or "donati" as not in any true sense monks (nequaquam monachi), though not uncommonly termed monks of the second order (monachi secundi ordinis). He quotes a passage from Alcuin, in the 8th century, about a number of lay brothers attached to monasteries (grex devotorum), but the term "oblatus" in this sense is of a later century (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xv. 49).

From an early period, indeed as soon as the monastic life began to command the reverence of secular potentates, these, in return for their benefactions, not infrequently sought and obtained admission into the fraternity, as out-members, in order to have their names inscribed on the roll, and mentioned in the conventual prayers. Thus Maurus, a disciple of the great Benedict, received Theodebert, king of the Franks, into the monastery afterwards called "St. Maur sur le Loire" (monasterium Glanfoliense) in the close of the 6th century, 584. (A.D. 584, Mabill. AA. O. S. B. Vita Sti. Mauri, cc. 40, 50, 51.) Similarly, many kings, nobles, and prelates during the middle ages, for instance the German emperor Frederic II., and the Greek emperor Emanuel Comnenus, claimed the honours of monkhood, without formally subjecting themselves to its discipline. In some instances grandes were admitted as oblates during sickness, or at the point of death. (Altes. Asceticon, iii. 7.) [I. G. S.]

OBLATION, THE (oblatio, sacrificium, ἀναφορά, προσφορά, θυσία, προσάγωγη, προσκομιδή). Under this name the Eucharist, the Christian thank-offering, was understood at a very early period. Thus Irenaeus, 167, referring to its institution, says that Christ taught His disciples "the new oblation of the new covenant" (Haer. iv. 17, § 5). The sacrament is with him "The oblation of the church, which the Lord taught should be offered over the whole world" (18, § 7). The Apostolical Canons speak of "the time of the holy oblation" (c. 3, comp. 8).

I. In the mind of Christians of the first liturgical period there was a much closer connexion between the oblation of bread and wine and the commemorative sacrifice than would be likely to survive the expansion and rearrangement of the original form of the ANAPHORA. For the memorial of the sacrifice of Christ appears to have been made at first by the simple offering of the bread and cup by the priest with thanksgiving (Eucharist), the account of the institution, and the Lord's Prayer. This hypothesis satisfies all the phenomena. It explains language in the fathers (see CANON OF THE LITURGY, vol. i. p. 268) which otherwise would seem ambiguous or confused; it harmonises with the fact that in the Gallican liturgies, which have admitted no change since the 8th century, that which we should now call the canon consisted to the last of the narrative of the institution only; it accounts both for the statement of Gregory I. that the canon was the composition of a scholastic, and that it was the custom of the apostles to consecrate the host of oblation "ad ipsam solummodo orationem" (Dominicam) (Epist. vii. 64), and for those anticipatory references to the effect of consecration, which occur in the prayers of oblation of so many ancient liturgies. See after, OBLATIONS, § x.

II. The Prayer of Commemorative Oblation.—By the repetition of our Lord's words at the institution, the bread and wine were declared to be thenceforth His body that was wounded, and His blood that was shed on the cross. From this point, therefore, the liturgical rite became the complete representation of His sacrifice. This was expressed in a prayer (called by modern writers from one or the other of its two elements, the Memorial or the Prayer of Oblation), in which after mention of the atoning passion (if not also, as afterwards, of the great events that followed in its train), a verbal offering of the present eucharistic sacrifice was made with prayer for its acceptance and for remission of sins, and all other benefits of that sacrifice which was commemorated by it. See, for instance, the Liturgy of St. James, or of Jerusalem, in which the priest says, "We sinners, therefore, also bearing in mind His life-giving sufferings, salutary cross and death, and resurrection from the dead on the third day, and ascension into heaven and session on Thy right hand, the God and Father, and His second, glorious, and fearful coming . . . do offer unto Thee, O Lord, this awful and unbloody sacrifice, praying that Thou deal not with us after our sins," &c. (Assem. Codex Liturg. v. 37). Similarly St. Chrysostom and St. Basil (Euchol. Goar, 77, 165); the Armenian has, "In behalf of all, and for all, we offer Thee Thine own of Thine own" (Neale, Hist. East. Church, Introd. 558). The form in St. Mark greatly resembles this (Renaud. Coll. Liturg. Orient. i. 156), as do those in the Egyptian liturgies of St. Basil and St. Gregory, both Coptic and Greek (ibid. 15, 31, 68, 105). The Coptic St. Cyril has no oblation, but the memorial of the death, &c. only (47). The Ethiopian oblation, though part of an office derived from the Coptic Jacobites, is peculiar in naming the elements, "Now also, O Lord, commemorating Thy death and resurrection, we offer unto Thee this bread and this cup," &c. (519). In all the Greek and Oriental liturgies, the prayer before us, whether beginning with the oblation or the memorial, starts from the words of institution, and is followed, properly, at once by the invocation (EPICLESIS).

It is probable that the oblation in connexion with the memorial was thought unnecessary by those who set the example of omitting it, because of the similar form which introduced the intercessions after the invocation.

In the West the prayer of oblation appeared sometimes as part of the canon, sometimes as a distinct form. It follows immediately the words of institution in the Gelasian and Gregorian canon: "Unde et memores, Domine, nos tui servi, sed et plebs tua sancta, Christi filii tui Domini Dei nostri tam beatæ passionis, necnon et ab inferis resurrectionis, sed et in caelos gloriosæ ascensionis, offerimus præclaræ majestati tuæ de tuis donis ac datis hostiam puram, hostiam sanctam, hostiam immaculatam, panem sanctum vitæ æternæ ac calicem salutis perpetuæ" (Murat. Liturg. Lat. Vet. i. 697; ii. 4). Similarly in the Romanising-

Missale Francorum and the Sacramentary of Besançon (ibid. ii. 694, 778). The Spanish and Gallican canons were very short, and the commemoration and oblation found their place in a prayer which came immediately after it, the Post Pridie of the Spanish and Post Mystrium, or Post Secreta, of the Gallican liturgies, which embraced the invocation as well. Very few, however, of those extant contain these three set forth with any distinctness, and some of those of later composition lose sight of them all. The following example from the Mozarabic Missal is complete: "Facimus, Domine, filii tui nostri Jesu Christi commemorationem, quod veniens ad nos humanam formam assumpsit, quod pro hominibus quos creaverat redimendis passionem crucis perpassus est. . . . Per ipsum Te ergo, summe Pater, exposcimus, ut hanc tue placationis hostiam, quam Tibi offerimus, e manibus nostris placatus accipias, eamque de caelis a sede placato vultu respiciens benedicas," &c. (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 15). From the Gothico-Gallican Missal we may select this: "Memores gloriosissimi Domini passionis et ab inferis resurrectionis, offerimus tibi, Domine, hanc immaculatam hostiam, rationalem hostiam, incruentam hostiam, hunc panem sanctum et calicem salutarem, obsecrantes ut infundere digneris Spiritum tuum sanctum edentibus nobis, vitam aeternam requiemque perpetuam conlatura potentibus" (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 298). This collect is of great interest, as down to the word "calicem" inclusive it agrees with a quotation by Pseudo-Ambrose (de Sacramentis, iv. 6), who was probably a Gallican bishop, Ambrose of Cahors, of the age of Charlemagne (Oudin, de Script. Eccl. i. 1827). As the Gallican books were at that time being suppressed in favour of the Roman, we probably have in this prayer a part of the Roman canon above cited varied with a view to conform it to a familiar Gallican formula. This is made more probable by the fact that the prayer in Pseudo-Ambrose continues to resemble the Roman canon from the point indicated, while it becomes wholly unlike the Gallican Post Mystrium. There is no express prayer of oblation in the old canon of Milan, which after the words of institution proceeds thus: "Haec facimus, haec celebramus, tua, Domine, praecepta servantes, et ad communionem involubilem hoc ipsum, quod corpus Domini, sumimus, mortem Dominicam nuntiamus. Tuum vero est, Omnipotens Pater, mittere nunc nobis unigenitum Filium tuum, quem inquaerentibus sponte misisti" (Murat, Lit. Lat. Vet. Dissert. i. 133).

OBLATIONS (oblaciones, munera, dona, δῶρα, προσφοραί). The presentation of offerings of various kinds and under several names is recognised by the earliest Christian writers as one of the proper functions of bishops and priests. Thus, Clement of Rome, "It will be no small sin in us, if we cast out of the overseership (ἐπισκοπῆς) those who have offered the gifts blamelessly and holily" (Epist. ad Cor. 44). This passage may be illustrated from the so-called Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 5; see Bunsen, Analecta Ante-Nicaena, ii. 379). Laymen were also said to offer. Here we need only quote a remark of Hilary the Deacon, who wrote about 360: "Quamvis enim proprio sacerdos fungatur officio, ille tamen offerre dicitur cujus nomine agit sacerdos. Ipsi enim imputatur cujus munera offeruntur" (Quaest. ex Vet. Test. 46; in App. 3 ad Opp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.). Hence, frequently in the Roman secretae, or prayers super oblata, such expressions as these, "Munera populi Tui" (Vig. S. Joh. Bapt.); "Oblationes famularumque Tuarum" (Dom. 7 post Pent.); "Oblationes populi Tui" (S. Jac. Ap. Nat.), &c.

The present article treats of the gifts or oblations above mentioned, and of the rules and usages that prevailed with regard to them. On the anthem sung during the reception of the altar oblations, see OFFERTORIUM.

I. Oblations of Bread and Wine.—A part of the oblation of the people from the first were bread and wine. Thus St. Irenaeus, 167, tells us that, as God "gave to the people (of the Jews) a precept that they should make oblations, . . . so does He now will that we also should offer on the altar often, without ceasing" (Haer. iv. 18, § 6). The 3rd apostolical canon forbids bishops or priests to "offer on the altar" (with some exceptions named) "anything beyond what was appointed by the Lord to be offered at the sacrifice." The council of Carthage, 397, renewing this prohibition, adds, in explanation, "that is, bread and wine mixed with water" (can. 24; in Cod. Afric. 37). In the Acta of Theodotus, the martyr of Ancyra, 303, we read that the governor of Galatia ordered all bread and wine to be polluted by contact with things offered to idols, "so that not even to God, the Lord of all, could a pure oblation be presented" (Bolland, May 18, p. 152; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Mart. vii. 298). Martin of Bracara, 569, in his collection from the Greek canons, inserts a prohibition like that of Carthage, but makes no exception: "It is not lawful for anything to be offered in the sanctuary but bread and wine and water" (55; Conc. Hard. iii. 397). The council of Macon, 585, finding the ancient rite neglected, "decreed that on every Lord's day an oblation of the altar should be offered by all, men and women, both of bread and wine" (can. 4; comp. Pseudo-Fabian, Hard. Conc. i. 1797). The council of Nantes, assigned by Pagi to the year 660, speaks of the "oblations which are offered by the people" for the sacrament, and "of the loaves which the faithful offer at the church," and directs their use (can. ix.). According to the Ordo Romanus, "the people give their offerings, that is, bread and wine" (Ord. ii. 6; Mss. Ital. ii. 46). So a rubric in the Gregorian Sacramentary printed by Pamelius: "After that the offertory is sung, and the oblations and wine are offered by the people" (Liturjicon, ii. 178). After the 8th century, at least, bishops inquired at their visitation, "if men and women offered an oblation, that is, bread and wine, at masses; and if the men did not, whether their wives did it for them, for themselves, and all belonging to them, as it is contained in the canon" (Regino, de Discipl. Eccl. ii. v. 89; see Conc. Matisco. A.D. 585, can. 4). Amalarius of Metz, 827: "The people make their oblations, i.e. bread and wine, after the order of Melchizedec" (De Eccl. Off. iii. 19).

II. Similar Oblations offered for the Dead.—(1) These were primitive, but the motive changed after the 3rd century. At first the eucharist was celebrated at the funeral, or at some other time after the death of a person in full communion as an act of thanksgiving for his victory. Oblations were brought to these celebrations by the friends of the deceased; but we do not find that any thought of benefit to him from these offerings was then entertained. See for information connected with the subject of this section, OBSEQUIES, §§ xxix.—xxxv.

We must distinguish between these oblations, a part of which served to the celebration of the sacrament, and those which were designed for the feast of the commemoration. It is to the latter that St. Augustine refers, when he says, "Oblationes pro spiritibus dormientium, quas vere aliquid adjuvare credendum est, super ipsas memorias non sint sumtuosae," &c. (Epist. 22 ad Aurel. 6). These were of the nature of alms, being given to the poor on behalf of the deceased. See OBSEQUIES, § xxvi.

(2) Among the prayers of oblation to be said privately at the offertory in the collection of eucharistic prayers known as the Missa Illyrici are three to be said "pro defunctis," and one both for living and dead. They begin thus, "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas, hanc oblationem quam tibi offero pro anima," &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, ord. 4). The MS. is not older than the 10th century, but the prayers may be earlier. None of them have been adopted for open use in the Missae Defunctorum of the church of Rome. The same prayer occurs in the Codex Ratoldi (who died 986), before the Super oblata (Ménard, in Sacram. Greg. Opp. Greg. Ben. iii. 486).

There was evidently at a somewhat early period a temptation to defraud the dead of their oblations. The council of Carthage, 398, implies that the surviving friends were sometimes guilty of this: "Let them who either refuse to the churches the oblations of the departed or give them with difficulty be excommunicated, as persons who starve the needy" (can. 95). The 4th canon of Vaison, 442, dwells on this crime at some length, and orders the offenders to be "cast out of the church as unbelievers." The 47th of the council of Arles, 452, adopts by name the decree of Vaison. See to the same effect Conc. Matiscon. 581, can. 4. It is probable that many of those who withheld the usual offerings were influenced by the teaching of Aërius, who rejected all prayer and offerings for the departed (Epiphan. adv. Haer. lxxv. 3).

(3) The very nature of the sacrament implies that many might be commemorated under one oblation. Yet we are told of some who doubted this (Walaf. Strabo, de Reb. Eccl. 22). A similar error seems to have required correction in the East; for a canon of Nicophorus of Constantinople declares that "he does not sin who offers one oblation for three persons" (can. 11; Monum. Graec. Cotel. iii. 446).

III. From whom and for whom received.—(1) Epiphanius, 368, tells us generally that the church "receives oblations from those who commit no injustice, and are not transgressors of the law, but live in righteousness" (De Fide, 24). The bishop was to decide on the fitness of an offerer. Constit. Apost. iv. 6: "It behoves the bishop to know whose oblations he ought to receive and whose not." Disqualifications for baptism would also be disqualifications for offering. Among these were the professions of the actor, charioteer, gladiator, racer, fencing-master, olympic, piper, harper, lyrist, dancer, astrologer, &c. (Const. Ap. viii. 32; Coptic. vi. 78; Tattam. 167).

The oblations of all non-communicants were rejected. "Bishops ought not to receive gifts from him who does not communicate" (Conc. Illyb. 313, can. 28). In fact, with one exception, they were not present when the offerings were made (Conc. Valent. 524, can. 1). The consistentes [PENITENCE] formed the one exception. They were present, but could not offer.

Persons not in charity were forbidden to offer as well as to receive. See Optatus (De Schism. Donat. vi. 1); the council of Carthage, 398 (can. 93); the council of Toledo, 675 (can. 4; and Capit. Reg. Fr. vii. 242); Gregory II. A.D. 715 (Capitulare, 11).

By the 94th canon of Carthage, 398, the priests are to reject the oblations of those who oppress the poor. It was for an act of tyranny that the offering of Valens at Caesarea, 393, was not received by St. Basil (Greg. Naz. Orat. 43 and 52).

(2) With regard to the oblations of the dead, the general principle is thus stated by Leo, A.D. 440: "Horum causa Dei iudicio reservanda est. . . Nos autem quibus viventibus non communicavimus, mortuis communicare non possumus" (Epist. ii. ad Rust. 8; comp. Ep. lxxxiii. ad Theod. 3). St. Cyprian ordered that "no oblations should be made for the falling asleep" of one who had, in contravention of the canons, made a presbyter his executor, and he says that this was in accordance with the practice of his predecessors (Epist. i. ad Furnit.). See OBSEQUIES, § xl.

IV. The Sacramental Bread and Wine taken out of these Oblations.—St. Cyprian, reproving a rich woman who brought no offering herself, says that she "took part of the sacrifice which a poor person offered" (De Opere et Eleemos.) St. Augustine: "The priest receives from thee that which he may offer for thee" (Enarr. in Psalmos, 129, § 7). St. Caesarius, 506: "Offer oblations to be consecrated on the altar. A man able to afford it ought to blush, if he has communicated from the oblation of another" (Serm. 66, § 2). In John the Deacon's Life of Gregory the Great is the story of a woman who was corrected by a miracle for smiling in disbelief, when she heard the oblation, which she recognised as made by herself, called "the body of the Lord" (ii. 41). In the Ordo Romanus of the 9th century, the archdeacon takes from the whole mass of oblations, "et ponit tantas (oblata) super altare quante populo sufficere" (Ord. iii. § 13; Mus. Ital. ii. 57). And somewhat later: "Accipiat (diaconus) ex ipsis oblati quantum ei videtur; et ponat desuper altare" (v. 8; ibid. 67). Compare Pseudo-Clement, Ep. ad Jacob. in Hard. Conc. i. 50. Hincmar of Rheims, 852, provides for the use of those "oblates which are offered by the people, and are more than are required for the consecration" (Capit. i. c. 7).

V. In what Vessels offered and received.—In the West the bread was presented by the offerer in a fanon of white linen, and received in a vessel or cloth called offertorium (see FANON (3), vol. i. p. 661, and OFFERTORIUM, (2) (3)). The wine was brought in amulae [AMA, vol. i.

p. 71], and poured into a "calix major" [CHALICE, ib. p. 340]; whence, if the offerings were large, it was transferred, if necessary, to a SCYPHUS.

VI. Where these Oblations were received.—It is probable that at first all who offered bread and wine, and perhaps oblations of various other kinds, drew near to the altar and there presented their gifts to the deacons. Thus, in the East, Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, speaks of a layman "going to" and "standing at the table" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 9). The same writer implies that, except at certain times, even women "went up to the holy table" (Epist. ad Basil. 2). In the 4th century, however, we find a different rule. The council of Laodicea, probably in 365 (can. 19), after settling the time at which the laity shall "give the peace, and so the oblation be celebrated," adds, "And it is lawful for those in holy orders alone to enter the altar-place" (Θυσιαστήριον; see Voigtius, de Altaribus, ii. 28). Another canon (44) of the same council forbids women to enter it. The council in Trullo, 691: "Let it not be permitted to any one whomsoever among the laity to go into the sacred altar-place" (can. 69). There was an exception, however, "in accordance with a very old tradition," in favour of the emperor, "when he should desire to offer gifts to the Creator" (ibid.). Evidence of the alleged tradition occurs in the story of Theodosius, 390, who at Constantinople not only "brought his gifts to the holy table," but was expected to remain within the inclosure (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 18). Theodosius the Younger, in 431, says of himself: "We draw near to the most holy altar for the oblation of the gifts only" (Edict. Labb. Conc. iii. 1237). Turning to the West, we find Theodosius at Milan, 390, "when the time summoned to offer the gifts for the holy table, rising up and going on to the sacarium" (τῶν ἀνακτόρων; Theodoret, u. s.). In France, in the 6th century, the laity communicated in the chancel, and therefore, we infer, offered there. Thus the council of Tours, 567: "Let the holy of holies be open to laymen and women, that they may pray there and communicate, as the custom is" (can. 4). Theodulf of Orleans, 797, says: "Let not women on any account draw near to the altar when the priest is celebrating mass, but stand in their places, and let the priest receive their oblations there to offer them to God" (Capita ad Presbyt. 6). Laymen are only cautioned lest they provoke the fate of Uzzah (ibid.). In the fifth book of the Capitularies of the French Kings (collected about 845) is a law, not traced to any earlier source, which orders that "notice shall be given to the people that they offer oblations to God every Lord's day, and that the said oblations will be received outside of the inclosure of the altar" (c. 371). Similarly, Herard of Tours, 858, cap. 72. At Rome, 730, at a pontifical mass, we find the oblations of the nobles received in the senatorium ("quod est locus principum"; Ord. Rom. iii. 12), those of the rest of the people in the body of the church, the receivers going first to the men's side and then to the women's (Ord. Rom. i. 13; comp. ii. 9; iii. 12; v. 8). The priests and deacons offered last, and "before the altar" (ii. 9). "They alone," says Amalarius, "approach the altar whose ministry is about the altar" (Ecloga, 19). Somewhat later the laity seem to have gone all to one place to present their offerings; for the revised Ordo says: "Let him (the bishop) be led by a presbyter and the archdeacon to the place where the oblations are offered by the faithful laity, whether men or women" (Ord. v. 9).

VII. Prayer of the Offerer.—It is to be supposed that a devout worshipper would always say a silent prayer when presenting his gift. In the collection known as the Missa Illyrica some short forms are suggested for use at this time (Martene, Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, ord. iv.).

VIII. By whom received from the Offerers.—In general the oblations were taken, not by the celebrant, but by a deacon or sub-deacon, if present. None of the ministers of Basil, we are told, came forward to receive the oblations of Valens, because they did not know his mind about them (Greg. Naz. Orat. 43, § 52); from which it is clear that it was at that time no part of the bishop's duty to take them even from the hand of the emperor. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610: "The sub-deacons receive the oblations from the faithful in the temple of God" (Etymol. vii. xii. 23; De Eccl. Off. ii. 10; Amalar. de Eccl. Off. ii. 11; Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 8; Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 816, i. 6). In an "Allocutio ad Subdiaconum Ordinandum," in the missal of the Franks, it appears to be implied that the sub-deacon not only received the oblations, but separated at his discretion as much as would be required for the communicants (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 303). Pseudo-Clement, in the 8th or 9th century, speaks of the "minister of the altar," i.e. in strictness, the deacon, as "taking the oblation of the holocaust from the offerers" (Epist. ad Jacob. Hard. Conc. i. 50). In a pontifical mass at Rome in the 8th century the oblations of bread offered by the nobles were received by the bishop himself, the archdeacon following to receive the AMULAE. The regentary sub-deacon took the loaves from the pontiff and gave them to another sub-deacon, by whom they were placed in a larger sheet of linen ("corporale, id est sindonem," Ord. Rom. ii. 9; "lineum pallium," v. 8) held by two acolytes. The amulae were emptied by the archdeacon into a flagon (scyphus) carried by an acolyte. The other offerings of bread were received by the bishop whose weekly turn it was, who himself put them into the sindon borne after him. A deacon takes the amulae, and pours their contents into a scyphus (Ord. Rom. i. § 13; comp. ii. 9; iii. 12; v. 8). But Remigius of Auxerre, A.D. 880, represents the priest as taking the oblations, though he supposes a deacon present: "Suscipit interim (while the offertory is being sung) sacerdos a populo oblata" (De Celebr. Miss. ad calc. Pseudo-Alcuin. de Div. Off.). So Ahyto of Bâle, 811, directs that, "when the oblates are offered by the women, they be received by the presbyters at the chancel screen, and so brought to the altar" (Capitula 16).

IX. By whom set on the Altar.—In the West this was the office of the deacon. Thus Isidore says that it belongs to the Levites "oblationes inferre et disponere" (Epist. ad Leudefr. 8; comp. Etymol. vii. xii. 23; Conc. Aquisgr. 816, i. 7); i.e. "inferunt oblationes in altaria, com-panunt mensam Domini" (De Eccl. Off. ii. 8). It was thought that the propriety of this usage was indicated by the fact that the first deacons were chosen to "serve tables" (De Eccl. Off. iii. 19). Rabanus says: "Levitae offerunt oblationes in altaria" (De Instit. Cler. i. 7; comp. with Isid. above). At Rome, in a pontifical mass in the 8th century, the archdeacon, receiving the oblates from the sub-deacons, set them on the altar. Then he takes the bishop's amula, and pours the contents through a strainer into a chalice, and similarly those of the deacons. The sub-deacon receives the water offered by the choir from the precentor, and "pours it crosswise into the chalice." Next, the bishop, going to the altar, takes the oblates from the presbyter of the week and the deacons. The archdeacon then takes the bishop's oblates from the oblationary (sub-deacon), and gives them to the bishop, who sets these on the altar himself. The archdeacon then takes the chalice from the regionary sub-deacon, and, putting the OFFERTORIUM through the handles, sets it on the altar near the bishop's oblates on the right (Ord. Rom. i. 14, 15; comp. ii. 9; iii. 14, 15; v. 8; vi. 9).

In the East this appears to have been generally the part of the celebrant. The Apostolical canons imply as much when they forbid bishops and presbyters to bring and set on the altar (προσφέρειν ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον) anything but bread, wine, &c. (can. 3). The Clementine liturgy says: "Let the deacons bring the gifts to the bishop at the altar" (Constit. Apost. viii. 12). The liturgy of St. James: "The priest bringing in the holy gifts says this prayer" (of oblation, Assem. Codex Liturg. v. 17). In the Syrian offices the celebrant "brings the eucharistic bread on to the altar" (Liturg. Orient. Coll. Renaud. ii. 3), and the same usage prevails among the Copts and Abyssinians (ibid. i. 185-188). The Nestorian rites vary (Badger's Nestorians, ii. 218; Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. 436). In the later Greek liturgy, at the "great entrance" the deacon brings in the paten, the priest the chalice; but the latter sets both on the holy table (Eucholog. Goar, 73).

X. By whom presented to God.—Deacons, as we have seen, might set the oblations on the altar, but only a bishop or priest could offer them to God. "Deacons have no authority to offer" (Conc. Nic. 325, can. 18). The principle was that "exordium ministerii a summo est sacerdote" (Pseudo-Ambr. de Sacram. iii. i. § 4); and as the power of the priest himself was derived, he could not delegate it. "Apart from the bishop," says Ignatius the martyr, "it is not lawful to baptize or to celebrate an agape," which included the eucharist (Ad Smyrn. 7), where the interpolator has, "or to offer, or to bring sacrifice, or to celebrate a feast." Hence priests were forbidden to "celebrate masses" in any diocese without the sanction of the bishops (Conc. Vernense, 755, can. 8). The bishop was the offerer by himself or by the priest, and therefore in the language of the earliest period a good bishop was one who "offered the gifts blamelessly and holily" (Clem. Rom. Epist. i. 44).

XI. How offered by the Celebrant. Prayers of Oblation.—At first "the whole of that action was accomplished in silence" (Bona, Rev. Liturg. ii. viii. § 2; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i.

iv. vi. 16; and others). It must not be inferred, however, that the primitive church did not regard the action of the celebrant with respect to the unconsecrated gifts as a distinct offering of them to God. It only means that such an oblation was not verbally made when they were set on the altar, though implied in the long eucharistic prayer which immediately followed. St. Irenaeus expressly says that Christ, in instituting the sacrament, "taught the new oblation of the New Testament, which the church throughout the world offers to God who gives us aliments—the first-fruits of His gifts in the New Testament" (c. Haer. iv. 17, § 5). "This pure oblation the church alone offers to the Creator, offering it to Him of His own creature with thanksgiving" (ibid. 18, § 4). Hence it is evident that he who said the eucharistic prayer was believed to offer the elements to God. Such an oblation is assumed, though not expressed, in the long preface (the original εὐχαριστία) of the Clementine Liturgy. All other liturgies have a distinct prayer of oblation introduced, as we must suppose, at some later period. It is always said by the celebrant, and was probably at first only a clearer expression of an oblation of the good creatures of God then lying before him. This is evidently the meaning of the earlier and simpler forms; but the later, as will be seen, introduce thoughts which must appear entirely out of place. We will begin with those which are true to their original intention. In St. Mark, after the cry of the deacon, "Pray for the offerers," "the priest says the prayer of proposition," in which is the following petition, "Cause Thy face to shine upon this bread and on these cups which the all-holy table receives through the ministry of angels and attendance of arch-angels and service of the priesthood" (Renaud. i. 143). This is only a prayer for the acceptance of the gifts expressed in a lofty style, nor can we see more than this in St. James: "Thyself bless this offering" (πρόθευν; comp. Heb. ix. 2; Matt. xii. 4), "and receive it on to Thine altar above the heavens" (Assem. u. s.). In St. Basil's "prayer of oblation" (εὐχή προσκομιδῆς) the celebrant prays chiefly for himself that he may rightly fulfil his office, but also for the acceptance of the offerings, "Of Thy goodness, O Lord, receive these gifts from the hands of us sinners" (Goar, 164). In St. Chrysostom, however, which has long been the common liturgy of the Greeks, the prayer would be more suitable after the consecration, for it is an invocation [EPICLEISIS], "that this our sacrifice may be acceptable unto Thee, and that the good spirit of Thy grace may make His abode on us, and on these gifts, and on all Thy people" (Goar, 74).

In all the Eastern liturgies of later revision there is the same tendency that we observe in St. Chrysostom, to anticipate the consecration, or to confound the previous oblation of the elements with that of the sacramental body and blood. Thus in the Armenian: "Do Thou to whom we bring this sacrifice accept this offering from us and make it the mystery of the body and blood of Thine only begotten Son, and grant unto us who are partakers of them that this bread and wine may be for the healing and pardoning of our sins" (Neale, u. s. 444).

In the West there was no unvarying verbal oblation of the elements until after the 12th century (Microl. A.D. 1160, De Eccl. Observ. 11). Five have become of obligation since, viz. (1), "Suscipe, Sancte Pater, omnipotens aeterna Deus, hanc immaculatam hostiam," &c.; (2), "Offerimus Tibi," &c.; (3), "In spiritu humilitatis," &c. (which appear to be borrowed from Spain; Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 2, 232; see below); (4), "Veni Sanctificator," &c. (which is Gallican; Microl. u. s. 11; see below); and (5), "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas," &c., which is both Ambrosian (Pamel. Rituale PP. i. 298) and Gallican (Microl. u. s.; see below). Long, however, before any of these prayers are known to have been even in private use, there was a variable collect in the sacramentaries, called in the Gelasian the secretæ ("because it is said secretly"; Amal. de Off. Eccl. iii. 20); and in the Gregorian either secretæ or oratio super oblata, in which the oblations were directly or indirectly offered. The following is an example from the so-called Leonian sacramentary: "We beseech Thee, O Lord, that the gifts of Thy people may be acceptable to Thee through the intercessions of the blessed apostles (SS. Peter and Paul); that as they are offered to Thy Name for their triumphs, so they may be perfected by their merits; through," &c. (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 330).

During the whole office of oblation an anthem of three verses was sung; the first of which, called the OFFERTORY, was repeated between the second and the third until the offerings were all brought up, and the celebrant said "Orate" (Ord. Rom. ii. 9). "In offenditis revertuntur versus, dum offenda repetitur" (Remig. Autiss. in Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 40). See examples in Antiphonarium Gregor. (Opp. iii. 653 et seq., ed. Ben.).

In the Milanese rite the celebrant says in a loud voice, "Receive, most merciful Father, this holy bread, this cup, wine mixed with water, that it may become the body, the blood, of Thine only begotten," &c. (Pamel. u. s. 297). This is followed by later prayers said secretly, and by a variable "Oratio super Oblata alta voce dicenda" (see MISSA VIII. (2) (c)), which corresponds, though said aloud, to the Roman secretæ. In the Gallican liturgies, suppressed in the 8th century, there is no constant form of oblation; there was, however, a Collectio post Nomina corresponding to the secretæ of Rome. See examples in MISSA VIII. (3) (e). The Mozarabic priest says four distinct prayers of oblation: (1) over the bread and cup, "May this oblation . . . which we offer for our sins, be acceptable to Thy Majesty," &c.; (2) over the cup only, "We offer unto Thee, O Lord, this cup for the benediction of the blood of Thy Son," &c.; (3) setting the cup on the altar and placing the veil (filioiam) over it, he says, "We beseech Thee, O Lord, graciously to accept this oblation, and to pardon the sins of all the offerers for whom it is offered unto Thee, through," &c.; (4) "In spiritu humilitatis," &c. (Leslie, u. s.), of which "Veni . . . Sanctificator" (above) is in this liturgy a continuation. The sacrificium (the Mozarabic offertory) is then sung; some prayers of preparation follow, and the celebrant having said, "Offerunt Deo Domino sacerdotes nostri, Papa Romanensis et reliqui, pro se," &c., and read the names of those commemorated, this part of the liturgy closes with the Oratio post Nomina (see MISSA viii. (4) (d)).

We observe in many of these Latin prayers of oblation the same departure from their original intention that was noticed in several of the Eastern forms. Thus in the Roman Missal we have, "Receive this immaculate host* which I offer . . . for my numberless sins," &c. Similarly in a Mozarabic Post Nomina (Leslie, 39). For attempted explanations see Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. ix. 3; Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe, iii. vi. 2; Romsée, Sens. Rit. Miss. xiv. 5; and others. They amount to this: "Qu'en commençant à offrir le pain nous parlons déjà comme si nous offrions cette hostie sans tache qui est l'unique, dont l'offrande puisse nous laver de nos péchés" (Le Br.). Many Roman secretæ contain a similar assumption (Sacr. Greg. ii. 46). Similar incongruities occur in Gallican collects Post Nomina (Miss. Goth. 191).

It may be conjectured that the foregoing anomalies first made their appearance when an attempt was made in an age of decaying learning and intelligence to simplify, by breaking up and rearranging, the prolonged eucharistia, which originally embraced both the oblation of the gifts when brought to the celebrant, and all that belonged to, and was connected with, the subsequent consecration.

XII. The Remainder of the Consecrated Oblations.—No uniform mode of disposing of them prevailed during any part of our period either in the East or West. For a considerable time a part was sent to the absent, and a part taken away by the communicants for daily use at home. [RESERVATION.] A part was also in some places, from the 6th to the 8th century inclusive, sent to other churches, as FERMENTUM. We have to speak here of the part that still remained when due provision had been made for these purposes. Evagrius, near the end of the 6th century, tells us that "it was an ancient custom in the royal city (Constantinople), whenever a large quantity of the holy particles of the undefiled body of Christ, our God, was left over, for uncorrupted boys of those that attended the school of the undermaster to be sent for to consume them" (Eccl. Hist. iv. 36). From the testimony of Nicephorus Callistus, who had himself, when a boy at that school, communicated in this manner, we learn that the custom survived till the earlier part of the 14th century, if not later (Hist. Ecoles. xvii. 25). At Jerusalem, however, as we know from the authority of Hesychius the patriarch, 601, "whatever happened to be left unconsumed was given to the fire," as were the remains of the sacrifices mentioned in Exod. xii. 10 (Explan. in Levit. (viii. 32) ii.). In the West the council of Mâcon, 585, decreed that "whatever remains of the sacrifices shall be left in the sacrum after the mass is ended, innocent children be brought to the church by him whose office it is on the Wednesday or Friday, and, a (subsequent) fast having been prescribed them [FASTING, § 8], receive the said remains sprinkled with wine."

* This phrase occurs with proper application in a Gallican Post Secreta, and, therefore, after the consecration: "Offerimus tibi, Domine, hanc immaculatam hostiam . . . Obsecrans ut infundere digneris Spiritum tuum sanctum edentibus nobis," &c. (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 298.)

(can. 6). The following order occurs in one of the forged decretals about 830, but probably derived from an earlier document: "But if any shall remain, let them not be reserved till the morrow, but consumed by the care of the clerks, with fear and trembling. But let not those who consume the remains of the Lord's body that have been left in the sacrament come together immediately to take common food," &c. (Epist. Clem. ad Jac.; Hard. Conc. i. 50; see the same as Præcepta Petri in S. Leon. Opera, ed. Baller. iii. 674). That this latter usage was widely spread in the West we may infer from the appearance of the above passage from Pseudo-Clemens in Regino (de Eccl. Discipl. i. 195; Burchard, Decr. v. 11; and Gratian, Decr. iii. De Consecr. ii. 23).

XIII. Disposal of the Unconsecrated Surplus.—The Apostolical Constitutions (both texts): "The eulogiae that are over and above in the mystic rites let the deacons distribute among the clergy, according to the discretion of the bishop or the presbyters—to the bishop, four parts; to a presbyter, three parts; to a deacon, two parts; and to the rest, subdeacons, or readers, or singers, or deaconesses, one part" (viii. 31; in the Coptic Canons of the Apostles, tr. Tattam, c. 75). They are here called eulogiae, because blessed through being offered. Theophilus of Alexandria, A.D. 385: "Let the clerks divide those things which are offered on account of the sacrifice (that remain) after those consumed for the use of the mysteries, and let not a catechumen eat or drink thereof, but rather the clerks and the faithful brethren with them" (can. 7; Hard. Conc. i. 2000). These oblations are spoken of under the name of eulogiae by Socrates, who says that Chrysanthus, the Novatian bishop at Constantinople, "received nothing from the churches, only taking two loaves of the eulogiae on the Lord's day" (Eccl. Hist. vii. 2). John Moschus, A.D. 630, relates the story of a monk who, being employed to distribute eulogiae, "which the deacons had set on the holy altar," happened to say over them the words of consecration, and thus, as it was afterwards revealed, unintentionally consecrated them (Prat. Spirit. 25).

We have less distinct information of the disposal of the superfluous oblations at an early period in the West. The earlier drafts of the Ordo Romanus tell us nothing; but from Ordo vi. (Mabill.) we learn that, after all the oblations of the clergy and people had been placed on the altar, fresh loaves were brought to the archdeacon, from which the bishop took what he thought proper for consecration, and then gave all the rest back to the archdeacon, "who gave them in charge to the custos of the church for safe keeping" (§ 9). This belongs to a period at which fewer communicated than during the 7th century. We are not told how these remains were employed, but it is probable that in the West the superfluous oblations of a festival served for the celebrations of other days; for we are told in the Life of St. Augustine, by Possidius, that he would sometimes in church admonish the faithful for "their neglect of the gazophylacium and secretarium, from which the things needful for the altar are brought in" (24). According to St. Ambrose, the custos was a deacon: "Haec quanti consilii sit prospicere, non ignoratis. Et ideo eligitur Levita qui sacramentum custodiat" (De Off. Min. i. 50, § 265). Gifts for the altar were put into the SACRARIUM or SECRETARIUM; those for the poor, the clergy, or the church, into the GAZOPHYLACIUM.

As the excess of bread and wine offered for the sacrament gradually decreased, so it ceased to form part of the ordinary provision for the clergy, and was distributed only as a token of communion, or blessed for the antidoron. [EULOGIAE.] This last application is expressly ordered by the council of Nantes, perhaps in 657 (can. 9; Hard. vi. 459), and after it by Hincmar, 852 (Ad Presbyt. 7).

XIV. Other Altar Oblations.—The third apostolical canon, as we have it, after forbidding anything but what Christ appointed to be offered on the altar (naming HONEY AND MILK [see vol. i. p. 783; Tertull. de Cor. Mil. 3; Id. adv. Marc. i. 14; Clem. Alex. Paedag. i. vi. 50, 51; Hieron. adv. Luwif. 8; Joan. Diac. Epist. ad Senar. (12) in Mus. Ital. i. 75; Sacram. Leon. in Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 318; Ratoldi Pontif. in Ménard, Sacram. Greg. n. 338; Ordo Romanus in Hittorp. 87; Apost. Const. Copt. ii. 46, Tattam's tr. 62; or Boetticher's in Bunsen's Analecta Antenicæna, ii. 468; Ordo Bapt. Aethiop. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. xv. 16), "sicera, birds, or any living things, or legumes"), adds, "except new grains or grapes in their season" [FRUITS, OFFERING OF]. The second book of the Coptic Canons of the Apostles, the Coptic form of the Constitutions, permits "the blessing of the grape, the fig, the pomegranate, the olive, the prune, the apple, the peach, the cherry, and the almond." Again: "It shall be that they shall offer flowers: let them offer a rose and the lily" (c. 54; Tattam's tr. p. 74; or Boetticher's, u. s. 471). The Greek canon proceeds: "But let it not be permitted to offer anything else upon the altar, in the time of the holy oblation, than oil for the lamp [OIL] and incense" (Beveridge, Works, xi. xxxix. Oxf. 1848). [INCENSE, Vol. I. pp. 830, 831.] Oil for another purpose—viz. for the unction after baptism—was offered at the altar in Africa before the probable date of the above canon. Thus St. Cyprian, 255, speaks of chrism as "the oil hallowed on the altar" (Epist. 70). Much later, in Pseudo-Dionysius, the bishop "takes the μύρον, and sets it on the holy altar" (De Eccl. Hier. iv. 2). According to the Ordo Romanus, however, this oil was brought "ante altare," and there consecrated (Ord. i. 31; app. 7).

XV. Deeds of Gift, &c. laid on the Altar, or held before or over it.—By a law of the Frank king Dagobert, A.D. 630, all free persons who gave ought "to the church for the ransom of their soul," "vills, lands, serfs, or any money," were to confirm the gift by an "epistle" under their own hand before six or more witnesses, who were to subscribe the deed. "And then let him place the said epistle on the altar, and so deliver the money itself in the presence of the priest who serves there" (Capit. Reg. Franc. Baluze, i. 95). Sim. Lex Alamannorum, eod. ann. (ibid. 57). In 803 Charlemagne received a petition from his states, in which they asked for greater security for gifts made to the church, on the ground that the donor "makes a writing of those things which he desires to give to God, and holds the writing itself in his hand before or over (coram altari aut supra) the altar, saying to the priests and guardians of the place, 'I offer and dedicate to God all the things which are set down in this paper, for the remission of my sins, and of the sins of my parents and children' (or for whatever he shall wish to make them over to God for), for the service of God out of these things in sacrifices, and celebrations of masses, in prayers, lights, the maintenance of the poor and the clergy, and other forms of service to God, and of usefulness to this church." They were offered under expressed pain of sacrilege if the church were robbed of them (Cap. Baluz. u. s. i. 407; or in the collection of Benedict, vi. 370).

It was probably a very frequent custom to lay valuable gifts of any kind, of small size, on the altar, apart from the eucharistic service, with or without such a deed as is described above. Thus "a devout man" in the 6th century "placed on the altar of the church" of St. Nazaire, near Nantes, a belt most carefully wrought, of the purest gold, with all its furniture. He gave it "ad reficiendos pauperes," but with prayer for the aid of the martyr in his needs (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Mart. 61).

XVI. Oblations not set on the Altar.—"All things that are offered to God are without doubt also consecrated. And not only are the sacrifices which are consecrated to the Lord on the altar called oblations of the faithful; but whatever offerings are offered to Him by the faithful, whether consisting of serfs or arable lands, vineyards, woods, meadows, waters, or watercourses, furniture, books, utensils, stones, buildings, garments, woollen fabrics, cattle, pastures, parchments, movables and immovables, or whatsoever things are done to the praise of God, or can furnish supply and ornament to holy church and her priests, by whomsoever they are of free will offered to God and His church, these all undoubtedly are consecrated to God and belong to the right of the priests" (Capit. ii. Car. Magn. A.D. 814, c. 12; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 522; in Benedict's collection, vi. 407; Cap. Herardi, 65; Isaac Ling. vii. 7).

(a) Charitable Gifts.—Justin Martyr, in Samaria, A.D. 140, tells us that, when the Christians of his day met on the Sunday for prayer and the holy communion, "those who were prosperous, and wished to do it, gave each as he determined beforehand what he would, and that the collection was laid up with the presiding (elder), who personally relieved orphans and widows and those who were in distress from sickness or any other cause, and those in bonds and strangers sojourning among them, and in a word took care of all who were in any necessity" (Apol. i. 67). Tertullian at Carthage, A.D. 199: "Though there be a sort of (money) chest, the amount in it is not got together from payment as for a religion that is bought. Every person once a month, or when he will, and only if he will and be able, places therein a moderate gift; for no one is forced, but gives it of his own accord. These are, as it were, the deposits of piety; for therefrom are dispensed portions, not for feasts or drinking bouts, or thankless haunts of voracity, but for feeding and burying the needy, and for boys and girls destitute of means and of parents, and for the aged confined now to the house, also for the shipwrecked, and for any who become pensioners on their confession, in the mines or the islands, or in prisons, if only it be for the sake of the way of God" (Apol. 39). Caesarius of Arles, 502, considers it the part of a good Christian, "when he comes to church," to "offer according to his ability money or food for the poor" (Serm. 77, § 2; comp. Serm. 76, § 2). Similarly Pirminius, 750: "Quando ad ecclesiam convenitis, pauperibus secundum vires vestras aut argentum aut aliud aliquid porrigite" (Scarapsus in Vetera Analecta, Mabill. 72; ed. 2). Isidore of Seville, 595, says that it was part of the duty of the archdeacon to "receive the money collected from the communion" (Ep. ad Leudefr. 12).

The fourth apostolical canon, referring to the grapes and corn mentioned in the third, says, "But let every other fruit be sent away into the house (or chamber, oikos, the GAZOPHYLACIUM or Domus Ecclesiae, Possid. Vita August. 24), as first-fruits for the bishop and the presbyters, but not brought to the altar." In the Life of St. Augustine (u. s. see above § xiii.) a distinction is made between offerings for the gazophylacium and for the secretarium. We learn there also how the former were applied: "He was always mindful of his companions in poverty, and used to distribute to them from the same source as to himself and all his household, viz. from the revenues of the church, or even from the oblations of the faithful" (23). A feast for the poor was often the object of an oblation. Thus Paulinus, A.D. 405, relates (Poema xx. 317) how a pig was reared with this intention. Two other instances are mentioned by this author in the same poem (lines 67, 389).

(b) Offerings were also made for the furniture of the church, and of a lamb at Easter. [LAMB, OFFERING OF.]

XVII. To whom the Oblations were intrusted.—All oblations of whatever kind were given to the bishop in trust. "That which is collected," says Justin Martyr, "is laid up with him who presides" (Apol. 67). Among the earlier of the apostolical canons are two (39, 41) which place the whole property of the church from whatever source derived in the hands of the bishop in trust for the poor and the clergy, himself included. Hence the precept addressed to the bishops in the Constitutions (ii. 25): "Dispense the offerings to the orphans and widows and afflicted and strangers . . . giving their shares to all in want, and yourselves using the things of the Lord, but not devouring them alone; but sharing them with the needy, be ye without offence before God. . . . It is right for you, O bishops, to be nourished from the things brought into the church; but not to devour them." This is in the purer text also (Bunsen, Analecta Antenicæna, ii. 256). See further under PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD.—The heathen fear of evil, if the body were left unburied or neglected, was unknown to the Christian from the first. "All those things, that is to say, the arrangement of the funeral, the state attendance on the burial, the pomp of obsequies, are rather consolations of the living than advantages to the dead" (Aug. De Civ. Dei, i. 12; so Serm. 172, § 3, and De Cur. pro Mort. ii. § 4; comp. St. Chrysostom, Hom. iv. in Heb. § 5; see after, § viii.). But "not on that account are the bodies of the departed to be spurned and flung aside; and least of all those of the righteous and faithful, of which the Spirit has made use as organs and instruments for the performance of all good works" (De Civ. 13; De Cur. iii. § 5). It was inferred from various references in holy Scripture (Gen. xlvii. 30, i. 2, 24; Tob. ii. 9, xii. 12; &c.), and especially from the narrative of our Lord's burial, that "the bodies of the dead are subjects of the providence of God, to whom even such works of piety are well pleasing" (De Civ. u. s.). But the future resurrection of the body was the chief ground of present care for it; it could not be right, they thought, deliberately to destroy and dissipate that for which God designed a glorious future. Thus Prudentius, Hymn. in Exeq. De-funct. i. 45:—

"Hinc maxima cura sepulchris
Impenditur; hinc resolutos
Honor ultimus accipit artus
Et funeris ambitus ornat."

1. The Laying-out of the Body.—The first solemn circumstance was the formal composure of the whole body: "They put the hands together, close the eyes, put the head straight, draw down the feet (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Job. Hom. i. § 2). Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, says that during the plague the Christians of that city "took up the bodies of the saints (who died of it) in their arms and laps, closed their eyes and mouths, carried them on their shoulders, and laid them out," &c. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 22.). St. Augustine closed his mother's eyes with his own hands (Confess. ix. 12, § 29). Pseudo-Epiphanius, apostrophising Joseph of Arimathea, says: "Dost thou then with thy fingers close, as becomes the dead, the eyes of Jesus, who, with His undefiled finger, opened the eye of the blind? And dost thou close the mouth of Him who opened the mouth of the dumb?" (De Sepulchro Dom. inter Opp. Epiph. iv. 17; ed. Dind.).

II. The Washing.—Rites followed which had long been common to all the more civilised races.

There is a reference to the washing in the case of Dorcas (Acts ix. 37); and the practice was so much a matter of course among Christians that we find Pseudo-Epiphanius (u. s.) and others assuming incidentally that the body of our Lord was so treated. Tertullian alludes to it when he says, "I can be stiff and pale after a bath when dead" (Apol. 42). Gregory Nazianzen asks those who delay their baptism, if they are "waiting that they may be washed when dead" (De Bapt. i. 648). The ceremonial importance of the action in France in the 6th century is evident from the frequency with which it is mentioned by Gregory of Tours, when we can discover no other reason for his noticing it (Hist. Franc. ii. 5; iv. 5; vii. 1; De Glor. Conf. 75; Vitæ Patr. xiv. 4). See other examples of men, Hist. Franc. vi. 46; De Glor. Conf. 81; Vitæ PP. x. 4 ("corpus sacerdos ablutum recondit in tumulo"); ibid. xiii. 3. Similarly of women, "Having been washed by other women, she was buried" (De Glor. Conf. 16). Miracles are said by Bede to have been wrought by the earth on which the water used in washing the body of St. Cuthbert had been thrown (Vita S. Cuthb.). To come to the end of our period, the body of Charlemagne is said to have been washed "more solemnly" (Eginhard. in Vita, c. 9, § 36).

III. The Beard, &c., cut.—At one period there was a custom of shaving the head, at least in France. When the body of St. Eloy, who died about 665, was removed from its first resting-place, "his beard and hair, which had been shaved off according to custom at the time of his death, had grown in the tomb in a wonderful manner" (Vita, auct. Audoen. ii. 47; Dach. Spicil. ii. 116, ed. 1723). A later example occurs in the case of an Angevin bishop, who was buried "barbâ rasâ" (Gesta Gulielmi Maj. c. 1, in Spicil. Dach. ii. 160).

IV. The Body anointed or embalmed.—The next process was to "anoint" the body. This may have been often done with the simple oil, but more frequently, where it could be procured, with a precious unguent, ύπον, which might be, as Galen describes it, only medicated oil (De Methodo Medendi, xi. 16); but sometimes we are to understand that the body was embalmed with various antiseptic gums and spices. When the woman in Matt. xxvi. 7 poured ointment on our Lord's head, He accepted it as done in anticipation of His death, πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με, "with a view to prepare me for burial" (ver. 12). After His death, Nicodemus (John xix. 39, 40) "brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pound weight, and wound the body in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury." Afterwards the women who had followed Him from Galilee, probably in ignorance of what had been done, "prepared spices and ointments," ἀρώματα καὶ ύπόα, for the same purpose (Luke xxiii. 56). This example would probably have suggested the custom among Christians, had they not inherited it from their Jewish and heathen forefathers.

Tertullian is alluding to this practice when he says, "The Sabaeans will know that merchandise of theirs, more in quantity and more costly, is lavished on the burial of Christians than on the censuring of the gods" (Apol. 42). Again, "Let them look to it, if the same objects of trade, frankincense to wit, and other foreign things for sacrifice to idols, are likewise useful to men for medicinal pigments,—to us (Christians) also beside for a solace of burial" (De Idol. 11; see also De Resurr. Carn. 27). Clemens Alexandrinus,

A.D. 192, explaining a mystic interpretation of Matt. xxvi. 7, says incidentally, "For the dead are anointed" (αυπίζονται, Paedag. ii. 8, § 62). In the Octavius of Minutius Felix the heathen objector says, "Ye (Christians) reserve unguents for funerals" (c. 2). In the same century (290) we find a Roman governor threatening a martyr thus, "You imagine that some wretched women are going to embalm your body with spices and ointments? But what I am thinking of is how to destroy your remains" (Acta Tarachi, 7; in Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 385). And many other instances are found.

A sweet odour has often been perceived on the opening of an ancient tomb (see CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 309). This arose, without any doubt, from the spices buried with the body, but superstition has regarded it as a proof of the sanctity of the person who occupied the tomb. This was an early opinion. Thus, when the tomb of St. Valerius was opened in 550, the sweet smell was taken to indicate that "a friend of God rested there" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 84). So at the discovery of the body of St. Mallosus, the bishop of Cologne, who was present, exclaimed, "I believe in Christ that He is revealing His martyr to me, seeing that this sweet odour has surrounded me" (ibid. 63). Compare also St. Jerome's Life of Hilarion, 46, where he speaks of the body of the saint as "tantis fragrant odoribus at delibutum unguentis putares." When the tomb of Amantius was opened, an unspeakably sweet odour proceeding from it reached even the people in the porches and courts of the church (Fortunatus in Vita S. Amant. 11). See also Epist.; Luciani de Revel. Stephani Mart. § 9; Eupigius of St. Severin in Res Gest. S. Sev. Baron. Ann. vi. § 10, ad an. 488, &c. For a similar story from Constantinople, see Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 2. Evagrius supplies another from the East (Hist. Eccl. ii. 3). But they were common everywhere.

V. The Grave-clothes.—The body was always clothed, often in linen only, but sometimes also in the best dress worn in daily life, or in the insignia of office. The custom was traditional, but it received a mystic interpretation, the new dress then put on being said to represent the garment of incorruption in which the body will be clothed when restored to life (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Patientiâ, ix. 808).

1. The body seems to have been generally swathed in linen (see CATACOMBS, p. 309), as might be expected from what we know of the custom of the Jews. Lazarus was "bound hand and foot with grave-clothes" (John xi. 44). "Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it (ἐξήρασαν) in linen clothes (ὀθονίοις) with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury" (ibid. xix. 40). St. Matthew (xxvii. 59) and St. Luke (xxiii. 53) say that Joseph "wrapped, or rolled, it in fine linen—ἐνετύλιξεν αὐτὸ σινδῶνι" (καθαρῶ, M.). St. Mark (xv. 46) says, ἐνέλιψε τῇ σινδῶνι. The custom had been brought from Egypt and retained, though the Jews did not embalm their dead. Words that express the notion of swathing are sometimes used at a later period. Thus the disciples of St. Anthony ἐκίχοντες his body—buried it (Athan. Vita S. Anton. 90). Similarly Dionysius of Alexandria speaks of the Christians of that city as περιστολαῖς κατακοσμοῦντες, in preparation for burial, the bodies of those stricken by the plague (Hist. Eccl. Euseb. vii. 22). In Latin authors the more common word is "obvolvere." In the above two instances the material is not mentioned, but we may assume that it was linen, the use of which was common everywhere, if not universal. To give examples, St. Jerome, speaking of a woman who had been unjustly put to death, says, "They wrap the bloody corpse in a linen cloth" (Epist. ad Innoc. 12). Sixtus III., A.D. 432, "with his own hands dressed" the body of his enemy, Bassus, "with linen clothes and spices" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. No. 45). In Gregory of Tours we read of a nun who was buried "induta linteis mundis" (Hist. Franc. vi. 29), and of a bishop who in a vision was told to prepare for his burial by "getting him clean linen clothes" (ii. 5). The linen was sometimes waxed. Thus in one Life of St. Cuthbert we are told that his body was "in sindone ceratâ curatum" (Vita, iii. iv. 13; Bolland. Mart. 20). The body of St. Ansbert, archbishop of Rouen, A.D. 698, "magna fidei ambitione vestitum est, ac desuper linteis ceratis obvolutum" (Aigrad. in Vita Ansbert. 9; Boll. Feb. 9). In a later instance we read of a "shirt (camisale) covered with wax" carefully put on the body of the deceased (St. Udalric), "lest the priestly apparel in which he was clad should be quickly destroyed by the earth" (Vita S. Udalric. xxvii. 83; Boll. July 4).

2. Among the Romans, while the private citizen was buried in a toga, those in office, even to the lowest vicomagister (Livy, xxiv. 7), were buried in the dress proper to it. The analogous practice was to some extent adopted among Christians. In the Acta of Peter of Alexandria, martyred in 301, it seems implied that the linen in which he was wrapped was the dress in which he usually officiated (Migne, Ser. Gr. xviii. 464, 5). This is not a contemporary account; but if it be not historically true, it may be taken to shew the custom of the country a century and a half later. St. Cuthbert was "vestimenta sacerdotalia indutus" (Anon. Vita, u. s.). The same thing is related of an Irish bishop named Merolilanus (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iv. 48), and of Gebhard of Constance: "Sacerdotalibus, ut moris est, vestibus indutus" (Vita, i. 22; in Ménard, note 680 to Sacram. Gregor.). Of St. Ansbert we read: "As he had been wont to stand at the holy altars of Christ, so the brethren had taken care that he should be clothed" (Aigrad. u. s.). Hadrian I., A.D. 772, was "wrapped in his apostolical ornaments (infulis), as the custom is to bury a Roman bishop" (Vita, in Mus. Ital. i. 41). Observe also the instance of Udalric in the last paragraph. Charlemagne was clad in the imperial vestments, and "his face covered under the diadem with a napkin" (Vita, Auct. Monach. Engol.).

Under this head we may mention an order ascribed to Eutychian, A.D. 275, that no martyr should be buried "without a dalmatic or a purple collobium" (Anast. Vit. Pont. No. 28); such ornaments thus becoming the insignia of martyrdom.

3. A dress more or less costly to shew honour to the deceased, but with no other significance, is often mentioned. Thus when Marinus was martyred at Rome in the reign of Gallienus, Astyrius, a senator, clothed the body "very richly" for the burial (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 16). The remains of Stratonica and Seleucus, A.D. 297, were covered with a silk cloth (S. E. Assemanus, Acta SS. Martyrum, ii. 121). St. Anthony wrapped the body of Paul, the first hermit, in a "pallium" which St. Athanasius had given him (Hieron. in Vita Pauli, § 14). St. Anthony himself, when dead, was wrapped in an old cloak which had also been the gift of Athanasius many years before (St. Ath. in Vita S. Ant. § 91). St. Gregory of Nyssa gives an elaborate account of the manner in which the body of his sister Macrina was prepared for the grave (A.D. 379). It was proposed to bury her in her ordinary dress, but her brother had provided a better. As this was not done to please human eyes, an old black mantle (iudriov) was thrown over all (De Vita S. Macr. ii. App. 200; Par. 1618). St. Jerome, addressing wealthy Christians, asks: "Why do ye wrap (obvolvitis) your dead in garments covered with gold?" (Vita Pauli, 17.) Of Paula the same father says: "What poor man died who was not wrapped in her garments?" (Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. § 5.) Several times Gregory of Tours mentions that persons of eminence were clothed before burial "dignis vestimentis" (Hist. Fr. iv. 37, 51; De Glor. Conf. 81; Vitae Patrum, xiv. 4, xx. 4). When Chilperic was slain, A.D. 584, a bishop covered his body for burial with "better garments" (Hist. Fr. vi. 46). The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus "to this day rest in the very place (where they were found), covered with clothes of silk or fine linen" (Mirac. i. 95).

4. In the 6th century we first hear of a strange abuse by its prohibition. The council of Auvérigne, 533: "It is to be observed that the bodies of the dead be not wrapped in palls or divine services," i.e. cloths used for the service of the altar (can. 3); "Touching the covering of the Lord's body or the pall of the altar, let not the body of a priest, when carried to the tomb, be ever covered with it" (can. 7). The council of Auxerre, A.D. 578: "It is not permitted that the bodies of the dead be wrapped in the veil or in palls" (can. 12). The latter practice is also forbidden by Boniface of Mentz, 743 (can. 20). Nor was the East free from the same superstition. Pseudo-Athanasius, as quoted by John Damascene: "Fail not to burn oil and wax candles at the tomb, though the body be buried in an air," i.e. a eucharistic veil of the largest size (Damasc. Orat. de iis qui in Fide dormierunt, § 19).

5. It is probable that, however the body was dressed, a napkin always concealed the face, as in the scriptural examples (John xi. 44, xx. 7). Of St. Cuthbert we read, "Capite sudario circumdato" (Anon. Vita, iii. u. s.); of St. Ansbert, that "sudarium cerâ litum capiti ejus imponere vellent" (Aigrad. u. s.); and of Charlemagne, "Sudario sub diademate facies ejus operata" (Monach. Engol. u. s.).

6. The richness of the dress and ornaments sometimes buried with the dead was a temptation to thieves. This led to their being cut or torn and otherwise rendered useless before the body was left in the tomb. Thus St. Chrysostom: "A costly burial has often been the cause of the tomb being broken open, and of the body that was buried so carefully being cast out naked and graveless. . . . That this may not happen, many persons tear the fine linen clothes and fill them with many kinds of spices, that they may in two ways be made useless to those who are guilty of such outrage, and so commit them to the earth" (Hom. 85 in S. Joan. Ev. § 5). Examples of such robberies are not wanting. Thus when, in 585, a woman of high rank had been buried at Metz, "with great ornaments and much gold," some young men of her family "uncovered the tomb and took and carried off all the ornaments of the dead body that they could find" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 21). When Hadrian I. was buried in the monastery of Nonantula, A.D. 795, some of the monks, thinking that the rich robes with which the body was covered would be better bestowed on their church, "went at night to his sepulchre, and having stripped him of his shining and glittering garments clad him in poorer" (Vita Hadr. in Mus. Ital. i. 41).

VI. Bells tolled.—We first hear of bells in connexion with death in the 7th century; but the notices are scanty. Bede relates that when St. Hilda died, in 673, a nun in a distant monastery founded by the saint, while in her dormitory at night, "suddenly heard in the air the well-known sound of the bell by which they were wont to be roused to prayers or called together when any one of them had been called out of this world" (Hist. Eccl. iv. 23). Here the custom was to toll the bell as soon as the death had taken place. The Life of St. Boniface seems to imply that, in the churches founded by him, the bell was tolled when the corpse was on the way to the grave. The inhabitants of the place, we are told, resisted the removal of his remains, A.D. 755, but suddenly "the bell of the church, touched by no human hand, was put in motion" (Willibaldus, Vita S. Bonif. c. xii. § 38; sim. Othlo in Vita, ii. § 25). This was accepted at once by all as an intimation that the body was to proceed to another place of rest. Sturm, the founder under Boniface of the great monastery of Fulda, seeing himself in danger, A.D. 770, ordered all the bells of that house to be rung to assemble the monks to pray for him and to receive his last words (Vita, c. 25; Acta Bened. iv. 279). The second council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, directs that "in every church throughout the parishes," on the death of the bishop, "the signal be immediately struck, and every congregation of the servants of God meet at the basilic" to sing psalms for his soul (can. 10).

VII. Prayers and Psalms before the Funeral.—The body of Constantine was watched day and night as it lay in the palace "in a golden coffin," covered with a purple cloth and surrounded by innumerable lights (Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 66); but we do not read of any religious rite performed at that time. Nor are any prayers or psalms mentioned at this stage in the case of St. Ambrose, though his body lay in state in the great church called by his name (Paulinus in Vita S. Amb. 48).

1. Yet Tertullian, about A.D. 195, speaks of prayer being made at this time: "Cum in pace dormisset, et morante adhuc sepultura, interim oratione presbyteri componeretur," &c. (De Animâ, 51). What this "prayer of the presbyter" was does not appear. In the Gelasian Sacramentary are four sets of prayers to be used over the departed. The first group are headed, Orat. post Obitum Hominis; the second, Orat. antequam ad Sepulcrum deferatur (Liturgia Lat. Vet. Murat. i. 747, 9). In the Gregorian Sacramentary (ibid. ii. 213) we find prayers corresponding to the former of the above groups under the heading, Orationes in Agenda Mortuorum quando Anima egreditur de Corpore. After these prayers, psalms (not indicated; in the Vatican Codex, "psalmi congrui," Opp. S. Greg. v. 230, ed. 1615) are sung, and then "dicantur capitula" ("deinde Oratio Dominica et haec versuum capitella," Cod. Vat. u. s.): "In memoriâ," &c. (Ps. cxii. 6, P. B. v.) (after which Cod. Vat. gives "Anima ejus," &c., from Ps. xxv. 12); "Ne tradas bestiis animas," &c. (Ps. lxxiv. 20; see Vulg. lxxiii. 19); "Pretiosa," &c. (Ps. cxvi. 13), for which Cod. Vat. substitutes, "Redimet Dominus animas sanctorum suorum" (derived probably from Ps. xcvi. 10); "Non intres," &c. (Ps. cxliii. 2); "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine" (derived from 2 Esdr. ii. 34; Vulg. 4, Esdr.). Two prayers follow in this book as given by Muratori, headed Incipiunt Orationes post Lavationem Corporis (215), which correspond to the second set in the Gelasian, as described above. In the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 41) are prayers bearing a strong general resemblance in matter to the above Western forms, under the title, Προσφώνησις ὑπὲρ τῶν κεκοιμημένων. They seem intended to be introduced by the deacon after the usual suffrages in any service of prayer with the words, "For our brethren who rest in Christ, let us pray." They might be said, apparently, at any time after the death.

The Gelasian prayers mentioned above are found, with some change and omission, in a very ancient MS. preserved at Rheims (printed by Ménard, Sacram. Greg. not. 68), in which they have the following heading: "Incipit Officium pro Defunctis. In primis cantatur Psalmus, In exitu Israel, cum antiphona, vel alleluia." The book appears to have been written in the time of Charlemagne (Praef. x. Opp. Greg. iii. ed. Ben.), when the alleluia was generally in the West no longer thought suitable to a funeral office. It is still sung in the Greek offices (Euchologion, Goar, 526, 527, 531, 535, 553), and in that for priests with frequent repetitions (562, 563, 564, &c.).

2. Testimonies to the use of psalms before the funeral are much more frequent than to the prayers. When Monica died, "Evodius seized a psalter and began to chant the psalm Misericordiam et judicium (the 101st), the whole family responding" (Aug. Conf. ix. 12, § 31). Before the burial of Macrina there was "psalmody throughout the night, as at the vigil of a martyr's festival" (Greg. Nyss. De Vitâ S. Macr. ii. App. 200). St. Jerome tells us that at the death of Paula "not wailings and beatings in the breast were heard, as is the wont among men of this world, but numberless psalms in divers tongues" (Epist. 108 ad Eust. § 29). Even before Fabiola was dead, if we are to take St. Jerome's words to the letter, this chanting had begun: "Psalms sounded, and the alleluia echoing aloft shook the gilded ceilings of the temples" (Ep. 77 ad Ocean. § 11). Earlier in the same century the disciples of Pachomius (cir. 350), "having cared for his venerable body after the custom . . . as was meet, passed the whole night watching, singing psalms and hymns" (Vita, 53; Rosweyd, 138). The 6th century furnishes many instances; e.g. the body of Fulgentius, A.D. 553, placed in the oratory of a monastery, "invited both monks and clerks to watch together that whole night in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" (Vita, in fine; Surius, Jan. 1). St. Gall, A.D. 554, lay three days in a church, "constant singing of psalms going on" (Greg. Tur. Vitae PP. vi. 7). Similarly St. Salvius (about 560), (id. Hist. Franc. vii. 1); St. Aridius, 571 (Vita S. Arid. 34; inter Opp. Greg. Tur. 1303); and St. Radegund, 587 (Baudon, in Vita, 27).

VIII. Mourning Habits.—The feeling expressed in the foregoing extracts was carried so far that in many churches, if not in all, mourning-dresses of a dark colour were strongly discouraged. Practically this affected one sex only, at least among the Romans, for their women in mourning already, i.e. from the 1st century, "wore white garments and white head-dresses" (Plutarch, Quaest. Rom. 26). Hence the condemnation of dark colours made a distinction between the Christian and the heathen man, but permitted none between the women. In the former case the principle created the difference; in the latter it was thought more important than the maintenance of it.

St. Cyprian is the earliest writer in whom the objection occurs: "Black garments are not to be assumed here, when they (who have gone before) have put on their robes of white" (De Mortal. 164, ed. Brem.). St. Basil tells one who exhibited such outward signs of grief that he resembled actors in a tragedy: "Like them thou thinkest that the outward condition of things should befit the mourner, a black dress and disordered hair, and darkness in the house, and dirt and dust, and a chant unpleasing to the ear, and that keeps the wound of grief ever fresh in the soul. Leave such things to them that are without hope" (De Grat. Act. ii. 363). St. Chrysostom condemns among other tokens of grief the custom of "covering ourselves with black garments" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Phil. § 4; comp. Hom. 62 in S. Joan. Ev. § 4). An unknown but very ancient author, whose tract is preserved in a MS. of the 7th century, asks: "Why do we dye our garments black, unless it is to prove that we are truly unbelieving, not only by our weeping but by our dress?" (De Consol. Mort. Serm. ii. c. 5; in App. Opp. Aug.) Nevertheless this rejection of a dark mourning-dress could hardly have been common among men in the West in the age of St. Augustine and St. Jerome, for the latter, writing in 404, claims praise for a Roman of high rank for having given up his mourning habit (lugubrem vestem) and resumed his white garments (candida vestimenta) at the end of forty days, after the loss of his wife and two daughters within a few days of each other (Epist. 118 ad Julian. 4). In France, when the elder son of Chilperic died, A.D. 580, there was "a great lamentation of all the people; for the men mourning, and the women clad in mourning habits, as the custom is at the obsequies of husbands, in such sort attended this funeral" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 35). It may be doubted whether women in the East acted generally in the spirit of St. Chrysostom's advice even in the 4th century. Had they done so, it would not have been mentioned that the mother of Gregory of Nazianzus wore a dress of shining white at the funeral of her son Caesarius (Greg. Naz. Orat. vii. 15). [MOURNING.]

IX. The Bier and Coffin.—The body was placed on a bier (feretrum, lectus, grabatum, sandapila, κλίνη, σκίμπος), sometimes in a coffin (arca, loculus, capulus, λάρναξ, σορός). There is reason, however, to think that the bier and coffin, by whatever word described, were generally one. The coffin was without a lid, and the face (at least) of the corpse was often exposed during the procession. At the funeral of St. Basil, A.D. 379, the people could see his face (Greg. Naz. Orat. xliii. 80). The same thing is mentioned of his sister Macrina (Greg. Nyss. de Vita Macr. 201). When Honoratus of Arles was carried to the grave, A.D. 430, the people were able to kiss various parts of the body ("osculum aut ori aut quibuscunque membris impressit," Hilar. Arel. in Vita Honor. vii. 35). This was probably general among the Greeks, for it is their custom to this day, the face being painted to simulate life.

It is probable that in many cases the whole body was concealed at first by a loose pall, sometimes of rich material, of which we often read both in the East and West. A dalmatic was thrown over the bier at the funeral of the bishops of Rome, until Gregory I. ordered that for the future "the bier on which a Roman pontiff was carried to burial should be vested with no covering" (Epist. iv. 44). He desired to suppress the popular custom of tearing the dalmatic to pieces and preserving them as relics. Hilary of Arles says that the body of Honoratus, already mentioned, was "clothed on the bier by the great solicitude of faith, and almost stripped afterwards by a greater, when it was taken to the grave" (Vita Honor. vii. 35). When the empress Placilla, A.D. 385, was carried into the city before her burial, the body was covered "with gold and purple cloth" (Greg. Nyss. Orat. Fun. de Placilla, ii. 960). Her daughter Pulcheria is by the same writer only said to have been "borne on a golden bier" (κλίνης, in Fun. Pulch. Orat. ibid. 948).

X. The Bearers.—Tertullian, 195, explaining Christian customs to the heathen, says that the offerings of the faithful provided among other things "for the burial of the poor" (Apol. 39). The council of Carthage, 398, decreed that the "penitents should carry the dead to the church and bury them" (can. 81). St. Augustine, speaking of his mother's funeral at Ostia, where she died on their way to Africa, says, "De more illis quorum officium erat funus curantibus" (Confess. ix. 31). Such officials, we infer, were to be found among Christians in every populous place. At Constantinople Constantine had already provided a large body of inferior clerks to whom this duty was committed. Their number was afterwards increased by Justinian. They were paid for their services out of a public fund, so that every burial might be free of charge. [See COPIATAE, DECANI, FOSSARII, PARABOLANI.] These prepared the grave, bore the corpse, and buried it. It is probable, however, from the number of instances on record, that relations and others often became bearers, not from necessity, but from a desire to shew honour to the deceased. The body of St. Basil was thus "borne aloft by the hands of holy men," Jan. 1, 379 (Greg.

Naz. Orat. xliii. 80). When his sister Macrina was buried in the same year, the bier was borne by her brother, Gregory of Nyssa, the bishop of the diocese, and two other eminent clergymen (Vita Macr. 201). St. Ambrose in the same year implies that he helped to carry his brother Satyrus to the grave (De Excessu Sat. i. 36). Paula at Bethlehem, 404, was "removed by the hands of bishops, who even put their shoulders to the bier" (Hieron. Ep. 108, § 29). Sidonius, 472, says of a lady of high rank "that she was taken up and borne to her abiding home like one asleep, by the hands of priests and relatives" (Epist. ii. 8). Fulgentius Ruspensis, A.D. 553, was taken "by the hands of priests" to the church in which he was buried (Vita, Surius, Jan. 1).

During our period monks and nuns were buried without the bounds of their monasteries (Martene, de Ant. Mon. Rit. v. x. 99), and the latter at least must often have employed the services of seculars as bearers.

XI. Time of Burial.—A Christian funeral took place by day whenever it was permitted. See BURIAL OF THE DEAD (3), p. 253. There was in France, at least, a feeling against burying on Sunday; for in a law forbidding servile works on that day in the Carolingian code, we find the burial of the dead excepted, only "si forte necesse fuerit" (Reg. Fr. Capit. i. 75, vi. 380). Nevertheless St. Ambrose was buried at Milan on Easter Day (Paulinus in Vita, 48), and St. John of Naples in that city on the same day (Uranus, De Obitu Paulini, 11).

XII. The Procession.—Allusions to the triumphant character of the funeral procession as marked by the singing of psalms and hymns, the carrying of lights [see LIGHTS, CEREMONIAL USE OF, viii.], and palms, &c., are very frequent. The Apostolical Constitutions, probably compiled near the year 200, give this direction: "In the going forth of those who have fallen asleep, conduct them with singing of psalms, if they are faithful in the Lord, for 'precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints'" (vi. 30). Constantine, who died in 337, of the funeral of martyrs: "Nor is the sweet smell of frankincense desired, nor the funeral pyre, but pure light sufficient to light them that pray" (Orat. ad Sanct. Coetum, 12). St. Paul the first hermit was taken to his grave, A.D. 340, by St. Anthony, "singing hymns and psalms, after the Christian tradition" (Hieron. Vita Pauli, § 16). At the funeral of Macrina, "no small number of deacons and servants preceded the corpse in order on either side, all holding tapers of wax," while "from one end to the other of the procession psalms were sung in one part, as in the Hymn of the Three Children" (Greg. Nyss. Vita Macr. 201). At Constantinople Justinian, A.D. 554, made legal provision for the singing at all funerals (Nov. lix. 4). In France, 587, St. Rade-gund was carried to the grave with psalms and alleluias. (Baud. Vita, § 28.) In Spain, the council of Toledo, 589, ordered that the body should be conveyed to the tomb with psalm-singing only.

Incense was sometimes used after the first three or four centuries of our period. In the Acta (of late and uncertain date; see Tille-mont, Mém. Eccl. note sur St.-Pierre Alex.) of St. Peter of Alexandria, 311, we read that the people

"carried palms the tokens of victory, while tapers blazed, hymns resounded, and incense flamed" (Migne, Ser. Græc. xviii. 465). Hilary of Arles, speaking of the funeral of Honoratus, his predecessor, A.D. 430: "We saw then, carried before his bier, spices and incense" (Vita Honor. vii. 35). At the funeral of St. Lupicinus in France, in the 6th century, there were "crosses and wax candles and the smell of sweet incense" (Greg. Tur. Vitæ P.P. xiii. 3). "Incense and lights" are also mentioned by Pseudo-Chrysostom (de Pat. i. tom. ix. 808).

Neither the Gelasian nor the Gregorian Sacramentary indicates the psalms used in the procession. We may, however, learn something of the Greek custom from St. Chrysostom: "Consider what thou sayest at that time, 'Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath rewarded thee' (Ps. cxvi. 7, P. B. v.); and again, 'I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me' (xxiii. 4); and again (xxxii. 8), 'Thou art a place to hide me in; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble'" (Hom. iv. in Ep. ad Heb. (ii. 15)).

XIII. The Body buried.—The church inherited from the first converts a repugnance to cremation, as doing violence to natural feeling. The heathen ascribed this abhorrence to a wrong motive, viz. a fear lest the body being dissipated should be incapable of resurrection. "Some," says Tertullian, "are of that opinion; they say that funerals ought not to be by fire for that reason, out of a needless care for the soul. But the reason of that pious custom of burial is different, not a pretence of care for the remains of the soul, but an aversion to cruelty even in regard to the body" (De Animâ, 51). In the Octavius of Minutius Felix (c. 2), the heathen interlocutor inveighs against the Christians as superstitiously "execrating funeral piles and condemning sepulchres by means of fire." To this the Christian replies (c. 10): "We do not, as you suppose, fear any loss of burial (comp. St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, i. 12), but we observe the ancient and better (St. Aug. u. s. 13) custom of interment." The practice of cremation was extinct throughout the empire in the 5th century ("Urendi corpora defunctorum usus nostro sæculo nullus," Macrobi. Saturn. vii. 7); but we infer from a prohibition of Charlemagne that it existed among the tribes of Germany at a much later period: "If any one shall cause the body of a deceased person to be consumed by flame according to the rite of the pagans, and shall reduce his bones to ashes, he shall be capitally punished" (Capit. de Part. Saxon. 7, in Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 252).

In Egypt there was a peculiar custom of preserving the dead above ground. "The Egyptians are wont . . . not to hide them under the earth, but to place them on litters and to keep them in their houses, thinking thereby to do honour to the departed." This statement is made, however, only in reference to "the bodies of the devout departed, and especially of the holy martyrs" (Athan. Vita S. Anton. § 90). The custom was earnestly opposed by St. Anthony, who ordered his own body to be buried in a secret place, that it might not be so treated (ibid.). The author of his Life is the only writer who mentions it.

XIV. Place of Burial.—For the earlier period, especially in the cities, see AREA, BURIAL, CATACOMBS, CEMETERY. Burial in churches was forbidden by a law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 381: "Let no one think that the abode of the apostles or martyrs is permitted to be used for the burial of bodies" (Justin. Codex, i. ii. 2). This law was admitted by Justinian into his code, A.D. 529. [CHURCH-YARD, p. 391.]

Constantine and his Christian successors, and the bishops of Constantinople, are said by Sozomen (Hist. ii. 34; comp. Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 70) to have been buried in the Church of the Apostles in the city; but from St. Chrysostom it appears that this must be understood of the approach to the church. (Hom. xxvi. in 2 Cor. pr. fin.). St. Ambrose was buried, A.D. 397, in the church at Milan built by himself and called after him (Paulinus, Vita S. Amb. 48). Paula was interred at Jerusalem, 404, "subter ecclesiam et juxta specus Domini" (Hieron. Epist. 108, § 30); i.e., as we conceive, under the church, but from without. Of the burial of Fulgentius of Ruspe in Africa in a church, we read: "He was the first bishop who was honoured by being laid in that basilica, where a strict ancient custom permitted no one, priest or laic, to be buried; but the great force of affection removed the obstacle of custom, the citizens universally demanding it" (Vita in Surius, Jan. 1 in fin.). Here the ground of the "custom" appears to have been forgotten. Queen Radegund in 587 requested of the bishops of the province that she might be buried in a church which she had begun to build (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 42). The occasional practice is also attested by stories of sinners miraculously cast out of churches in which they had been interred. Such an event happened at Toulouse, according to Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 89), while Gregory of Rome places a similar occurrence at Milan (Dial. iv. 53). Another story of the last writer shews that two ladies had been buried in a church at Monte Cassino (Dial. ii. 23).

XV. The Service in Church.—The body was often taken to a church and a service held over it there, though it was to be buried elsewhere. Gregory of Nyssa, in his account of the funeral of Macrina, says: "When we stood within the building [of the Holy Martyrs, in which the bodies of her parents lay], setting down the bier, we first betook ourselves to prayer" (Vita S. Macr. 201). The body of St. Ambrose was taken to a church immediately after his death on the morning of Easter Eve. On Sunday at dawn, "after the celebration of the divine sacraments," it was removed to the church in which it was to be buried (Paulinus, Vita, 48). The language of St. Jerome, when he says that the alleluia of the people shook the roof of the temple at the funeral of Fabiola (Epist. 77, § 11), seems to imply an office of praise and thanksgiving in the church. Paula, before burial, was "placed in the middle of the church of the cave of the Saviour," and the joyful chanting of the procession, it is implied, continued there (Hieron. Epist. 108, § 29). Pseudo-Dionysius, in the East, tells us that if the deceased had been of the clergy, the body was set before the altar; if a layman, by the sacrarium at the priest's entrance (De Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2). The foregoing testimonies make it probable that the body was always carried into the church when it was to be buried near it.

XVI. The Composition of the Service.—Psalms and hymns formed a considerable part of the service in the church and at the grave, but there were prescribed forms of prayer also, and lessons from Holy Scripture, at an early period. We read both of psalms sung and of prayers said in church at the funeral of Macrina (Vita, u. s.). Psalms with the alleluia were sung at that of Fabiola (Hieron. u. s.); and psalms in Greek, Latin, and Syriac at that of Paula (Hier. u. s.). The martyrs Epictetus and Astion were buried "in a meet and fit place, with hymns and psalms" (Vita, 20; Rosw. 219). Of other martyrs, Victor Vitensis says, "The remains of the blessed saints were buried with solemn hymns" (Passio Septem Monach.). The same writer represents a persecuted church asking, "Who will bury us when we die, with the solemn (i.e. customary) prayers?" (De Persec. Vand. ii.) Pseudo-Dionysius, speaking of the service in the church, says: "Then the priest celebrates a prayer of thanksgiving. Next, the ministers, having read the unfailling promises of our second resurrection set in the divine Scriptures, chant devoutly the songs of the oracles of psalms and hymns to the same end and intent. Then the chief minister dismisses the catechumens, and recites the names of the saints who have already gone to their rest, with whom he deems the person lately deceased worthy to be classed in public commemoration, and exhorts all to seek the happy end in Christ. Then the divine chief priest drawing near makes a most sacred prayer over him" (De Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2).

The Gelasian Sacramentary gives prayers to be said "Ad Sepulcrum priusquam sepeliatur," and others, with a "Commendatio Animæ," to be said "Post Sepulturam" (Liturg. Lat. Vet. Murat. i. 750-1). The corresponding prayers in the Gregorian are headed respectively "Orationes ante Sepulcrum, priusquam sepeliatur," and "Oratio post sepultum Corpus" (ibid. ii. 216). In both the "Commendatio" is the final prayer. We take the following from the Gregorian as an example: "We commend unto Thee, O Lord, the soul of Thy servant N., that being dead unto the world he may live unto Thee. And if by the frailty of worldly conversation he hath committed sins, do Thou by the pardon of Thy most merciful pity cleanse them away, through," &c. (ibid. ii. 218). At one time the whole of the service in the church and at the grave was called the Commendation; for the council of Carthage, 397, orders that where a funeral takes place in the afternoon, "the commendation shall be made by prayers only, if they who make it are found to have already broken their fast" (can. 29); i.e. the eucharist shall not form part of the commendation in that case. But only a few years later we find the word used of single forms of intercession (for the living, in can. 12 Conc. Milev. A.D. 416; comp. Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 13. See COMMENDATION), and it is the specific name expressly given to the last prayer at funerals in the Gelasian Sacramentary. By an order of Hincmar of Rheims, A.D. 845, the priest is to learn by heart "ordinem et preces in exequiis atque agendis defunctorum" (Capit. 4; Labb. Conc. viii. 569). It is evident, therefore, that at this time nothing was left to the discretion of the officiant.

We may add, with reference to the lessons, that some copies of the Comes Hieronymi (App. ad Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1351; see LECTONARY) to the eucharistic lessons to be read "in Agenda Mortuorum" (sic) add nine "Lectiones Defunctorum" (see Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. iv. 42) from the Book of Job, to be read in the Officia Mortuorum. Of these some or all, we may suppose, would be read in the church or at the grave, when the eucharist was not celebrated. They are, Job, vii. 19-21; x. 1-7; x. 8-12; xiii. 22-28; xiv. 1-6; xiv. 13-16; xvii. 1-15; xix. 20-24; xix. 25-27.

The early remains of the Greek church do not give us the same information respecting the prayers actually said in the church or at the grave within our period. The prayers in the Apostolical Constitutions, to which we have referred in § vii. 1, might be used with propriety at that time; but the rubric (viii. 40) shews that they were the special addition on occasion of a death to the ordinary daily service. Elsewhere (vi. 30) this book mentions lessons and psalms: "Assemble in the cemeteries, reading the sacred books and singing psalms on account of the martyrs who have fallen asleep, and of all saints from the beginning, and of our brethren who have fallen asleep in the Lord;" a direction which seems to apply both to the occasion of the funeral and to subsequent commemorations. In the East one of the Arabic canons of Nicaea, referring to the funeral of a bishop, says, "Let those things be read at the funeral which the doctors and holy spiritual fathers have ordained touching the prayer" (can. 65; Labbe, Conc. ii. 312).

For the discourse sometimes delivered at or after a funeral, see FUNERAL SERMON.

XVII. The last Peace.—Pseudo-Dionysius says that after the prayers the bishop kissed the corpse, after which all present did the same (Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2). This was the kiss of peace, and a sign of communion unbroken by death; but it could never have been common. From a prohibition of the practice by the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (can. 12), we learn that there was some observance of it in France in the 6th century.

XVIII. The last Unction.—In a work ascribed to St. Chrysostom, in the imperial library at Vienna, it is said that we "ought to pour oil on the dead at their burial" (Comment. in Biblioth. Caes. Lambecii, VIII. xlv. 68). Pseudo-Dionysius says that after the kiss the bishop "poured oil on the departed, and then after offering a sacred prayer for all present laid the body away with other sacred bodies of the same (ecclesiastical) rank" (Hier. Eccl. v. iii. 2). Theodore of Canterbury, 668, says that "there was in the church of Rome a custom of carrying monks or religious men to a church when dead, and anointing their breasts with chrism, and there celebrating masses for them" (Capit. 90; Labbe, Conc. vi. 1877). These statements are worthy of note from the fact that in the Greek church of the present day either oil from the church lamps or a cinder from the thurible is put on the corpse immediately before burial (Euchol. Goar, 538). Pseudo-Dionysius gives a mystic reason for this unction. The unction at baptism, he says, "calls the initiated to the sacred strife, but the oil now poured on the body shews that he who has fallen asleep has fought the sacred fight, and is perfected" (ibid.).

XIX. The Eucharist given to the Dead.—We meet with several traces of this profane superstition from the end of the 4th century downward. It was forbidden in Africa by the council of Carthage in 397: "It is decreed that the eucharist be not given to the bodies of the dead" (can. 6); by that of Auxerre, 578: "It is not lawful for the eucharist to be given to the dead" (can. 12); and by the council of Constantinople in 691 (can. 83). The canon of the last is, however, only a transcript of that of Carthage, and even repeats its argument: "It is written, Take, eat; but the bodies of the dead can neither take nor eat" (comp. St. Chrysostom, Hom. 40 in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 1). It is not intimated in these canons that the eucharist was placed between the lips of the corpse; and we infer probably, from other records, that it was placed on the breast,* especially as Balsamon (Comm. in Can. C. P. u. s.) suggests that the intention of the practice was to keep off evil spirits. St. Benedict is said to have ordered "the body of the Lord" to be placed on the breast of a corpse that had been cast out of its grave by invisible hands (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 24). An oblate was placed on the breast of St. Cuthbert (Amalar. de Off. Eccl. iv. 41). In the late and fabulous Life of St. Basil falsely ascribed to Amphilochius, the saint is said to have ordered a portion of the eucharist which he consecrated on a certain occasion to be reserved that it might be buried with him (Opp. Amphil. ed. Combetis. 176, 224). For the later history of the practice see Notitia Eucharistica, p. 920; ed. 2.

This observance must have been more common, especially at Rome, than has been usually supposed, if modern antiquarians are right in thinking that the vessels tinged inside with red found in the loculi in the catacombs contained eucharistic wine (CATACOMBS, 308; but see GLASS, 730); but the age and paucity of the notices of the custom must be considered one objection to that opinion. It is probable that intinction was practised—i.e. that the bread was moistened with the wine. See SPOON, EUCHARISTIC.

XX. How placed in the Grave.—The position of the bodies found in the CATACOMBS (see Vol. I. p. 307) shews that their direction was considered unimportant for the first four centuries. At a later period we find evidence both in the East and West of the face being generally turned towards the rising sun. Thus Pseudo-Chrysostom: "We turn the coffin to the East, signifying thereby their resurrection" (De Pat. i. u. s.). See also the Vienna MS. before cited (Lambec. VIII. xlv. 68). Pseudo-Epiphanius (de Sepult. Dom.), apostrophising Joseph of Arimathea: "Dost thou bury towards the East the Dead One, who is ἡ ἀνατολή τῶν ἀνατολῶν?" The belief that our Lord had been so buried would be sufficient to induce a general practice. A similar testimony is given by Latin writers. Thus Arculfus, who visited the Holy Land in 679, says that the soles of the feet of the patriarchs were not turned as it is the custom for the soles of the buried to be turned in other parts of the world, viz. towards the east, but to the south, and their heads to the north (Adamn. De Locis Sanctis, ii. 10; Acta S. O.S.B. ii.). Beale says that the body of our Lord "had the head on the west," and therefore looking eastward (iv. in S. Marci Ev. c. 16).^b The body was generally, but not always, laid on the back. Charlemagne was seated on a throne (Monach. Engol. in Vita).

XXI. Bay-leaves, &c., in the Grave.—The floor of the grave was sometimes strewn with evergreens. Thus when the body of Valerius was found in the 6th century "he had bay-leaves strewn under him" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 84). When certain bodies, supposed to be those of St. Simon and St. Jude, were translated from the ancient Vatican basilica in the 17th century, "there were found leaves of bay under their heads" (Casalius, de Vet. Sacr. Christ. Rit. 66, p. 266). Even in the 12th century John Beletth (copied by Durandus A.D. 1285, Ration. VII. xxxv. 38) says, "Let ivy or bay, which keep the greenness of their leaves for ever, be placed in the sarcophagus near the bodies, to express that they who die do not cease to live in Him" (Div. Off. Explic. 141).

XXII. Instruments of suffering buried with Martyrs.—St. Babylas, A.D. 250, according to St. Chrysostom, requested to be buried with the iron chains in which he had died (De Babyla c. Julian. 11). St. Ambrose, about 393, asserts that he found in the grave of Agricola at Bologna the cross and nails by which he had suffered in 303 (Echort. Virgin. ii. 9). St. Sabine desired that the stone which was to be tied to him when thrown in the river should be buried with his body (Surius, March 13; not in the copy of Baluze, Miscell. i. 12; ed. Mansi). When the body of St. Daniel was found in 707, the nails by which he suffered were found with him (Petr. Natal. ii. 60, apud Franzen. de Fun. Vet. Christ. 181). For other objects found in tombs, see CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 314.

XXIII. One not buried on another.—This was forbidden by the council of Auxerre, 578: "Non licet mortuum super mortuum mittere" (can. 15), and by a law of Childeric about 744 (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 153), which was adopted by the compilers of the Carolingian code (vi. 197). The reason of the prohibition is not given; but we may believe that it could not have been that assigned in an inscription given by Gruter: "Solus cur sim quæris. Ut in die censorio sine impedimento facilius resurgam" (Corp. Inscript. mlii. 8).

XXIV. Flowers on the Grave.—St. Ambrose, 392, clearly alludes to a custom of decking the grave with flowers in his oration on the death of Valentinian: "I will not scatter his tomb with flowers, but will bedew his spirit with the odour of Christ. Let others scatter lilies from full baskets; our lily is Christ" (De Obit. Valent. 56). St. Jerome, in 397, addressing one who had lately become a widower: "Other husbands scatter over the tombs of their wives violets, roses, lilies, and purple flowers, and solace their heart's pain by these offices. Our Pammachius waters the holy ashes and venerable bones with the balsam of alms" (Epist. 66, § 5). Prudentius, A.D. 405, alludes to the same custom (Peristephanon, Hymn iii. prope fin.; Cathem. Hymn. vii. in fin.).

^b Isidore of Seville, de Situ Corporum SS. Petri et Pauli, has been cited to shew that Christians buried to the east in the 1st century. There is no work of Isidore's under that title, and the reference can only be to the tract once ascribed to him, De Ortu et Obitu Patrum (App. 20; vii. 388, Rom. 1802), where we read in the account of St. Peter: "Sepultus in Vaticano ab urbe Roma ad orientem (forte, occidentem) tertio milliario" (§ 39). One MS. (Isidoriana, ibid. c. 107) says of St. Peter, "Ad Australium plagam est sepultus," and of St. Paul, "contra Orientalem plagam."

* The words ἐν τῷ σπλάχνι αὐτοῦ in Pseudo-Amphilochius (Vita S. Bas.) are an interpolation. See Amphil. Opera, p. 224; Par. 1644.

In Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Mart. 71) we read of sage-leaves scattered in the crypt of a basilic "in honour of the martyrs" buried there.

XXV. Lights at the Grave.—It is impossible to say when this practice began. The council of Elvira, about 305, ordered that "wax lights shall not be burnt in a cemetery in the daytime: for the spirits of the saints are not to be disquieted" (can. 34); the more probable sense of which is, that a needless blaze of light in the daytime would disturb the devotions of the faithful who frequented the cemetery for private prayer. See Notitia Eucharistica, 133 note; ed. 2. It is probable that these were in honour of martyrs only. The practice was apparently the same when Vigilantius wrote about 404: "We see under pretext of religion a custom introduced into the churches, after the fashion of the Gentiles, of burning masses of wax lights while the sun is still shining. . . . These people do a great honour to the most blessed martyrs, in conceiving them to receive light from worthless wax tapers, whom the Lamb, who is in the middle of the throne, lights with the full blaze of His majesty" (apud Hieron. contra Vigilant. § 4). Jerome ascribed the practice to women who had more zeal than knowledge, but at the same time defended it, "Hoc fit martyribus, et idecirco recipiendum est" (§ 8). At a later period we find lights left at the graves of others besides martyrs, and often renewed as at theirs. Thus when the mother of Aredius was buried, 570, "they placed a wax candle at her head" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 104). This is related incidentally; so that we infer a common practice. In the East Pseudo-Athanasius says: "Fail not to burn oil and wax at his tomb; for these things are acceptable to God, and they bring a great reward from Him" (apud Joan. Damasc. Orat. de iis qui in Fide dormierunt, § 19). See LIGHTS, THE CEREMONIAL USE OF, § ix.

XXVI. Almsgiving at Funerals.—The giving of alms both at the funeral and on days of commemoration was so strongly inculcated and strictly practised both in the East and West, that it is desirable to shew the grounds of it as well as to give testimonies to the fact; the more so because the reason more commonly alleged gave rise to momentous consequences in after-ages. The Apostolical Constitutions, about 200, appear to regard it as a simple act of piety to the deceased, to conciliate respect for his memory and to keep it alive among the people: "Of the things belonging to him, let there be given to the poor for a remembrance of him" (εἰς ἀνάμνησιν αὐτοῦ, viii. 42). Before the end of the 4th century, however, we find St. Chrysostom insisting without hesitation on a very different reason: "I shew you another mode of honouring the dead than by costly graveclothes, . . . the vesture of almsgiving. This garment will rise again with him" (Hom. 85 in Ev. S. Joan. § 5). Elsewhere he urges the practice that the departed "may be clothed with greater glory. If he has died a sinner, that his sins may be loosed: if a righteous man, that there may be an addition to his recompense and reward" (Hom. 31 in S. Matt. Ev. ix. 23). Again, speaking of a sinner who has "offended God in many things," he says: "It is right to weep (for him), or rather not to weep only, for that does not profit him, but to do those things that may bring him some comfort,—to give alms, to wit, and make offerings" (Hom. 62 in S. Joan. Ev. § 5). A later Greek writer calls "the alms left to the poor by the departed dead sacrifices," but adds, "Nevertheless, if he was merciful in his lifetime, his good deeds in death are accepted of God" (Quaest. ad Antioch. 90 inter Opp. S. Athan.).

The same sentiment prevailed in the Latin church at least from the middle of the 4th century. St. Jerome, for example, A.D. 397, says decidedly of Pammachius, that he moistened the ashes of his wife with the balsam of alms (Epist. 66 ad Pamm. § 6). St. Augustine: "It is not to be doubted that the dead are helped . . . by the alms which are distributed on behalf of their spirits; so that the Lord deals more mercifully with them than their sins have deserved" (Serm. 172, c. 2; sim. Enchirid. 110, § 29; De Dulcitii Quaest. ii. 4, and De Cura pro Mortuis, 18, § 22). He explains, however, that alms after death only profit those who have so lived as to be capable of benefit from them (Ench. u. s. cited by himself in De Dulc. Quaest. u. s.; comp. Serm. u. s. and De Cura, u. s.; also Isidor. Hispal. de Offic. i. 18). Laws were at length founded on the practice. Thus a canon of the English council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, orders that on the death of a bishop "a tenth of his substance shall be given for his soul's sake in alms to the poor, of his cattle and herds, of his sheep and swine, and also of his provision within door, and that every Englishman [of his] who has been made a slave in his days be set at liberty, that by this means he may deserve to receive the fruit of retribution for his labours and also forgiveness of sins" (can. 10; Johnson's tr.).

XXVII. The Feast at the Funeral.—The motives which led to the giving of alms at a funeral also gave rise to a custom of entertaining the poor at a feast, which was often repeated on days of commemoration. An early allusion occurs in the Apostolical Constitutions: "In the memoriae of the departed, feast when invited in an orderly manner and in the fear of God, that ye may be able to intercede for those who have departed" (viii. 44). Constantine, about 325, speaks of the "perfectly sober feasts celebrated by many" at the funerals of the faithful "for pity and relief of the needy and the assistance of exiles" (Orat. ad Sanct. Coetum, 12). "Why," asks St. Chrysostom, "dost thou invite the poor and call priests to pray? That the departed may come to rest, you say, that he may find the Judge merciful" (Hom. 31 in S. Matt. Ev. ix. 23). "If thou wert commemorating a son or a brother deceased, thou wouldst be conscience-stricken if thou didst not observe the custom and invite the poor" (Hom. 27 in 1 Cor. xi. 25). Paulinus, A.D. 397, has left a description of the funeral feast given by Pammachius, on the death of his wife, to the poor of Rome in the church of St. Peter (Epist. xiii. 11).

It will be observed that Pseudo-Origen speaks as if the festival were of the same character, whether it celebrated the death of a martyr or of a private friend. The fact is that the festivity of a saint's day was at first nothing more than the repetition of his funeral feast on the anniversary of his death. [CELLA MEMORIAE.]

When Christianity became the religion of the people, such occasions naturally led to excess and other evils. "I know that there are many," says St. Augustine, "who eat and drink most luxuriously over the dead" (De Mor. Eccl. 34, § 75). On this account St. Ambrose suppressed the feasts of commemoration at Milan (Aug. Conf. v. 2); but it is uncertain whether his prohibition embraced that held at the funeral itself. St. Augustine, encouraged by the example, induced his bishop Aurelius to do the same at Hippo (Epist. 22 ad Aurel. i. § 6). With this advice of St. Augustine to his bishop we may connect a canon of the council of Carthage, 398, at which both were present: "Let those who either refuse to the churches the oblations of the dead or give them grudgingly be excommunicated as slayers of the needy" (can. 95). The last phrase occurs also in a canon of Vaison in France, 442, where the reason assigned is that "the faithful departing from the body are defrauded of the fulness of their desires, and the poor of the relief of alms and needful sustenance" (can. 4). Modern writers have called the feast of which we have now spoken "the funeral agape." We are not aware that it was ever so called by the ancients. Nor does it answer to the true notion of an agape. It was not a common meal to which many contributed and of which all partook as an act of communion. Whatever its motive, it was simply a provision for the poor by the rich mourner, and it does not appear that even the giver of the feast sat down to it with those whom he fed.

Though the festivities of saints' days originated in the funeral feast, they are more properly referred to another head.

XXVIII. The Eucharist at Funerals.—The eucharist was celebrated at funerals, but we cannot say that this was general, even when the ceremony took place in the morning. The persons in whose case it is mentioned were of eminence. The Apostolical Constitutions, referring to the obsequies of the dead, say: "Offer both in your churches and in the cemeteries the acceptable eucharist, the antitype of the kingly body of Christ" (vi. 30); but this would be satisfied by any subsequent celebration. The council of Carthage, A.D. 397, orders that "the sacraments of the altar be celebrated only by men fasting;" and as a consequence, that when the "commemoration of any deceased persons, whether bishops or others, is to take place in the afternoon, it be celebrated with prayers only, if they who celebrate it are found to have already broken their fast" (can. 29). The natural inference is that a celebration at the time was not considered all-important. Nor was it likely to have been so considered, seeing that it formed part of the later rites of commemoration. The following are among the instances on record of a celebration at the funeral itself. Eusebius says that Constantine was at his funeral "deemed worthy of the mystic liturgy, and enjoyed the communion of holy prayers" (Vita Const. iv. 71). St. Augustine says in reference to his mother's burial, "Those prayers which we poured out to Thee, when the sacrifice of our ransom was offered for her, the body already placed near the tomb before its burial, as is the custom there, &c. (Conf. ix. 12, § 32). So at the funeral of St. Augustine himself: "The sacrifice for commendation of the burial of the body was offered to God, and he was buried" (Possid. in Vita Aug. 31). Similarly in the 6th century, St. Lupicinus was buried "celebratis missis" (Greg. Tur. Vitae Patr. 13).

St. Ambrose was carried from the church (where he lay in state) "after the celebration of the divine sacraments to the Ambrosian basilica, in which he was buried" (Paulinus, in Vita S. Ambr. 48). As this was on Easter Day, the celebration was not "pro defuncto," but his name would be inserted in the office for the day. "For this, handed down from the fathers, the whole church observes, that prayer be made for those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of Christ, when they are commemorated in their place at the sacrifice itself, and that it be also mentioned that it is offered for them" (Aug. Serm. 172, § 2). To this commemoration of the departed St. Cyprian refers when he says of an offender, "He does not deserve to be named at the altar in the prayer of the priest," which he otherwise expresses by saying that "that sacrifice should not be offered for his falling asleep" (Epist. i. p. 8). In accordance with this Cyril of Jerusalem says, "We pray for the holy fathers and bishops, and, in a word, for all who have gone to their rest among us, believing that a great benefit will result to the souls of those for whom the prayer is offered when the holy and awful sacrifice is set forth" (Catech. Myst. v. 6). This will receive illustration from later sections.

XXIX. Commemorations.—There were commemorations by prayer and eucharist at various periods after the death or burial. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions: "Let the third day of those departed to rest be celebrated in psalms and reading (of Scripture) and prayers, for the sake of Him who rose again on the third day; and the ninth for a remembrance of the surviving and the deceased; and the fortieth (some MSS. thirtieth), because the people thus bewailed Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 8), and the anniversary in remembrance of the person, and let there be given of his substance to the poor for a memorial of him" (viii. 42, the original text; sim. the Coptic Constit. 76, Tattam's tr. 146). St. Ambrose says that some observe the third and the thirtieth, others the seventh and the fortieth day after death (De Obitu Theod. 3). His oration on the death of Theodosius was delivered on the fortieth. His first De Excessu Satyri was preached at the funeral ("procedamus ad tumulum," sub fin. § 78); the second on the seventh day after the death (§ 2). In a story told by Palladius, 401, the fortieth day was being celebrated in a monastery on a certain occasion for one person, and the third for another at the same time (Hist. Laus. 26). An African bishop, writing to St. Augustine, says, in reference to the funeral of a friend, "For the space of three days we praised the Lord with hymns over his grave, and on the third day we offered the sacraments of redemption" (Ep. 158, inter Epp. Aug. § 2). Justinian in his laws recognises the days mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions (Coll. ix. 16, xvi.; Novell. 133, c. 3). The rules laid down by Theodore of Canterbury, a Greek of Tarsus by birth, are especially interesting, from his history and position: "He ought to celebrate the masses of departed laymen thrice in the year, on the third day, the ninth day, and thirtieth day; because the Lord rose on the third day, and gave up the ghost at the ninth hour, and the sons of Israel bewailed Moses thirty days" (Capit. 37; Labbe, Conc. vi. 1876). "For a deceased monk mass is performed on the day of his burial, on the third day, and afterwards, if the abbot will; for a good layman three or seven masses are to be said, after fasting; for a penitent, on the thirtieth or seventh day; and his relations ought to fast, and offer an oblation on the altar on the fifth, as in Jesus, the son of Sirach, it is read, 'The children of Israel fasted for Saul;' and afterwards, if the presbyter will" (ibid. 19). Of "monks or religious men," he says that at Rome "a mass is performed for them on the first and third, and ninth and thirtieth day; and it is observed again at the end of the year, if they will" (ibid. 90, 1877). Amalarius, at the beginning of the 9th century, says, "We have it written in a certain sacramentary (comp. the Gelasian, iii. 105; Murat. i. 762) that the offices of the dead are to be celebrated on the third, the seventh, and the thirtieth day" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 42). It is naturally inferred from some of the foregoing authorities that these days were reckoned from the death; but at Rome, during the latter part of one period, at least, it seems to have been from the burial; for in the Gelasian Sacramentary, a commemorative missa has this title, "Missa in Depositione Defuncti tertii, septimi, xxx^{mi} dierum, vel annualem" (Murat. u. s.). So in the Gregorian Prefaces (Murat. ii. 355), "In die depositionis Defuncti tertio, et septimo, et trigesimo."

Although the ninth day was so widely observed, especially in the East, we find it rejected by St. Augustine, as recalling a heathen observance. He says that it has no precedent in Scripture: "Therefore they ought, as it seems to me, to be kept from this custom ('which they call among the Latins, novendial,' ibid.), if any Christians observe that number in the case of their dead, which belongs rather to the custom of the Gentiles" (Quaest. in Gen. 172).

XXX. Annual Commemorations.—The celebration at the year's end was recurrent from a very early period. Tertullian, A.D. 195, says, "We make oblations for the departed by way of birthday gifts on the anniversary" (De Cor. Mil. 3). St. Cyprian, 250, of certain martyrs: "We always, as ye remember, offer sacrifice for them, as often as we celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration" (Epist. 39, p. 77). Gregory Nazianzen thus apostrophises his deceased brother Caesarius: "Every year will we, at least those who are left alive, offer honours and rites of commemoration" (Orat. vii. § 17). It is probable that Monica had in mind this custom of a yearly commemorative celebration of the eucharist when she said, shortly before her death, "I ask no more than that, wherever ye are, ye will remember me at the altar of the Lord" (Aug. Conf. ix. 9).

XXXI. Daily Masses for the Dead.—In the 6th century we find masses said daily in the West on behalf of the departed: e.g. a widow of Lyons "celebrated masses every day, and offered an oblation pro memoria viri" (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Conf. 65). Gregory of Rome in his Dialogues (iv. 55) speaks of a priest who "for a whole week afflicted himself in tears, and daily offered the salutary host" for one deceased. He also relates of himself that he once ordered a priest "to offer sacrifice for thirty days consecutively" for the soul of a monk who had broken his rule (ibid.). It is, in all probability, owing to this statement of Gregory, that the practice of trentals (trigintale, trentale, trigintarium, trigintinarium, trentenarium, tricenarium, &c.) was said to have originated with him (Sala in Bona, Rer. Lit. i. xv. 4). We do not hear of it, however, as usual, until the 8th century. In 757, Lullus, archbishop of Mentz, writes to his presbyters: "We have sent you the names of the lord bishop of Rome (Stephen II., lately deceased), for whom let each one of you sing thirty masses et illos psalmos et jejunium (probably corrupt), according to our custom" (Ep. 107, inter Epp. Bonifacii, ed. Würdw.). In the 9th century, the faithful in France were commanded to keep fast and to make oblations for their kindred thirty days (Capit. Reg. Fr. vi. 198). Similarly Herard of Tours (can. 58): "Triginti diebus amici et parentes pro eis agant." This lengthened observance of thirty days was obviously suggested by Numb. xx. 29 and Deut. xxiv. 8. In Bede we read of a priest who offered masses frequently (saepius, crebras) for a brother supposed to be dead (Hist. Eccl. Angl. iv. 22). They do not appear to have been daily, nor is any period mentioned throughout which he offered them.

XXXII. Where the Name of the Deceased was introduced.—For several centuries there were no special prayers provided for use when the eucharist was celebrated on account of one departed: only the name was introduced at some appropriate part of the service. The council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, orders that "in every celebration of the mass the Lord be entreated for the spirits of the departed at a suitable place" (can. 39). At that place the names were mentioned. It varied, as at length fixed by custom, in the several liturgies. [DIRTYCHS; NAMES, OBULATION OF.]

XXXIII. Missa Defuncti.—We do not know when, at a celebration for the dead, a set of proper prayers (Missa pro Defuncto, Missa Defuncti) was substituted for the usual collects. For a long period "a mass for the dead differed [only] from an ordinary mass in being celebrated without Gloria, and Alleluia, and the kiss of peace" (Amal. de Eccl. Off. iii. 44). There is reason to think that the change began in France, for our earliest examples of a Missa Defuncti are thence. One occurs in the Besançon Sacramentary discovered at Bobio, consisting of a proper Praefatio (Gallican), Collectio, Post nomina, Ad pacem, and Contestatio (Musaeum Ital. i. 385). The MS. is of the 7th century. There is also a fragment of a Missa pro Defunctis discovered by Niebuhr, and published by Bunsen, which the latter ascribes to Hilary of Poitiers, A.D. 350 (Analecta Antenica. iii. 263). Had it been so early, we should certainly have found similar forms in all the sacramentaries used in France, but there are none in the Gallico-Gothic, the Frankish, or old Gallican, the MSS. of which date from about 550 to about 800 (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 513). There are several such missae in the Mozarabic Missal, but we can gather nothing to the purpose from this fact, as that liturgy was in use and receiving additions till the 11th century. Turning to Rome we find several such masses in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. i. 752, &c.), the MS. of which is at least 1100 years old; but they could not have been in general use or much known when Amalarius wrote (827), for beside the remark quoted above he says expressly (ibid.), "Recordatio mortuorum nuncupative agitur ante Nobis quoque peccatoribus," i.e. in the canon. The MSS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, in which similar forms are found (Murat. ii. 752), do not carry us with probability higher than the 8th century. The Gelasian Missa Defuncti contained a collect for the day, Secreta, Infra actionem, Post Commun. (Greg. Ad complendum), to which the Gregorian adds a proper preface (Murat. ii. 354 et seq.).

The name of the person for whom the oblation was made was inserted in each of the proper prayers of the Missa. Thus in the Besançon Sacramentary: "That Thou vouchsafe to take the soul of Thy servant N. (famoli Tui ill.) into the bosom of Abraham" (Praef.); "To take to Thyself the soul of Thy servant N." (coll.); "We pray Thee for the soul of Thy servant N." (Post nom.); "For the spirits of all the departed, but chiefly for the soul of this Thy servant N." (Ad pac.); "Do Thou, O Christ, receive the soul of Thy servant N." (Contest.) (Mus. Ital. i. 385).

These Missae pro Defunctis were in use in the church of Rome before prayer for acknowledged saints was given up in it. The Secreta for the feasts of St. Leo and St. Gregory was left with the following petition in it down to the 13th century (see Innocent III. Decr. Const. iii. 130): "Grant, O Lord, that this oblation may profit the soul of Thy servant Leo (or Gregory)" (Murat. ii. 25, 101).

The omission of the Alleluia which Amalarius (u. s.) seems to have thought universal in his time was, as we have seen, contrary to the feeling of the earlier church. Nor was this expression of joy ever quite disused even in the West. It is sung with the Officium or Introit of the Mozarabic Missa Defuncti: "Thou art my portion, O Lord. Alleluia." "In the land of the living. Alleluia," bis (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 456). Compare the Officium pro Defunctis mentioned at the end of § vii. 1.

The Antiphony ascribed to Gregory I. supplies two sets of Antiphons for these Missae Defunctorum (Pamelius, Rituale PP. ii. 175), in which the chief point of interest is that one of them has the introit, "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis" (from 2 Esdr. ii. 345; Vulg. 4 Esdr.), still in use. The former clause of it had been used earlier as a capitulum (see before, vii. 1).

XXXIV. Abuse of Masses for the Dead.—A dreadful crime to which these missae gave occasion is described as frequent by the council of Toledo in 694. Priests would say "missam pro requie defunctorum" for a living object of their hatred, in hope that it would cause his death, "ut . . . mortis ac perditionis incurrat periculum" (can. 5). It is difficult to believe that this was very common, though the council affirms that many priests ("plerique sacerdotum") were guilty of it. Gratian gives the canon in brief, but preserves this startling expression (II. xxvi. v. 13, § 1; Quicumque sacerdotum).

XXXV. Mutual Compacts for Masses, &c.—In the 8th century we begin to hear of agreements between priests that prayers and masses shall be said by the survivors for those of the number who should pre-decease them. In 752 we find Boniface making this proposal to the abbot Optatus: "We earnestly beseech you that there be the intimacy of brotherly charity between us, and that there be mutual prayers for the living, and that prayers and masses be celebrated for those who depart out of this world, when the names of the deceased shall be sent from either of us to the other" (Ep. 93). About the same time Cuthbert writes to Lullus: "The names of the brethren which thou hast sent to me are recorded with the names of the brethren of this monastery who sleep in Christ, so that I have given order to celebrate for them ninety masses, and more than that" (Ep. 127, inter Epp. Bonif.). As the writer speaks of the "amicitiae foedera" long existing between them, and entreats Lullus to continue to pray for him, and declares that he (Cuthbert) remembers him in his "daily prayers," we shall not be wrong in regarding this celebration of masses as another instance of the mutual engagements then becoming common. In 765 a number of bishops and abbots, met in council at Attignis-sur-Aisne, agreed that "every one of them . . . should, when any one of their number departed this life, say one hundred psalters, and their presbyters sing a hundred special masses for him; and that the bishop should himself perform thirty masses, unless prevented by sickness or any other hindrance, in which case he was to ask another bishop to sing them for him. Abbots, not bishops, were to ask bishops to perform thirty masses in their stead, and their presbyters were to perform one hundred masses, and their monks to remember to sing one hundred psalters" (Labb. Conc. vi. 1702). A similar compact was entered into by the bishops at Tournai or Savonnières in 859 (see can. 13, Labb. viii. 678). [See NECROLOGIUM.]

XXXVI. To whom Christian Rites were denied.—Catechumens were not generally buried with the solemnities that we have described. St. Chrysostom, after a reference to those rites, says: "But this concerns those who have departed in the faith. Catechumens are not thought worthy of this consolation, but are deprived of every help of the kind, with one exception. What is that? We can give to the poor on their behalf, and that yields them a certain solace, for God wills that we should be benefited by one another" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Philipp. § 4; sim. Hom. xxiii. in Ev. S. Joan. § 3; lxxxv. 50; Hom. 21 in Act. App. 3, 4). This was the rule, but there must have been exceptions in the case of catechumens who suffered death for the faith, for their martyrdom was considered an effectual baptism in blood (see Bingham, x. ii. 20, and MARTYR), and must therefore, we presume, have been held to entitle the sufferer to every Christian privilege after death. The inference is slightly strengthened by the fact that, when catechumens are related to have suffered with the baptized, no difference of treatment after death is noticed (see Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 4). We may believe the same of those who were prepared for baptism, but lost it through no fault of their own. "I conclude," says Augustine, "that not only suffering for the name of Christ can supply that which is wanting of baptism, but that faith and conversion of heart can also, if it so happen that in the difficulties of the time help is not forthcoming toward the celebration of the mystery of baptism" (De Bapt. c. Don. iv. 21, § 29). Valentinian was an instance. He was prepared, and earnestly desired to be baptized, but was cut off suddenly before he could receive the sacrament. We should infer from the language of St. Ambrose that he was buried with all the usual rites; for not only did he deliver a funeral oration on the occasion of his death, but in it he says, "Give the holy mysteries to his manes; let us pray for his rest with pious affection. Give the heavenly sacraments; let us wait on his soul with our oblations" (De Obitu Valent. 56).

In 563 the council of Braga decreed that "neither the commemoration of an oblation nor the office of psalm-singing should be bestowed on catechumens who had died without the redemption of baptism" (can. 17); and, with regard to suicides, that "no commemoration should be made for them in the oblation, and that their bodies should not be conducted to the grave with psalms" (can. 16). Both these rules, the council declares, had been violated through ignorance. It made the same order with reference to those who are "punished for their crimes" (can. 16). The council of Auxerre, 578, also forbids the oblation of suicides to be received (can. 17). Earlier than either, the council of Orleans, 533, says: "We judge that the oblation of the dead who have been cut off in any crime (i.e. probably, 'while under accusation for any offence'), ought to be received, provided that they are proved not to have brought death on themselves by their own hands" (can. 14). Eugenius II., A.D. 824, deprives nuns who persist to the last in breach of rule, of "Christian burial" (Decr. 3). He decrees the same against those who exhibit feats of strength at fairs, &c., though granting them "penance and the viaticum" (ibid. 7). The council of Mentz, 848, decrees that "the bodies of those who are hung on the gallows may be carried to church, and masses and oblations offered for them, if they have confessed their sins" (can. 27).

XXXVI. Unreconciled Penitents.—The Gregorian Sacramentary provides a "Missa pro Defunctis desiderantibus Poenitentiam et minime consequentibus" (Murat. ii. 219), to which this is prefixed: "If any one who asks for penance rubric shall be deprived of the power of speech while the priest is coming, it is determined that, if suitable witnesses have declared this, and he himself proves it by any gestures, the priest do all things in regard to the penitent according to the custom." The proper collects assume that he desired absolution, and pray that his death may not deprive him of the "fruit of penance which his will desired." See further on this, OBLATIONS, § iii. 2, from which it will be seen that the earlier discipline of the church of Rome was different.

OCEANUS. (1), martyr with Theodorus, Amianus, Julianus; commemorated Sept. 4 (Basil, Menol.); the same or another, Sept. 18, at Nicomedia (Wright's Ancient Syr. Mart. in Journal of S. Lit. 1866, 429). [C. H.]

OCTAVA, sister, probably, of St. Laurentius; commemorated Aug. 17. (Usuard, Mart.) [C. H.]

OCTAVAE INFANTIUM, Low Sunday or the octave of Easter, otherwise called Dominica in Albis, so called because the white bands which were wrapped round the heads of the newly-baptized infants were then taken off. "Hodie Octavae dicuntur infantium, revelanda sunt capita eorum, quod est indicium libertatis" (August. de Temp. 160, § 1); and again, "vos qui baptizati estis et hodie completur sacramentum Octavarum vestrarum, infantes appellamini quia regenerati estis." (Ibid. Serm. 11, de Diversis). [E. V.]

OCTAVE OF A FESTIVAL. (Octava, Octavae.) The eighth day, or space of eight days, after a festival, kept as a prolongation or repetition of the festival itself, honoris causa. It is a Western custom, apparently unknown in the Oriental church. [See APODOSIS.] In more recent times the number of festivals to which octaves are assigned has been largely multiplied; and the octaves are divided into four classes, according to their degrees of solemnity; but within the first eight centuries it would seem that only Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost had this distinction, together with the Epiphany in some localities, and perhaps the Feast of the Dedication of the Church, or of the Patron Saint.

Various reasons have been assigned for the custom. Different writers on ritual have found a ground for it in the Jewish observance of the eighth day for circumcision, to which indeed St. Augustine refers in speaking of the octave of Easter as kept by the newly baptized, OCTAVAE INFANTIUM (de Div. Temp. cap. i.; Ep. lv. 32, 33, &c.), or in the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles for eight days, or in the Feast of the Dedication of the Temple by Solomon, and of the re-dedication under Zerubbabel; or, again (under the new covenant), in the appearance of our Lord on the eighth day from the Resurrection; and in the mystical value of the number eight, as a symbol of perfection and of rest.

But the first actual trace of the custom upon which we light is the Octave of Easter, during which the newly baptized continued to wear their white baptismal garments. Bede mentions the Octave of Pentecost. In a capitulary of Charlemagne we meet with the octaves of Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter; in can. 26 of the council of Mainz (A.D. 813) with those of Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. The end of the 8th and beginning of the 9th century was the period to which may be assigned the chief growth of this observance. In the treatise De Eccles. Off. of Amalarius, we hear only of the octaves of Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, and Pentecost; but it says also (iv. 36): "Solemus octavas natalitiorum aliquorum Sanctorum celebrare, eorum scilicet, quorum festivitas apud nos clarius habetur, veluti est in octavis apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et caeterorum Sanctorum, quorum consuetudo diversarum Ecclesiarum octavas celebrat," clearly implying that the custom was growing up in different parts of the church, but that it had not yet become a matter of uniform obligation.

As to the liturgical observance of these days, from the fact that neither in the Gelasian nor Gregorian Sacramentary is any mass assigned for the days within the octave, but only for the octave itself, we may perhaps infer that at first the octave was merely, as it is still in the majority of cases, a repetition of the festival, and of its office on the day week, and that afterwards the intermediate days were filled up by similar repeated commemorations. This would only hold good, however, of the principal octaves. The various rules for determining the right precedence of offices, when other festivals fall within an octave, belong to a period later than our limits.

For the literature of the subject see under FESTIVAL, adding Grancolas, Commentarius Historicus in Romanum Breviarium, lib. i., cap. 45; Venetiis, 1734. [C. E. H.]

OCTAVIUS, martyr at Turin, with Solutor and Adventor; commemorated Nov. 20. (Usuard, Mart.) OCTAVUS (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

ODE. The name ὠδή is given in the Greek Church—

(1) To the nine Canticles which are said at Lauds. [CANTICLE, p. 285.]

(2) To certain rhythmical compositions, often of considerable beauty, relating to the special commemoration of the day, which are said in the Greek matins office. See CANON OF ODES, p. 277; OFFICE, THE DIVINE; TROPARIA. The arrangement of these odes, generally nine in each office, separated into three groups by a short litany after the third and sixth, resembles that of LECTIONS in the Western offices; they may in fact be said to take the place of lections, which are not used in ordinary offices in the East. (Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, c. i. § 5, p. 125.) [C.]

OECONOMUS (1), the house steward, or manager of a household. Possidius (Vita August. c. 24) says that St. Augustine never used key or seal, but committed the whole management of his domestic affairs to the most able of his clergy, who transacted all the business of receipts and payments, and gave in an annual account. See also Conc. Ilerd. (c. 16) quoted below.

2. The treasurer of a particular church. Thus Cyriac, before his elevation to the patriarchate of Constantinople, was oeconomus of the great church in that city. (Chronicon Paschale, p. 378.)

3. A diocesan official, holding a distinct position and discharging a public duty in managing all property belonging to the see. Originally the business connected with the temporal affairs of the see appears to have been managed by the bishop and his chapter. The council of Antioch, A.D. 341 (c. 24, 25), speaks of the possibility of the revenues of the church being misapplied by the bishop and his presbyters, and decrees that all church property should be administered with the knowledge of the whole of the clergy, both priests and deacons, and a regular account kept of the property belonging to the church, in order to prevent waste on the one hand, and spoliation of the property of a deceased bishop on the other. Though the appointment of an oeconomus is not specially decreed in these canons, yet it seems to have been considered as implied in them, or at least originating from them. At the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (act. 9), the case was brought forward of Ibas, bishop of Edessa, who was charged with malversation of the property of the church, and who promises that for the future the revenues of the see shall be administered by an oeconomus chosen from the clergy, according to the decrees of the great council of Antioch. From the date indeed of this council the oeconomus is recognised in the decrees of councils as one of the officials necessarily existing in a diocese. The council of Gangra (c. 7, 8) forbids under pain of anathema that any one shall receive or dispense the revenues of the church except the bishop himself, or the officer appointed to the stewardship of benefactions (εἰς οἰκονομίαν εὐνοίας). The council of Chalcedon, already quoted, after declaring (c. 26) that it had come to the knowledge of the council that certain bishops administered the property of the church without an oeconomus, provides that every diocese should have an oeconomus, chosen from the clergy belonging to it (ἐκ τοῦ ἰδίου κλήρου), who should manage the property of the church under direction (κατὰ γνώμην) of the bishop, in order that no waste should be made of the property, and publicity given to the way in which it was employed. In case of the death of a bishop (c. 25) the oeconomus was to manage the property of the see during the vacancy. The same council (c. 2) mentions the oeconomus among the officials in whose appointment simony is forbidden. The council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 16), while reprobating the custom that appears to have prevailed among the Spanish clergy of plundering the property of a deceased bishop, orders that the bishop who has charge of the funeral shall provide that all things are fitly and carefully managed, and that the officer who has charge of his domestic affairs, associating with himself one or two clergy, should pay the stipends of the clergy belonging to the bishop's household, and take charge of the property of the see for the succeeding bishop. The council of Valentia, A.D. 524 (c. 2), after again reproaching the custom of plundering the house of a deceased bishop, enacts that at the death of a bishop the incumbent of the nearest see should make an inventory within eight days of the goods and property belonging to the diocese, and send it to the metropolitan, who should put a proper person in charge of such revenues, in order that the clergy should receive their proper stipends during the vacancy, and the property be handed over unimpaired to the succeeding bishop. [VACANCY.] It would appear from these canons that the office of oeconomus was unknown in the dioceses of Spain at the date of the councils by which they were made. But the second council of Seville, A.D. 618 (c. 9), after reciting that it had come to the knowledge of the council that certain bishops had oeconomi chosen from the laity, enacts that no bishop should administer the temporal affairs of his diocese except through an oeconomus chosen from among his clergy, according to the decree of the council of Chalcedon, giving as a reason that it is unbecoming that a layman should be the representative vicarius of a bishop, or sit in judgment on church matters; and that those who are associated with a bishop in the administration of affairs ought not to differ with him either in apparel or profession. From this canon it appears that the oeconomus possessed some jurisdiction in the adjustment of financial matters. Thus we are told (Theod. Lect. H. E. i.) that Marcian, a convert from the sect of the Cathari, whom Gennadius of Constantinople appointed as his oeconomus, at once ordained that all the offerings of the faithful in Constantinople should belong to the churches in which they were made, instead of being considered the property of the great church. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 48), referring to the decree of the council of Chalcedon, enacts that every bishop should select from the clergy of his diocese those officers whom the Greeks call "oeconomi;" that is, who, in stead (vice) of the bishop, manage the affairs of the church. The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 47), strictly forbids the clergy of the diocese, under any circumstances, to elect an oeconomus to manage the temporal affairs of the see without the assent of the bishop; if the bishop, through bodily infirmity, is incapable of acting, the archbishop is to select the oeconomus with the assent of the bishop. Another council, A.D. 876 (Conc. Pontigo, c. 14), enacts that at the death of a bishop the oeconomus shall be his executor, and guardian of the property of the see.

The laws of the French kings make frequent mention of the oeconomus and his duties. A capitulary of Charles the Great (ii. c. 9, ed. Baluz.) provides that the oeconomus shall be responsible for any injury sustained by the property of the see during his administration; and also mentions an archioeconomus, probably the head of the other oeconomi. Photius (Syntag. tit. x. 2) gives an edict of Justinian commanding oeconomi to settle the accounts of their sees once a year. If bishops do not appoint oeconomi, the archbishops are to do so (Nomocan. tit. x. c. i.).

Oeconomi appointed in accordance with these decrees are frequently mentioned in ecclesiastical writers. Socrates (H. E. vi. 7) says that Theophilus of Alexandria appointed two Egyptian monks to the stewardship of his church (οἰκονομῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας), adding that they thus discovered his greediness and rapacity, and were so disgusted that they deserted their posts and retired to the desert (see Vales. Annot. in loco). Gregory the Great (Epist. iii. 22, p. 649), in the case of the vacant see of Salona in Dalmatia, orders that the oeconomus who was in charge of the diocese at the death of the bishop should continue to manage the revenues, and give in his account to the next bishop. A precept of Hincmar, bishop of Rheims, addressed to Hedenulph, bishop of Laon (Gall. Conc. ii. p. 660), strictly forbids him to take money for the appointment of an oeconomus, whom he styles the dispenser of the property of the church ("facultatum ecclesiae dispensator"). In an epistle to the church of Laon (Opp. ii. p. 178), the same prelate declares that the oeconomus was the proper guardian of the property of the see at the death of the bishop. Liberatus (Brev. c. 16) speaks of a certain John, who was promoted from being an oeconomus to be presbyter of the church at Tabennesus, and afterwards became again oeconomus, having charge of the revenues of all the churches. The duties of the oeconomus are defined at length by Isidore of Seville (Epist. i.; Bibl. Patr. viii. p. 210) as comprising all business relating to the building of churches, the management of all law matters in which the church was concerned, the superintendence of all fields, vineyards, and all ecclesiastical possessions, the division of the revenues in due proportion among the clergy, the widows, and poor, and the allowance of food and clothing to the clergy and others belonging to the bishop's household. But all to be done under the authority and by the direction of the bishop.

From all this two things seem clear—that the oeconomus was to be one of the clergy, and to be appointed by the bishop. But a canon of Theophilus of Alexandria (c. 9, in Beveridge, Pandect. ii. 173) says that the oeconomus was chosen by the vote of all the clergy. (See Bingham, Antiquities, iii. 13, § 1.)

In later years the duties of the oeconomus appear to have been transferred to the treasurer, Thesaurarius. [P. O.]

OECONOMUS (MONASTIC), Cymr. MAER, Gael. MAOR, Irish MAER, MAOR, MOER, and FERTIGHIS (Four Mast. A.D. 777, 782: Fep a man, and Tigh a house), called also EQUONIMUS (Ann. Ult. A.D. 780 sq.), was "custos monasterii," spenser or house steward, having charge of the internal secular affairs of the monastery, such even as providing the corn and wood (Colgan, Acta SS. 213, c. 44; 393, c. 6). In Four Mast. A.D. 777, he is called prior, and may have been local administrator of the subject monasteries, or vice-abbat in the parent house (Reeves, S. Adamnan, 65, 365). As the oeconomus of the see had charge of the gifts of the faithful, and, at a later period, of the episcopal and cathedral estates (Du Cange, Gloss. iv. 696, 697), so the monastic oeconomus received the tributes due to the monastery; while again in Ireland the airchinneach, in Scotland the herenach, and on the Continent the advocatus ecclesiae, farmed the monastic tithes or lands, as the abbat's deputy, maor, or steward, with a percentage of one-third for his labour. The tributes and fines, in Irish "cain," were of various kinds, according to the form of transgression; as the amounts must have been considerable, a person of probity was required, and the ancient canons required the persons so entrusted to belong to the clerical order (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. iii. c. 12, § 1, 2). But in Ireland the oeconomus or maor had custody also, specially in later times, of the sacred relics and valuable property belonging to the monastery; as at Armagh, the "Book of Armagh," and patron's bell (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 150, 370), and St. Patrick's crozier, called the "Baculus Jesu" (Bernardus, Vit. S. Malach. c. 5), and held an endowment of land attached to the office, which being hereditary has given a name to the family of Mac Moyre, and to the townland of Ballymire beside Armagh (Todd, S. Patrick, 170, 171; Petrie, Round Towers, 333-335; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. i. Ep. Nunc. pp. lvii. lviii). In illustration of this, we find the steward, maor, and later the thane, as a regal officer collecting the royal dues from the crown lands, and presenting the royal tenantry at the annual hosting; while a still higher official, called the mormaor, or lord high steward, discharged a similar duty in the larger province, which afterwards became the earldom or county. (Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, i. 29 sq., 329, 330; O'Curry, Lect. Man. Cust. Anc. Irish, i. pp. ccxlv. ccxlv.) [J. G.]

OECUMENICAL. (οἰκουμενικός) (1). The word "oecumenical," when applied to a council, designates one to which the bishops of the whole world have been summoned; or the decrees of which have at any rate been accepted by the whole church. Οἰκουμενικός is of course derived from ἡ οἰκουμένη, which, though frequently applied to that portion of the world which was organised under the Roman empire, is commonly used both in the LXX. and in the New Testament for the whole inhabited earth (Bleek, Erklär. d. drei ersten Evangg. i. 68; COUNCILS, p. 474). The councils within our period which are recognised as oecumenical are, the First of Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451); the Second (553) and Third (680) of Constantinople, and the Second of Nicaea (787).

(2) On the title "oecumenical bishop," or "oecumenical patriarch," applied to the bishop of Rome, see POPE. [C.]

OFFA JUDICIALIS. [ORDEAL, V.]

OFFERENDA. [OFFERTORIUM.]

OFFERINGS. [OBLATIONS.]

OFFERTORIUM. (1) Offertorium, Antiphona ad Offertorium, Cantus Offertorii, Offerenda, were names given to the anthem sung while the oblations were received. We learn from St. Augustine that in his time "a custom had sprung up at Carthage of saying at the altar hymns from the Book of Psalms, whether before the oblation, or when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people" (Retract. 11). The latter hymn or anthem was afterwards called the COMMUNIO: the former the offertorium or offerenda in Italy, and its derived churches; the sonum, or perhaps, more correctly, sonus, in Gaul, and the sacrificium in Spain. Whether the practice originated at Carthage, or had been observed before elsewhere, is not known. Walafrid Strabo, A.D. 842, did not not know who added to the office "the offertory which is sung during the offering," or "the antiphon said at the communion;" but believed that "in old times the holy fathers offered and communicated in silence" (de Reb. Eccl. 22).

Isidore, A.D. 595, appears to be the first who uses the word offertorium: "Offertoria quae in sacrificiorum honore canuntur" (u. s.). "Offerenda" was later, but apparently as common for a long period. It is used by Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. iii. 39: "De offerenda Vir eras in terra," where he has "offertorium" also; by Remigius of Auxerre (de Celebr. Missae, ad calc; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. cap. 40); John of Avranches (Rit. Celebr. Miss. in App. Sacram. Gregor. Opp. Greg. iii. 255); Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 19.

This anthem is not prescribed in the earliest Ordo Romanus, about 730; but in the second, perhaps about A.D. 800, after the creed, which is also absent from the first, "the bishop salutes the people, saying, 'The Lord be with you. After that he says, Let us pray. Then the offertorium is sung, with verses'" (Mus. Ital. ii. 46). When the oblations have been all received and offered, "the pontiff, bowing a little towards the altar, looks at the choir, and nods to them to be silent" (47). The verses and offerenda were repeated until the offering was over. Remigius (u. s.) says, "Sequitur deinde offerenda, quae inde hoc nomen accipit, quod tunc populus sua munera offert. Sequuntur versus, a vertendo dicti, quod in offerenda revertantur, dum repetitur offerenda." The offertory is not mentioned in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 695); nor in the Vatican Gregorian printed by Rocca (Opp. Greg. v. 63; Antv. 1615); but it appears in the copies edited by Muratori (u. s. ii. 1), Ménard (Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 1, 74, 244), and Pamelius (Rituale SS. PP. ii. 178).

The Antiphonarium ascribed to Gregory, but later, provides offertoria for every considerable day of the Christian year. Walafrid (u. s.) tells us that down to his time no offertory was sung on Easter eve, nor do we find any provided in the antiphonary of Gregory (Pamel. u. s. ii. 111).

The Milanese Offerenda, now called offertorium (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. xii. ord. 3), was constructed like the Roman (Pamel. u. s. i. 298). It is now sung while the priest is censuring the altar and oblations, after having said the secret prayers of oblation (Mart. u. s.; Le Brun, Dissert. iii. art. ii.).

Germanus of Paris, 555, speaks of the Gallican offertory under the name of sonum. It began when the FERMENTUM was brought in: "Nunc autem procedentem ad altarium corpus Christi non jam tubis inreprehensibilibus, sed spiritualibus vocibus praeclara Christi magnalia dulci modilia psallet Ecclesia" (sic; Expos. Brev. c. De Sono). In France this took place, not as at Rome before the service began (Ord. Rom. i. 8, ii. 4), but just before the offerings were made; when, "lectâ passione (it was the feast of St. Polycarp) cum caeteris lectionibus, . . . tempus ad sacrificium offerendum advenit, acceptâque turre diaconus in quâ mysterium dominici corporis habebatur, ferre coepit ad ostium" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. 86). We do not know any extant example of the Gallican sonum.

The Goths of Spain called their offertory sacrificium; but probably not till after the 6th century, as Isidore uses the word offertorium both in his book De Officiis (i. 16) and his Epistle to Leudefred (§ 13). In the latter, however, he uses the phrase "sacrificii responsoria" (§ 5), which, probably meaning the responses at the offering, would be a step towards the later usage. "Sacrificium" is always used in the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, pp. 3, 8, 11, 17, &c.). Once we have, "Dicat chorus sacrificium quod dicitur offertorium" (8); but we cannot tell the age of the rubric.

(2) Offertorium was also the name of a large dish, often of precious materials, in which the loaves [OBLATES] were received from the offerers at the celebration of the Eucharist. In the Life of Benedict of Anagni, A.D. 801, we are told that he procured "very large silver chalices, silver offertoria, and whatever he saw to be needful for the work of God" (Ardo, 5, § 25; comp. § 33 in Bolland. Feb. 12). [OFFERTORY DISH.]

(3) Sheets of fine linen or richer material employed to receive or cover the offerings of bread, were also called offertoria. According to the Ordo Romanus (about A.D. 730), the loaves, as they were received by the celebrant, were put into a fine linen cloth (syndonem), which was carried after him for the purpose (Ord. i. 12; ii. 9; in Mus. Ital. ii. 11, 47).

(4) A cloth in which the chalice was held by the minister, when he lifted or set it on the altar. When the chalice had two handles, it was passed through them. Ordo Romanus, i.: "Levat calicem archidiaconus de manu subdiaconi regionarii, et ponit eum super altare juxta oblatam pontificis, a dextris involutis ansis eum offertorio" (§ 15); again, "Levat eum offertorio calicem peransas" (§ 16; similarly Ord. ii. §§ 9, 10). Such a cloth under the same name was also used with the vessel in which the water was offered: "Aqua etiam . . . ab imo diaconorum . . . cum offertorio serico offertur" (Instit. Monast. Cisterc. ; Cassandri Liturgica, 22). St. William the Duke, about 812, gave to the church of Gellon, among other gifts, "chalices of gold and silver, with their offertories" (Vita, § 21; Acta S. Ord. Ben. IV. i. 82).

(5) From the following passage it would appear that in France, in the province of Rheims at least, offertorium also signified, either the amula in which the wine was presented, or the offering of wine itself, as oblatio and oblata signified the offering of bread: "Let him offer for an oblation . . . one oblate only, and an offertorium. But if he shall wish to offer more wine in a bottle or can, or more oblates, let him," &c. (Hincmari Cap. ad Presbyt. 16). Probably for such large offerings of wine it was that Adrian of Rome, 772, gave to the church of St. Adrian in that city "amulam offertorium unam, pensantem libras sexaginta et septem" (Anastas. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 97). The use of this phrase favours the supposition that the offertorium of Hincmar was an amula. Similarly, in the Charta Cornutiana, an ancient forgery purporting to belong to the year 471, but evidently much later, a "hamula oblatoria" is among the gifts ascribed to the benefactor of a church (Anastas. B. ed. Rom. 1728, iii. Proleg. 31).

OFFERTORY PLATES. We are not without examples of large dishes of precious metal, which, often originally presented as votive offerings, have been used in the services of the church as offertory plates. A silver-gilt dish of Byzantine workmanship is mentioned by De Rossi as in the possession of Count Gregory Stroganoff, which was found in 1867 in the island of Berezovoy in Siberia. It is six inches in diameter and weighs $1\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. It bears no inscription, but there are some rude letters on the dish which give no intelligible sense. The dish bears a relief in repoussé work, consisting of a cross planted on a small globe studded with stars, beneath which issue the four rivers of Paradise, and on either side stand two nimbed angels, holding a rod in their left hand, and elevating their right hand towards the cross in token of adoration. De Rossi regards it as the work of Byzantine goldsmiths of the 6th century (Bulletin. di Archeol. Cristian. 1871, p. 153, tav. ix. 1) [PATEN]. A votive silver dish, also of Byzantine workmanship, of the 5th or 6th century, probably the offering of a victorious general, discovered, together with some spoons, at Isola Rizza, near the river Adige, in the Veronese territory, is also described by De Rossi (Bulletin. di Arch. Crist. 1873, pp. 118 ff. 151 ff.; tav. x. i.). The basin or dish is 1 ft. 4 in. in diameter, and weighs $4\frac{1}{4}$ lbs. The dish bears a military scene in repoussé work. A mounted warrior, helmeted and mailed, pierces a fallen enemy, vainly endeavouring to cover himself with his shield and defend himself with his dagger. Another lies dead at his feet on his shield. The spoons bore a cross dividing the words "utere felix."

A third dish, also of silver and of Byzantine manufacture, very similar in design to that last described, was found in a tomb at Perugia, early in the last century, together with earrings, fibulas, rings, and other personal ornaments (Bianchini, de Aur. et Argent. Cimel. in agro Perusino effoss. Romae, 1717), which have since disappeared and have probably been melted down. It was the subject of an elaborate treatise by Fontanini (Discus Argentaeus Volucris Veterum Christianorum, Romae, 1727). The dish represents a mounted soldier bareheaded in a cuirass, transfixing a barbarian with cloke, shield, and dagger. Round it runs the inscription: "De Donis Dei et Domini Petri. Utere felix cum gaudio." From this it has been reasonably gathered that this basin once formed part of the altar furniture of the Vatican, and vain attempts have been made to identify the persons represented. De Rossi, misunderstanding the force of the genitive, interprets the inscription as indicating a gift of the Roman Pontiff in the name of St. Peter and the Church to a victorious general, and expresses his belief that this, as well as the Veronese basin, may have been presented to a captain of the Byzantine army of Belisarius or of Narses. But there is no doubt that Dona Dei in ecclesiastical Latin signifies gifts made to God, i.e. votive offerings. Fontanini gives (p. 32) an inscription over a side door of the church of St. Peter's at Bagnacavallo, c. 857: De Donis Dei et Sancti Petri Apostoli, Johannes umilis Presbyter fecit. The inscription on the golden cover of the Evangelium given by Queen Theodelinda to the church of Monza contains the same formula, and there is no doubt that the meaning is the same here. Mabillon (Iter Ital. p. 77) mentions a similar dish of bronze in the Museo Landi, which he designates, on very insufficient grounds, the shield of Belisarius, exhibiting Vitiges as a suppliant. All these dishes are of Byzantine workmanship, and belong to the same period, the 5th or 6th century. The British Museum contains an example of an offertory dish of Northern manufacture once belonging to the abbey of Chertsey, and dug up in its ruins at the beginning of this century, bearing an inscription in characters variously regarded as Runic, Russian, or "a fanciful manipulation of German black letter" (Eric Magnusson). This vessel is a flat circular dish of nearly pure copper with a very wide rim, on which the inscription, of which we give a cut, is engraved.

Inscription on Offertory Dish.

Its diameter is about 9½ inches, and its greatest depth 1½ inches. Mr. John Mitchell Kemble (Archaeolog. 1843, vol. xxx. pp. 40-46) regarded it as a copy made in the 10th or 11th century of a Scandinavian alms-dish used in the monastery almost from the time of its foundation in the 7th century. He renders the inscription in Saxon words: GÆ-TEOH VRÆCKO, i.e. "Offer, sinner." Mr. G. Stephens (Runic Monuments, vol. i. p. 482), on the other hand, considers it to be an original work of the 9th century, which must have found its way by gift or otherwise from the North of England, to which the words of the inscription belong. On the authority of Russian scholars he denies the Slavonic character of the inscription (on which see Archaeolog. vol. xlv. pp. 73, 74), which is engraved "in mixt Runic and Decorated uncials." Mr. Stephens remarks that "more than once Old English charters mention an 'offring disc' presented to some church or monastery," and adds that during his residence in Scandinavia he had come across many modern examples copied from ancient works, with pious inscriptions cut or painted on them. [E. V.]

OFFICE, THE DIVINE (OFFICIUM DIVINUM). This stated service of daily prayer has been called by various names: such as Opus Dei in the rule of St. Benedict, as though it were the special work to be performed by the clergy for and to God; or Cursus, from the course of the sun which determines the hours of prayer (St.

Columbanus, Reg. cap. 47), so called also by Gregory of Tours, "exurgente Abbate cum Monachis ad celebrandum Cursum;" and by St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, who bids his clergy "speciales horas et Cursum ecclesiae custodiant."

We also meet with the following terms used in the same sense:—Collecta in the rule of St. Pachomius; also the Greek words canon or synaxis. Also agenda in the acts of various councils, as being one of the more important duties to be performed. The term missa, also, is sometimes applied to the office for the hours of prayer. "In conclusione matutinarum vel vespertinarum missarum" (Conc. Agath.).

The name breviary, by which the Divine office, or rather the book containing it, was subsequently known, and which in common use took the place of all others, probably originated in the form of office, thus designated, being an abbreviation of a previously existing form [BREVARY, p. 247].

The object of this article is to give an outline of the offices for the several hours of prayer, which together constitute the Divine office, as distinguished from the liturgy—of the breviary, in a word, as distinguished from the missal.

There is much obscurity as to the sources and original form of these offices. Hence many conjectures, some resting upon very slight hints. To pursue this most interesting inquiry with any fullness would far exceed the limits of an article, and we must content ourselves with the bare statement of results arrived at. It is sufficient for our purpose that the germ of the offices as they now exist may be traced to primitive, if not to Apostolic times.

But though in course of time the Eastern and Western forms of worship came to differ so much from each other, that in the opinion of a learned modern writer, the Oriental rites (i.e. of the daily office) are, as to their origin, "perfectly distinct from those of the Latin churches" (Palmer, Orig. Lit. vol. i. p. 218), it seems more probable that both the Greek and Latin offices were derived from the same source, and that the wide subsequent divergence is due to the different manner in which they were developed or added to, and largely to the different bent of the Greek and the Latin minds, and the different genius of the Greek and the Latin languages.^a It is also probable that the germ of both Eastern and Western forms alike is to be found in the earliest Eastern forms.

This form appears to have consisted in the recitation of psalms, together with prayers and hymns, but with no lessons; and to have been designed for use during the night and in the early morning. SS. Basil and Chrysostom and others often speak of these services. The origin of these prayers has been traced with much probability to the "Eighteen prayers" used in the Jewish synagogue. [Archdeacon Freeman develops this theory with much ingenuity in his learned work The Principles of Divine Service, cap. i. sec. iii.] It may be permitted to say a few words on the origin and growth of the Western rites, and especially of the Roman. This has undoubtedly the chief interest for Western Christians, as being the mould in which the devotions of the Western church have been cast for so many centuries. Though there were countless variations of national and local use in the early and mediæval church, yet these variations were, after all, in matters of detail which did not touch the outline or substance of the office; and all the uses, with the two important exceptions of the Ambrosian and the Mozarabic, were closely modelled on the Roman pattern.

The earliest form of the Roman office appears to have consisted solely of the psalter, so distributed as to be recited once a week. At the end of the appointed number of psalms for the daily office Pater noster was said. This seems to have constituted the entire office, which contained no lessons, hymns, or collects. Traces of this custom may still be found in the title of the first part of the breviary, which is still called psalterium, though it now contains a great deal more than the psalter (indeed all the "ordinary" parts of the office, except the lessons and what is appointed with them, which are relegated to the proprium de tempore), and which is headed Psalterium dispositum per hebdomadam; and also in the fact that Pater noster is still recited at the end of the psalms of each nocturn.

Thus the author of the book de Virginitate, among the works of Athanasius, couples Pater noster with the psalms as forming a complete office; and Gregory of Tours (Vit. Patr. c. 5), when wishing to say that he had not yet recited his office, says he has not gone through his psalms: "Quod necdum Domino psalmodum decantationem debitam exsolvisset."

Lessons were in early times only read at the mass. So we find that of the early office books sent by Gregory the Great and others into Gaul, the missals alone contained any lessons. It will be seen, too, in the course of this article, that the nocturnal office [μεσονύκτιον or μεσονυκτικόν] of the Eastern church and the Mozarabic matins contain no lessons at the present time.

The first to introduce lessons into the nocturnal office appear to have been the monks, with the double object of thus obtaining variety in the office and occupation for themselves during the nocturnal watches. Thus St. Benedict in his order prescribed no lessons in the nocturnal office during the summer, when the nights are shorter; and when a question arose in the time of Charlemagne, why he had made this provision, Theodemarus, abbat of Monte Cassino, in a letter to the emperor, gives as the reason that before the time of St. Gregory the pope, it was not the custom at Rome to recite any lessons, and that that pontiff was the first to adopt them: "In Ecclesia Romana Sacras Scripturas legi mos non fuerit ante B. Greg. Pap." &c. [LECTION.]

Cassian, also, when describing the nocturnal office of the monks of Palestine, says only that after twelve^b psalms they recited a prayer, and, on Sunday only, two lessons.

To this earliest form of office, psalms and Pater noster, the Apostles' Creed was added; and it is supposed that pope Damasus [A.D. 366-384] sanctioned an order of distribution of psalms, acting with the co-operation of St. Jerome, who is also reputed to have framed an order of lessons, known as Comes Hieronymi, or simply Liber Comes or Liber Comitibus. [LECTIONARY.]

Whenever the lessons were finally made part of the office, it is clear that the course in which Scripture should be read was fixed definitely and by authority. For in all the variety of breviaries of the Roman type, however much the individual lessons may vary—and there are great variations—certain books are read in all at certain seasons; so that Isaiah is universally read in Advent, St. Paul's Epistles in the Epiphany season, Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch from Septuagesima onwards, Jeremiah in Passiontide, the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles in Eastertide, and the historical, moral, and prophetic books from Trinity Sunday onwards. The Gospels were read at the Mass, and so do not appear in the course of daily reading. Indeed, so firmly has this sequence of books rooted itself into the mind of the church, that the modern French breviaries, which utterly revolutionised the order of saying the psalter, respected the course of Scripture reading, while often altering and lengthening the individual lessons.^c

Gregory the Great added antiphons and responsories; and this, with the exception of minor enrichments, the date and origin of which it is often difficult to ascertain, brought the office to the degree of maturity which is sufficient for our present purpose, and, to the form in which it substantially exists and is used at the present day. Later modifications and revisions are beyond our scope.

We now proceed to give a skeleton of the offices themselves, beginning with those of the orthodox Eastern church. Details would be here unsuitable, and, unless entered into more fully than the space at command permits, would confuse what they were meant to elucidate.

The daily offices of the Greek church are contained in the HOROLOGIUM [p. 784]. They are arranged, beginning with the nocturnal office.

The following is the order of the offices:—

After a short introductory form of prayer to be said on rising from bed [ἐξαναστὰς τῆς κλίνης] follows:—

The Office of the daily Midnight Service.

[ἀκολουθία τοῦ καθ' ἡμέραν μεσονυκτικοῦ.]

Introduction.

If there be a Priest, he says:—

"Blessed be our God, now and for ever and ever. Amen."

[εὐλογητὸς ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, νῦν καὶ αἰεὶ, καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμήν.]^d

If there be no Priest, say:—

"By the prayers of our holy Fathers, O Lord Jesu Christ our God, have mercy upon us. Amen."

[δὲ εὐχὼν τῶν ἁγίων Πατέρων ἡμῶν, Κύριε Ἰησοῦ Χριστέ ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. Ἀμήν.]

^c The reformed Church of England also respects this order in its Sunday lessons, which begin in Advent with Isaiah, at Septuagesima with Genesis, and which during the summer and autumn are taken from the historical and prophetic books.

^d This formula is known in the books as ὁ εὐλογητός, and the priest is said ποιεῖν εὐλογητόν.

^b It will be remembered that twelve is the number of psalms appointed for the nocturnal of ordinary days both in the Gregorian and Benedictine psalters.

"Glory be to Thee, O our God, glory be to Thee."

[δόξα σοι, ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, δόξα σοι.]

A short prayer to God the Holy Ghost for protection and purification, beginning:

Βασιλεῦ οὐράνιε, Παράκλητε, τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, κ.τ.λ.

and known as Βασιλεῦ οὐράνιε.

"O Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Eternal, have mercy upon us."

["Ἄγιος ὁ Θεός, Ἄγιος Ἰσχυρὸς, Ἄγιος Ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς, known as the τρισάγιον.]

Three bowings of the head [μετανοίας^c τρεῖς] Gloria Patri [in its Eastern form, i.e. Δόξα Πατρὶ, καὶ Υἱῷ καὶ ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι, καὶ νῦν, καὶ ἀεὶ, καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμήν. Often printed in the office books δόξα καὶ νῦν]. A short prayer to the Holy Trinity for pardon, and known from its opening words as Παναγία τριάς. The Lord's Prayer, with the Doxology. Kyrie eleison twelve times. Glory. Both now.

The invitatory in three clauses as follows:—

"O come let us worship and fall down before God our King.

O come let us worship and fall down before Christ our King and God.

O come let us worship and fall down before Christ Himself our King and God."

[Δεῦτε προσκυνήσωμεν καὶ προσπέσωμεν τῷ Βασιλεῖ ἡμῶν Θεῷ.

Δεῦτε προσ. Χριστῷ τῷ Βασ. ἡμ. Θεῷ.

Δεῦτε προσ. αὐτῷ Χριστῷ, κ.τ.λ.]

Three bowings of the head.

After this introduction the office proceeds as follows:—

Ps. 50^f [51]; Ps. 118 [119] (called the ἄμωμος), said in three divisions [στάσεις], each ending with Glory; And now; three Alleluias, and three bowings of the head: Then the [Nicene] (i.e. what is commonly called so, and so throughout the article) Credo, the trisagion, the Most Holy Trinity, the Lord's Prayer, and two troparia or hymns in rhythmical prose, suitable to midnight. Then a theotokion (or short hymn addressed to the Blessed Virgin, commemorative of the Incarnation); Kyrie eleison forty times; a prayer to Christ for grace and protection, and a few short ejaculatory prayers, the details of which vary with the day. From Sept. 22 to Palm Sunday a long prayer of St. Basil is said in this place.

At this point the second watch, or nocturn, may be considered to begin, and the office proceeds thus:—

Invitatory (as before). Ps. 120 [121], Levavi; 133 [134], Ecce nunc; Glory. Both now. Alleluia. Trisagion, three bowings of the head; Most Holy Trinity; troparia; a theotokion; Kyrie eleison twelve times; a prayer in commemoration of the departed; a short ejaculatory prayer to the Trinity, and one to the Theotokos.

Dismissal benediction.

^c μετανοίας are divided into μετ. μικραί, i.e. inclinations of the head alone, what the Roman ceremonial calls "modica inclinatio," and μετ. μεγάλα, which are made by bending the knee and prostration to the ground. When the word occurs, as in the text, without an epithet, μετ. μικραί are signified.

^f Throughout this article the psalms are numbered according to the Greek and Latin versions, as they stand numbered in the office books. The number according to the English version, when it differs, is placed afterwards in brackets.

The priest asks forgiveness from the people.^g

A short ectene or litaney, the response to each clause of which is Kyrie eleison.

The foregoing is the form of the midnight office [μεσονυκτικόν] for week days, Saturday excepted. On Saturday the office is the same up to the end of Ps. 50 [51]. Then follows:—

Pss. 64 [65], 65 [66], 66 [67], said in one stasis, followed by Glory; Both now; and three Alleluias.

Pss. 67 [68], said similarly as a second stasis, and Pss. 68 [69], 69 [70], said as a third.

Troparia and a longer prayer of the same nature as, though different from, those in the office for other days in the week.

The second portion of the office for Saturday, from the second occurrence of the Invitatory onwards, is the same as for other week days.

On Sundays the office is the same as on other days as far as the end of Ps. 50 [51]. Then follows the triadic canon (i.e. a canon having reference to the Trinity), and some troparia of similar import called triadica [τριάδικά]. Then the trisagion and other short formularies, including Kyrie eleison forty times; the dismissal: the whole concluding with the same ectene or litaney as before.

Lauds [τὸ ὄρθρον]:—

Blessed be, &c. Invitatory (as at the nocturnal office).^h

Pss. 19 [20], 20 [21];ⁱ Glory; Both now; trisagion; Most Holy Trinity; the Lord's Prayer: certain troparia, and a few responsory petitions for priest and people.

Then the six psalms following, known as the Hexapsalmus, prefaced by—

"Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace; good will towards men" [said thrice].

"Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord, and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise" [said twice]:—

Pss. 3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143], each with its antiphon.

Twelve Morning prayers [ἑσθινὰ εὐχαί] are said by the priest while the last three of these psalms are being recited. A few stichoi (nearly corresponding to our versicles), the troparia of the day, and the appointed portion or portions of psalms for the day (each portion being called a Cathisma [κάθισμα]).

Ps. 50 [51]. The canon, with the nine odes,^j or only certain verses [στίχοι] from them, according to the day and the length of the troparia (or stanzas) of the canon. Then follow other troparia, or short hymns, under various names, but all of the same character.

The lauds [οἱ αἶνοι], i.e. Pss. 148, 149, 150.

The great doxology [i.e. Gloria in excelsis].

^g This rite corresponds to the alternato Confiteor of the priest and people in the Roman offices. The priest is said in technical phrase λαβεῖν συγχώρησιν.

^h This introduction is slightly varied during Lent.

ⁱ The distribution of Psalms will be given under PSALMODY; but for clearness, the fixed Psalms used in the daily offices are specified in this article.

^j I.e. the Ode for the day. They are as follows: Ode 1, Song of Moses, Exod. xv.; Ode 2, Song of Moses, Deuter. xxxii.; Ode 3, Song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii.; Ode 4, Song of Habakkuk, Hab. iii.; Ode 5, Song of Isaiah, Is. xvi. 9; Ode 6, Song of Jonah, Jon. iii.; Ode 7, Song of the Three Children, Dan. iii. 1st part; Ode 8, Benedicite, Dan. iii.; Ode 9, Magnificat and Benedictus.

Versicles [στίχοι, chiefly from the Psalms, and corresponding to the Western preces].

Itany, &c.; dismissal.

This office, of which the foregoing is an outline, varies in detail on Sundays and certain other days. These variations are, for the sake of simplicity, omitted.

The hours [αἱ ὥραι]. First hour^k :—

Invitatory (as before). Pss. 5, 89 [90], 100 [101], without antiphons.

A few stichoi, a theotokion, trisagion (Most Holy Trinity), the Lord's Prayer; a theotokion varying with the day of the week. A short prayer to Christ the true light, that He would shew the light of His countenance. The dismissal. [There are slight variations on Sundays and in Lent.]

The mesorion of the first hour :—

The invitatory. Pss. 45 [46], 91 [92], 92 [93]. Trisagion, Most Holy Trinity, the Lord's Prayer, two troparia, a theotokion, Kyrieleison forty times; Glory; Both now; a short hymn to the Theotokos; three great reverences, i.e. prostrations [μεταβολας μεγάλας γ']; and two prayers of St. Basil for protection and blessing during the day. Glory. Both now. Dismissal.

The third, sixth, and ninth hours, each with its mesorion, are of precisely the same form as the first, consisting, after the introduction, each of three psalms, troparia, &c., and ending with a prayer, so that it seems unnecessary to set them out. These parts are different for each hour. The psalms are :—

At the third hour, Pss. 16 [17], 24 [25], 50 [51]. At the mesorion of the third hour, Pss. 29 [30], 31 [32], 60 [61]. At the sixth hour, Pss. 53 [54], 54 [55], 90 [91]. At the mesorion of the sixth hour, Pss. 55 [56], 56 [57], 69 [70]. At the ninth hour, Pss. 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86]. At the mesorion of the ninth hour, Pss. 112 [113], 137 [138], 139 [140].

In addition to these hours, there is an office called the typics [τὰ τυπικά], which is said after the sixth or the ninth hour, according to the season of the year. Its origin is obscure. The office is as follows :—

Pss. 102 [103]. Glory, 145 [146]. Both now. [In Lent^l the psalms of the ninth hour are said instead of these.]

A short prayer to Christ for salvation.

The blessings [οἱ μακαρισμοί]. These are the blessings from the sermon on the mount [St. Matt. v. 3–12 (to great is your reward in heaven)], and are said with the clause, “Remember us, O Lord, when Thou comest in Thy kingdom,” said as an antiphon at the beginning, and repeated after each blessing.

The tersanctus^m thrice repeated, with a verse and Glory interposed between the first two repetitions; and Both now after the third.

The Nicene Creed, followed by a short prayer for pardon. The Lord's Prayer.

Then, if it be a Sunday or a saint's day, which is festivated, the *contakion*ⁿ of the day. If not, then first the contakion of the transfiguration, ^k This hour is said continuously with lauds, and so begins at once with the invitatory. If said separately, it would be prefaced by the usual introduction.

^l ἡ μεγάλη τεσσαρακονστή, the usual term for the fast before Easter, i.e. the Western Lent.

^m By this is meant the “Holy, Holy, Holy” from the liturgy, as distinguished from the trisagion.

ⁿ I.e. a short hymn.

and afterwards that for the day of the week. These have reference on Monday to the heavenly host [τὰ ἀσώματα]; on Tuesday, to the forerunner [i.e. the Baptist, ὁ πρόδρομος]; on Wednesday and Friday, to the cross; on Thursday, to the holy apostles; on Saturday, to the departed [τὸ νεκρώσιμον]. Then one or two more short troparia of the usual type; the trisagion, &c.; a short prayer to the Holy Trinity: and the office ends with Ps. 33 [34]. The office before meat [ἀκολουθία τῆς τροπῆς] is used in monasteries, printed in this place in the Horologium; but it does not come within the scope of this article.

Vespers [τὸ ἑσπερινόν] :—

The priest begins, “Blessed be our God,” &c. [ποιεῖ εὐλογητόν.] The invitatory; Ps. 103 [104], called the procmiac psalm [τὸν προισμιακὸν ψαλμόν].

The appointed section or cathism [κάθισμα] of the psalter. Pss. 140 [141], 141 [142], said as one psalm and called the Κύριε ἐκέκραξα from the opening words.

Stichs [στίχοι], i.e. versicles from the Psalms, and Ps. 116 [117]. The hymn “Joyful light” [φῶς ἱλαρόν].^o The prokeimenon [προκειμένον] for the day. These vary with the day of the week, but are all of the same form. That for Sunday is :—

“Behold now praise the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord.”

Stichos. “Ye that stand in the house of the Lord in the courts of the house of our God.”

A prayer for protection, &c., during the night.

More versicles from the Psalms, called here aposticha [ἀπόστιχα]. Those for ordinary days are Ps. 122 [123], said in two stichs.

Nunc dimittis, trisagion, &c., and dismissal.

[In Lent and at certain other seasons there are variations in the concluding part of the office, which it is unnecessary to specify.]

The foregoing is the order of daily vespers as given in the Horology (9th ed. Venice). When there is a vigil, an abbreviated form, omitting the section from the psalms, &c. is said; and after compline, great vespers are said. These are an amplification of the ordinary form, and include sections from Scripture, and the rite known as a lite [λίτή], and on great days finishes with the benediction of the loaves. [See those articles.] To specify the variations would go beyond our limits.

Compline [ἀποδείπνον] :—

There are two forms of compline: ἀπ. μέγα and ἀπ. μικρόν. Great compline is said in Lent; little compline at other seasons.

The order of great compline :—

This is an office of great length and interest, and may be considered as divided into three parts, each beginning with the invitatory. “Blessed be our God,” &c., with the usual introduction and invitatory. In the first week in Lent the (so called) great canon is said. At other times the office begins thus :—

Pss. 4, 6, 12 [13]. Three inclinations and Kyrie eleison thrice. Pss. 24 [25], 30 [31], 90

^o This hymn is well known in its English translation. It is called in the Greek ἡ ἐπὶ αὐτῶν εὐχαριστία, or ὕμνος τραϊκόβος. It is attributed by St. Basil (de Spir. Sanct. c. 29) to Athenogenes the Martyr, circ. A.D. 175. It appears to have been reduced to its present form by Sophronius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, circ. A.D. 629.

[91]. Kyrie eleison thrice. The following stichi said alternately by the choir:—

“God is with us, know ye nations, and be confounded,
For God is with us.
Give ear to the ends of the earth,
For God is with us.”

[And so on for twenty clauses, with the same response after each, taken from Isaiah viii. and ix. and ending thus]:—

“Wonderful, Counsellor,

For God is with us.

The mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace,

For God is with us.

The Father of the age to come,

For God is with us. Gloria,” &c. P

Then certain troparia, the Nicene Creed, invocations to the Theotokos and the saints.

Several other troparia, and a prayer of St. Basil for protection and purity.

The invitatory (thrice).

Pss. 50 [51], 101 [102]; the prayer of Manasseh; troparia, &c.; and a short prayer to the Holy Trinity.

The invitatory (thrice).

Pss. 69 [70], 142 [143].

Gloria in excelsis [called the Doxology] followed by versicles of precisely the same form as the Latin preces.

Ps. 150, with the clause, “O Lord of Hosts, have mercy upon us,” said as an antiphon after each verse. More troparia, &c., among which occurs a prayer to the Saviour for protection during the night, beginning ὁ ἐν παντὶ καυρῷ, καὶ πάσῃ ὥρῃ, κ.τ.λ.

A prayer to the Theotokos.

Two prayers to the Saviour, one beginning καὶ δὸς ἡμῖν δέσποτα πρὸς ὕπνον ἀπιούσιν, κ.τ.λ.; the other, δέσποτα πολυέλεε, κ.τ.λ.: an ectene or litany of the usual form, and the office finishes with another prayer to the Saviour.

Little compline [ἀποδειπνον μικρόν]:—

“Glory be to Thee, O our God, glory be to Thee.”

A short prayer to the Paraclete.

The usual introduction and the invitatory.

Pss. 50 [51], 69 [70], 142 [143].

Gloria in excelsis, with the versicles following as at great compline.

The Nicene Creed, the trisagion, &c., the troparia of the day, Kyr. el. (forty times).

The prayer to the Saviour, ὁ ἐν παντὶ καυρῷ, as at great compline; a few short versicles.

Prayer to the Theotokos.

Prayer to the Saviour, καὶ δὸς ἡμῖν δέσποτα, both as at great compline; a few ejaculatory ascriptions of praise.

The dismissal.

The Western offices will not detain us long. Even those parts which are not intimately known to all are of a familiar type. They are also shorter than the Eastern, and arranged with much greater terseness and method. The Roman office is by far the most important and most widely used. The older English, French, German, and Scandinavian uses are of precisely the same form, and only differ in details, such as the calendars, commemorations of saints, order of lessons, responsories, &c.—variations which it would be at once hopeless and useless to attempt to point out, and the magnitude and importance of which have been much exaggerated. There are indeed few more striking evidences of the uniformity and organization of the Roman Church than the wide dissemination and reception of its offices into distant regions and different races, and the unanimity with which what was in essentials the same rite was observed. The only two notable exceptions are the Ambrosian and the Mozarabic offices, both of which are very different from the Roman, and of great beauty; but which were used within narrow limits, and so are of much smaller practical importance. They will be described.

The Roman hours are seven or eight in number, according as matins and lauds are counted as one or two, i.e., Matins, lauds, prime (or the hour), the third, sixth, and ninth hours, vespers, compline. Taking them in order we have:

1. Matins (matutinum):—

These consist on Sundays and double feasts of three nocturns. On simple feasts and week days of one. Easter day and Pentecost with their octaves have only one nocturn with three psalms. The office for Sunday and feasts of nine lessons is as follows:

N.B. Before matins and all hours except compline is said secretly, Pater noster, Ave Maria; and at the beginning of matins and prime, and at the end of compline, the Apostles' Creed.

Then with a loud voice—

“Domine labia mea aperies,
Et os meum annuntiabitur laudem tuam.
Deus in adiutorium, &c.
Domine ad adjuvandum, &c.
Gloria; sicut; alleluia;”

except when alleluia is not said, i.e. from Septuagesima to Easter, when “Laus tibi Domine rex aeternae gloriae” is said instead.

Invitatory, and the invitatory psalm, 94 [95].

Hymn (varying with the day and season).

In nocturn i. Psalms as appointed [12 on Sundays, 3 on feasts]. A verse and response. Pater noster, short form of absolution (absolutio), three lessons from Scripture in course, each preceded by its benediction, and followed by its responsory.

In nocturn ii. Three psalms, each with its antiphon. Verse and response. Pater noster, absolution. Three lessons from the patristic writings, each with its benediction and responsory.

In nocturn iii. The same as in nocturn ii., the lessons being a commentary on the gospel of the day from some homily. Instead of the last responsory, Te Deum is said, except in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter, when it is only said on festivals. When Te Deum is not said, there is a responsory instead.

[On week days, and when the office is of three lessons, there is one nocturn only, containing twelve psalms under six antiphons.]

2. Lauds:—

Deus in adiutorium, &c. Gloria, &c. Alleluia or Laus tibi Domine, &c., according to the season, as at matins.

Five psalms [i.e. what is reckoned as such, said under five antiphons and five Glorias]. On

P It is impossible within reasonable limits to give more than the skeleton of this long and intricate office, even could more be attempted without sacrifice of clearness. The troparia, &c., are all of the ordinary form.

Sunday [except from Septuagesima to Easter] these are—

Pss. 92 [93], 99 [100], 62 [63], and 66 [67] (said as one), Benedicite, 148, 149, 150 (said as one).

On week days the psalms are ^a (1) 50 [51], (2) varies with the day of the week, (3) 62 [63] and 66 [67], (4) a canticle varying with the day of the week, (5) 148, 149, 150.

Capitulum, i.e. a verse from the Scriptures.^r Hymn (varying with the day). A verse and response. Benedictus. Collect for the day. Commemorations (if any are said).

3. Prime:—

Pater noster. Ave Maria. Credo. Deus in adjutorium, &c. Hymn, "Jam lucis orto sidere."

Four psalms (on Sunday), 53 [54], 117 [118], 118 [119] (first four sections of eight verses said as two). On week days, 54 [54], a varying psalm, 118 [119] (the same as on Sunday). The Athanasian Creed (when the service is on the Sunday,^s and on Trinity Sunday). Capitulum.

Resp. "Christe fili Dei vivi. Miserere nobis (bis). V. Qui sedes ad dexteram Patris. R. Miserere nobis. V. Gloria, &c. R. Christe fili, &c. V. Exsurge Christe, adjuva nos. R. Et libera nos propter nomen tuum."

Then follow these preces, which are not said when the office is double, or within octaves. Kyrie eleison (ter), Pater noster, Credo.

Preces of the ordinary form of verse and response. Alternate confiteor and miserereatur by priest and choir. A few more alternate versicles. Then, whether the office be double or not, the Oratio, "Domine Deus Omnipotens,"^t &c.

V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias.

On week days the Athanasian Creed is not said: in other respects the office is said as above. In Advent, Lent, and on certain other days, additional preces are said before the confiteor, from which point the office proceeds as usual.

4. Terce:—

Pater, Ave, Deus in adjutorium. Hymn, "Nunc sancte nobis Spiritus."

Six sections of eight verses of Ps. 118 [119], said in three, under one antiphon. Capitulum. Responsio brevis. Collect for the day.

5, 6. Sext and none are of precisely the same form, and require no separate remark. At sext the hymn is "Rector potens, verax Deus," and at none "Rerum tenax Deus vigor."

When preces are said at lauds, a short form of preces is said at terce, sext, and none immediately before the collect for the day.

7. Vespers:—

Pater, Ave, Deus in adjutorium. Five psalms as appointed, each with its antiphon. Capitulum. Hymn (varying with the day and season). Verse and response. That for ordinary Sunday and week days is

V. Dirigatur Domine oratio mea. R. Sicut incensum in conspectu tuo.

Magnificat (with its proper antiphon). Collect for the day. Commemorations, when said.

^a See PSALMODY for details.

^r That for ordinary Sundays is Rev. vii. 12, "Blessing," &c. That for ordinary week days, Rom. xiii. 12, "The night is far spent," &c.

^s I.e. when a double feast, which takes precedence of an ordinary Sunday, does not fall on the day.

^t The original of our third Collect at Morning Prayer.

When preces are said at lauds, they are also said at vespers after magnificat.

8. Compline:—

Lector. Jube Domne benedicere.

Bened. Noctem quietam, &c.

Lectio brevis. 1 Pet. v. 8.

V. Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini.

R. Qui fecit coelum et terram.

Pater, Confiteor, &c., alternately, as at prime.

V. Converte nos Deus salutaris noster.

R. Et averte iram tuam a nobis.

Deus in adjutorium, &c.

Pss. 4, 30 [31], (1-6), 90 [91], 133 [134], said under one antiphon.

Hymn, "Te lucis ante terminum." Capitulum (Jerem. xiv. 9). Responsio brevis. Nunc dimittis (with its antiphon). Kyrie eleison (ter), Pater, Credo, and short preces. The collect "Visita quaesumus," &c. Benediction.

No notice has here been made of the short capitular office at the end of prime, or of the antiphons to the B.V.M., of which one is said daily after lauds and compline.

The Roman office here given in outline is the model on which the secular breviaries throughout the Roman obedience were formed. These were universally of the same form, though differing in many details, and local commemorations and usages. The Gregorian distribution of the psalter is always adopted.^u

In the old English uses the hymns and antiphons at compline varied with the season; and every day after compline and lauds, except in double feasts and during certain octaves and in Christmas and Eastertides, a short form consisting of Ps. 122 [123], a few versicles, and a collect was said "pro pace ecclesiae." When this was said at lauds, a similar form for protection during the day was said after prime.

The monastic office, of which the Benedictine is the type, differs from the secular in many respects, the chief of which are the following:

(1) The Benedictine distribution of the psalter is used and not the Gregorian.

(2) On Sundays, and days with three nocturns. There are four lessons in each nocturn, there are six Psalms in both the first and second nocturns, and three canticles in the third, each with responsory. Those of the first nocturn are from Scripture; those of the second from the writings of the fathers, or from the lives of the saints; those of the third from patristic exposition of the gospel. Te Deum is said after (not instead of) the ninth responsory, and then follow the gospel and collect of the day.

(3) On week days, and days of three lessons, twelve psalms are said in two nocturns; six in each. In the first nocturn three lessons, mostly from Scripture, are read. In the second nocturn there are no lessons. In the weekday office of the Benedictine rites, from Easter to Nov. 1, no lessons are read, but only a Lectio brevis, varying with the day of the week.

(4) There are no preces in Lent, &c., at lauds and vespers.

(5) Ps. 30 [31], ver. 1-6, and Nunc dimittis are not said at compline, except on the three last days of the Holy week.

^u No account is taken of modern French and other breviaries, which do not come within the prescribed limits of time. These do not differ in form.

The Ambrosian office, which is still used in the diocese of Milan, except in the Swiss portion, which adheres to the Roman rite,^v requires more detailed notice. Its origin and, still more, the steps by which it arrived at its final shape, are involved in much obscurity. It is undoubtedly of high antiquity, and originally framed by St. Ambrose. St. Simplician, who succeeded him as archbishop of Milan (A.D. 397), is said to have made many additions. It is probable that during the following century the office assumed its complete form as to its main features, and was afterwards gradually perfected in details. When St. Charles Borromeo became archbishop, he set to work to restore the ancient rites of the Milanese church, into which he complains that much had been introduced without authority from time to time by individual priests; and by comparison of the office, as he found it, with ancient documents and the "Ambrosian Institutes," and with the help of learned men, to bring it back as far as possible to the original form described by the most distinguished writers on the divine offices, and especially by his predecessor Theodorus.^w

The Ambrosian office then, in its present form, which we are obliged to quote, owing to the uncertainty of earlier forms, is in outline as follows:—

Matins (Ad Matutinum):—

Pater noster. Ave Maria [secreto]. Deus in adiutorium, &c. Domine ad adiuvandum, &c. Gloria. Sicut. Hymn, "Aeterne rerum conditor" [said daily]. Responsory [varying with the day].

The Song of the Three Children ["Benedictus es," &c. vv. 29-34] with its antiphon. Benedictus es Deus. R. Amen.

[The foregoing is common to all matins.]

Then: On Sundays three canticles said in three nocturns, one in each, each with antiphon. In Noct. i. Song of Isaiah [from chap. xxvi.] De nocte vigilat.

In Noct. ii. Song of Hannah [from 1 Sam. ii.].

In Noct. iii. in Winter (i.e. from the first Sunday in October till Palm Sunday) the Song of Habakkuk [Hab. iii.].

In Noct. iii. in Summer (i.e. from Easter till the last Sunday in September) the Song of Jonah [Jon. ii.].

[On Sundays no psalms are said at nocturns.]

On week days, the appointed section of the psalms, called a decuria, said in three nocturns [v. art. PSALMODY].

Then follow three lessons.

On Sundays from the homily on the Gospel.

On week days from the Holy Scriptures read in course.

Each lesson is prefaced by a benediction; and the first two are followed by a response, and the third by Te Deum when said. When not said, there is no third response.

The benedictions are more varied than in the Roman rite. The responses, on the contrary, are for the most part not so full or rich.

Lauds:—

The following is the order for Sundays and the more important festivals of saints:—

Deus in adiutorium, &c. Benedictus, with its proper antiphon.

[On Sundays in Advent, Christmas Day and its octave, and on the Epiphany, Attende coelum [Deut. xxxii.] is said instead of Benedictus.]

Kyrie eleison (ter).

An antiphon called antiphona ad crucem, proper to the day, and said five, or on some days seven times.

The Song of Moses ["Cantemus Domino," from Exod. xv.] with its proper antiphon, and prefaced by an unvarying oratio secreta.

Benedicite with antiphon and oratio secreta.

A collect (oratio 1^{ma}) [varying with the season].

Pss. 148, 149, 150, 116 [117] said under one antiphon. A capitulum and antiphon [both varying with the office]. A direct^x psalm [varying with the day of the week]. Hymn [varying with the office]. Kyrie eleison (duodecies). Psallenda i. and completorium i. Oratio ii. responsorium in baptisterio, a Psalm of four verses [varying with the day]. Oratio iii. Psallenda ii. and completorium ii. Oratio iv. [Commemorations, if any], and the office ends thus:—

V. Benedicat, et exaudiat nos Deus. R. Amen.

V. Procedamus in pace. R. In nomine Christi.

V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias. Pater noster.

V. Sancta Trinitas nos semper salvet et benedicat. R. Amen.

V. Fidelium animae per Dei misericordiam requiescant in pace. R. Amen.^z

On week days the office varies thus:—

Instead of Cantemus Domino and Benedicite, Ps. 50 [51] is said on all days but Saturday. Ps. 117 [118] is said on Saturday.

There are no psallenda. The resp. in bapt. and the four verses of a psalm are always said, and there are three collects instead of four.

There are variations in the arrangement of the details of the office at special seasons and on festivals.

Prime:—

Pater noster, &c., as at the beginning of all the hours. Hymn, "Jam lucis orto sidere." Pss. 53 [54], 118 [119] (four first sections of eight verses). Epistolella,^a a few versicles and responses. Athanasian creed (called simply symbolum).

Then on Sundays and the higher class of festivals three collects, of which the first is the same as the corresponding Roman collect, and the office ends,—

V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias.

Then the martyrology is read in choir.

On other days, after the symbolum, preces are

^v When Cardinal Gaisruch in the present century attempted to impose the Ambrosian Liturgy on this portion of the diocese, the public voice answered, "Either Romans or Lutherans."

^w Archbishop of Milan, circ. A.D. 480. He wrote a commentary on the nocturnal and matutinal office of the Milanese church. See preface to the Ambrosian Breviary as edited by Cardinal Gaisruch, A.D. 1841.

^x So called because said straight through, and not antiphonally.

^y These, and other similar names, are all antiphons of much the same character.

^z This ending is common to all the hours.

^a This corresponds exactly with the Roman capitulum.

said. These are of the same character as the Roman preces at prime, but longer, and the petitions are different, and they end with Ps. 50 [51].

Terce, sext, and none are in form exactly similar to the Roman offices for those hours. On ordinary week days short preces are said at each hour, the form containing a psalm. These are, at prime Ps. 50 [51], at sext 56 [57], at none 85 [86].

Vespers are said thus:—Pater noster, &c. An antiphon called lucernarium [proper for the office]. Antiphona in choro [proper]. Hymn [proper]. Five psalms with their antiphons. Oratio. Magnificat [with proper antiphon]. Oratio. Psallenda i. and resp. in bapt. (if said). Oratio iii. Four-verse psalm, with antiphon (if said). Two completoria. Oratio iv. Psallenda ii. and two more completoria. Oratio v. Conclusion of office.

The first two orationes are proper to the office; the other three are fixed.

On week days, after Magnificat the office continues as follows:—

Oratio ii. Resp. in bapt. Oratio iii. Four-verse psalm with antiphon. A completorium. Oratio iv. and conclusion.

The four collects on week days vary with the day of the week.

On festivals two psalms (or rather what are counted as two) are said at different points of the office, the arrangement of the component parts of which differs in some respects from the ferial arrangement. There are also certain variations at special seasons, as in Lent and Eastertide, into which it is not necessary to enter.

Compline closely resembles the Roman, though the materials are somewhat differently arranged. The office runs thus:—

Pater, Ave. Convertte nos, &c. Deus in adiutorium, &c. Hymn ("Te lucis ante terminum"). Pss. 4, 30 [31] (1-6), 90 [91], 132 [133], 133 [134], 116 [117], said without an antiphon, and the last three under one Gloria. Epistolella. Nunc dimittis. Antiphon and response.

On ordinary week days preces of the usual form containing Psalm 12 [13]. Two collects,^b "Illumina quæsumus Domine" and "Visita quæsumus Domine." Conclusion.

When preces are not said, the collects or orationes follow immediately the response after Nunc dimittis.

In Lent an additional hymn is said after the psalms.

The Mozarabic or Spanish office differs widely from all others. It is of high antiquity. The Spanish tradition would trace its origin to St. Peter, to disciples of whom and of St. Paul it assigns the introduction of Christianity into Spain,^c and maintains that it should be called originally Roman and Gothic, after the conversion of Reccaredus, king of the Goths, to the Catholic faith, and the public abjuration of the Arian heresy in the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. Subsequently St. Isidore, archbishop of Seville, and his brother Leander, who was a friend of Gregory the Great, revised and expurgated the office, which had contracted many flaws, and it is hence often known as the Isidorian rite. At a later period Cardinal Ximenes, "quasi apis argumentosa," again revised the office and reduced it to its final form.

The opinion now generally accepted is that the Mozarabic rite is a variety of the so-called Gallican or Ephesine family, which professedly traces back to St. John. The groundwork of the office was probably introduced with Christianity into Spain. To enforce uniformity of use the Council of Gerona [A.D. 517] directed that the order of celebrating mass and the Divine office, which was used in the Metropolitan church of Tarragona, should be alone adopted throughout the province. Gregory VII. [A.D. 1073-1085] directed the use of the Spanish office to be abolished, and the Roman introduced in its place. After some resistance this was effected. Afterwards so strong a feeling was manifested at Toledo in favour of the national rite, that its use was sanctioned in seven of the old churches of Toledo, the Roman being adopted into the others. Cardinal Ximenes afterwards built and endowed the so-called Mozarabic chapel in Toledo cathedral for the maintenance of the rite.^d

The hours are the same as the Roman, with the addition of Aurora, which is said when the office is of the week day [in ferialis].^e

All the hours begin as follows:—

Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison, Kyrie eleison. Pater noster. Ave (secreto).

In nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi lumen cum pace. R. Deo gratias.

Dominus vobiscum. V. Et cum, &c.

Matins f [matutinum] proceed thus:—

On Sundays, hymn, "Aeterne rerum conditor," followed by a prayer (oratione), having reference to the contents of the hymn.

Pss. 3, 50 [51], 56 [56], each with its antiphon. Oratio.

Three antiphons,^g each followed by an oratio [tres antiphonæ cum suis orationibus]. Responsory with its oratio.

^d The legend is familiar how the two books, the Roman and Mozarabic, contended by the ordeal of battle, a Frenchman being champion for the Roman Book (the Roman office had at that time been established in France), a native of Toledo for the Mozarabic. The Frenchman is said to have conquered. The result however was not taken as conclusive, and the books were submitted to the further ordeal of fire; whereupon the Roman leaped out of the fire, while the Mozarabic remained uninjured by the flames: "Romanus ex igne procedit; Gothicus sub flammis illaes." The inference drawn was that the Roman book should be generally used throughout the kingdom, while the Mozarabic should be continued in use at head-quarters, i.e. in Toledo.

^e The Mozarabic hours are said to have been originally twelve in number, the four rejected ones being at the beginning of night, "in principio noctis;" before bedtime, "ante lectum;" at midnight, "media noctis;" and on rising from bed, "in surrectione lecti."

^f The office for the day begins, as in other rites, with vespers of the preceding evening; but in a short conspectus, such as alone is possible, it seems more convenient to begin with matins.

^g The Mozarabic antiphons are broken into verse and response, after the manner of a Roman responsory. [See art. ANTIPHON.]

^b Our third collect at Evening Prayer, said at compline in the Sarum and other English offices. The Roman collect at compline is "Visita quæsumus Domine."

^c Vide Preface to Mozarabic Breviary by Lorenzana.

On week days there is no hymn and only one psalm, which is one of the three Sunday psalms, with its oratio. The remainder of the office is of the same form as that for Sunday.

Lauds begin at once with a varying canticle [on Sunday "Attende coelum," Deut. xxxii.]. Benedictus [so called, i.e. a compressed form of the Song of the Three Children] with its antiphon.

Sono. Lauda.^b Pss. 148, 149, 150 [called the Laudes].

A lection called prophetia, though not necessarily from the Prophets. Hymn (varying). Capitula (here signifying a prayer). Pater noster, followed by the embolismus. *Lauda.*¹ *Benedictio.*²

A short form of commemoration, consisting of a verse and response, here called lauda, and a short prayer for protection and guidance through the day.

Aurora :—

This service is said when the office is of the week day (in feriis per totum annum). Pss. 69 [70], and the following sections of Ps. 118 [119]: Beati immaculati, In quo corriget, Retribue servo tuo, said under one antiphon. A lauda, Pater noster (with the embolismus), a short form of intercessory prayers (preces).

Prime :—

Pss. 66 [67], 144 [145] (said in two divisions), 112 [113], 118 [119] (Adhaesit pavimento, Legem pone, Et veniat, said under one antiphon).

Responsory (varying); a short lesson (Zach. viii.) called prophetia; second (Rom. xiii.); a lauda.

Hymn ("Jam lucis orto sidere"), except in Eastertide, when the hymn is "Aurora lucis rutilat."

V. Bonum est confiteri Domino. R. Et psallere nomini tuo altissimo.

Then follows, on Sundays and festivals, Te Deum, Gloria in excelsis, and the Nicene Creed^k [called in the rubrics symbolum apostolorum].

On week days (in diebus ferialibus), Benedictus es (as at lauds), and Ps. 50 [51].

Supplicatio [in form a short bidding prayer] beginning "Oremus mundi," &c. Capitula [a prayer]. Pater noster, &c. Benedictio. These all vary with the office.

Terce :—

Four psalms, i.e. Pss. 94 [95], 118 [119] (Memor esto, Portio mea, Bonitatem), under one antiphon. Responsory. Two short lections (similar to those at prime). Lauda, hymn, supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &c. Benedictio. All the parts of the office except the psalms vary with the season.

Sext and None are of exactly the same form and require no remarks.

^b There are varieties of antiphons, as has been explained in the article ANTIPHON. It is impossible to translate these technical terms.

² Mozarabic benedictions are in three clauses, each answered by "Amen." They vary with the day, and some are very beautiful.

^k This is said in the Mozarabic rite in the plural: "Credimus in unum Deum," &c.

The psalms are: at Sext, Pss. 53 [54], 118 [119] (Feci iudicium, Mirabilia, Justus es Domine). At None, Pss. 145 [146], 121 [122], 122 [123], 123 [124]. In Lent, and on certain other penitential days, the form of the office for these three hours is different, but offers no special peculiarity to call for explanation in this short survey.

Vespers :—

After the introduction, a *lauda*¹; antiphon; another lauda. Hymn, supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &c. Benedictio, with its oratio. Sonus (or sono) [omitted "in feriis"], followed by another lauda with its oratio, and a short form of commemoration of the same form as that at lauds.

Compline :—Pss. 4, vv. 7, 8, 9; 133 [134]. A few versicles for protection and forgiveness. Hymn, "Sol angelorum respice." Ps. 90 [91], with its antiphon. More versicles from the psalms. Hymn, "Cultor Dei memento." Supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &c.; benedictio. At the end of the service a short form of commendation corresponding to the commemoratio at lauds and vespers.

On Saturdays and high festivals, "in diebus sabbatorum vel praecipuarum festivitatum," after the psalms^m a responsory is said, followed by two short lessons, then a hymn, Ps. 50 [51] with a versus, said as an antiphon. Kyrie eleison, Pater noster, &c. Then on week days (in feriis) miserationes, which are short intercessory petitions in the form of litanies, with a constant response, so called because the opening words are "Miserere," or "Deus miserere," or "Domine miserere," and varying with the day of the week. Then a capitulum, Pater noster, and benedictio, and form of commendation as usual.

In the foregoing summary no notice has been taken of national or local variations of the main types of office, such as the old English uses (except in one point), or the ancient peculiarities of ritual in the churches of Lyons or Besançon, or any of the monastic variations from the normal Benedictine type. These, however interesting to liturgical students, are confined to points of detail. Neither does it come within the scope of this article to discuss or compare the contents of the several offices sketched in it. We may, however, draw attention to a few points which are obvious even from the skeletons given.

The Eastern offices, we thus see, are much longer and less methodically arranged than the Western. They contain also much less of Scripture; while the odes and canons which form so large a portion of the office, though often very beautiful and devotional, are much too prolix, and at times too rhapsodical to suit Western taste. The same may be said of the prayers.

The Western offices, on the other hand, are more clearly and compactly arranged. The hymns and collects are models of compressed thought and language. The antiphons and responses are for the most part taken from Scripture. Among the Western rites, the Roman is undoubtedly the most terse and pointed. The Ambrosian has many beauties, and is more varied in its collects and its psalmody, but less so in its ordinary hymns. Both hymns and collects are of the same type as the Roman.

^m This means after the second set of versicles from the Psalms, and immediately before the second hymn.

The Mozarabic Office has the greatest variety of canticles, hymns, and preces. Some of these, in the form of short litanies, are very beautiful. The responsories and other variable parts of the office, though very rich and suggestive, change so constantly as almost to produce a sense of want of repose. The prayers are of the Eastern type, usually longer and more diffuse than those of other Western Offices. [H. J. H.]

OFFICIALIS LIBER (officiales libri), a book or volumes containing the officia divina. The term is used with considerable latitude of application. Ménard, in his notes on the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 147, ed. Paris, 1642), quoting Agobard, explains it as equivalent to "Antiphonarius;" but a reference to Agobard himself (Liber de Correctione Antiphonarii, cap. 19) will show that he implies a threefold enumeration of the libri officiales, viz. the "Missal," the "Lectionary," and the "Antiphonary." Agobard was archbishop of Lyons, A.D. 814-840. This agrees with the use of the term by Amalarius (de Eccles. Off. lib. iv. cap. 29). In can. 22, C. Rotomag. it may refer to the antiphonary or the sacramentary. In can. 26, C. Tolet. iv., libellus officialis must be, as Ducange s. v. interprets it, Mamale Sacramentorum, a book which would include the minor offices, since the canon orders that parish priests were to be provided with one on their appointment, ne per ignorantiam etiam ipsis divinis sacramentis offendant; so, too, Binterim (vol. iv. p. 265). On the other hand, the treatise of Amalarius (de Eccles. Officiis) is said to be entitled in some MSS. Liber Officialis. [C. E. H.]

OFFICIUM AD MISSAM. The name of the introit in the Mozarabic liturgy. It was probably once current throughout the whole Gallican family of liturgies, if not more widely still; for, though Mabillon (de Lit. Gallicana, p. 36) gives "Antiphona" as the corresponding term in the Gallican liturgy, yet this is only a general name, like our "Anthem," and the similar term, officium missae, or simply officium, is found for the introit in the ancient office-books of the monastery of S. Germanus a Pratis at Paris (Bouillart, Histoire de l'Abbaye Royale de Saint-Germain des Prez, Recueil des Pièces Justificatives, v^{me} partie, pp. 158-160, &c.), in the English uses of Sarum and York, and also, according to Sala (notes to Bona, Rer. Liturg. tom. i. p. 212), in the missals of the Carthusian, Carmelite, and Dominican orders. [C. E. H.]

OIL, HOLY. The later Greeks give this name especially to oil that is considered holy, because it has proceeded from or been in contact or juxtaposition with some sacred object (Ordo Sacri Minist. Philothei, in Euch. Goar, 10; see note 71, p. 34); though they still apply it to the oil of catechumens (Goar 361, 362) and the oil of the sick, τὸ ἅγιον ἔλαιον εἰς νοσοῦντας (ib. 428). Under this head we have to notice the Oil of the Cross, that of the Holy Places, the Oil of the Saints, and that taken as a remedy or safeguard from the church lamps.

THE OIL OF THE CROSS.—In the Itinerarium, doubtfully ascribed to Antoninus of Placentia, who lived in the 6th century, the writer, after describing the cross exhibited as that on which Christ died, in a cubiculum attached to the basilica of Constantine, on Golgotha, adds: "Oil to be blessed is brought there in ampullae of onyx stone; but when the wood of the cross has touched the ampullae, it soon boils over" (§ 20; Bolland. Maii, tom. ii. Prolegom.). We should infer from this that the "oil of the cross," of which we read much from the 6th century downward, was at first merely oil which had been in such contact with the cross. Perhaps we are not to understand more than this in the following instances: Cyril of Seythopolis, 555, records two cures effected by St. Sabas by means of the "oil of the holy cross" (Sabae Vita, 45, 63). He also sprinkled with it a hill haunted by evil spirits (27). St. Cyriac is said to have cured an insane person "with the oil of the cross of Christ" (Vita, Simeon Metaphr.; Migne, Ser. Gr. ii. 931). Spiridion is said to have gone to the emperor Constantius, when sick, with an earthenware vessel hung from his neck, "as is the custom with those who dwell in the holy city, when they purpose to carry oil of the divine cross" (Vita, 18; sim. Met. u. s. iii. 440). Eutychius, to prevent mis-carriage, "anointed both man and wife with holy oil, both that of the precious cross" and that from an image (Life by Eustratius, vi. 45). He healed a demoniac by the same means (§ 55). In the West St. Gregory, at the end of the 6th century, acknowledges in one of his epistles, among other gifts from the East, some "oil of the holy cross . . . which (quod) blesses by its touch" (Epist. vii. Ind. i. 34).

There is no indication of a belief in the foregoing writers that the oil itself was a miraculous production; but Adamnanus, A.D. 679, speaking of that which his informant Arculfus had seen at Constantinople, whither a portion of the cross was said to have been sent by Helena, says: "De nodis eorundem trinalium lignorum liquor quidam odorifer quasi in similitudinem olei expressus . . . cujus videlicet liquoris si etiam parvula stillula super aegrotantes imponatur, quicumque languore vel morbo molestati, plenum recuperant sanitatem" (Acta S. O. Ben. 3, iii. 520; or Bede, de Sanctis Locis, 20).

The ampulla of Monza, figured in Vol. I. p. 78, appears from the inscription to have been made for the reception of oil of the cross. Gretser, de Sancta Cruce, lib. i., has a chapter (91) De Oleo S. Crucis, Opp. tom. i. p. 152; Ratish. 1734. See also Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 598, § 23.

OIL OF THE HOLY PLACES.—(1) We learn from Paulinus Petricorius, A.D. 461, that it was the custom to set vessels of oil in the places hallowed by the birth, death, burial, and ascension of our Lord, under the belief that it would acquire from them a miraculous healing power (De Vita S. Martini, v. l. 110).

(2) The oil of the lamps that burned in the holy places was supposed to possess the same virtue. Thus the Itinerarium of Antoninus, speaking of the holy sepulchre: "The urn of the lamp which had been placed at His head at that time [of His burial] burns there day and night; out of which we took a blessing, and set it in order again" (c. 18; Bolland. Maii, tom. ii. in Prolegom.).

OIL OF THE SAINTS.—Theodoret of Cyrus, A.D. 423, thought that he heard an evil spirit addressing him one night, who among other things said, "Be assured that I should long ago have shot thee down, had I not seen a band of martyrs with James (the ascetic of Nimuza, who was still living) guarding thee." The narrator explains, "I understood that he called a band of martyrs the ampulla of the oil of the martyrs which, containing the blessing (εὐλογίαν) gathered from many martyrs, hung beside my bed" (Historia Religiosa, 21). The oil of the martyrs or saints was of five kinds: (1) That which was supposed to exude from their relics; (2) that which flowed miraculously from their tombs; (3) that which had acquired virtue from contact with, or nearness to, their relics or tombs; (4) oil that distilled from their icons; (5) oil from the lamps which burnt before their images or shrines.

(1) In the Life of John the Almoner, by Leontius of Cyprus, A.D. 590, we are told that "a sweet, health-giving unguent flowed from his precious relics" (c. 54), and the author adds that in Cyprus the same grace was given to many saints, "the sweetness of unguents flowing from their precious relics as from fountains" (c. 55). Justinian is said by Procopius to have been healed by oil that flowed from the relics of several saints (De Aedif. i. 7). Unguent (μύρα), which flowed from the bones of Glyceria, a martyr at Heraclea, had long run freely into a brazen basin. When a silver one, which without the knowledge of the donor had been used for magical purposes, was substituted, the oil ceased to flow (A.D. 583), nor did it run again until the unpolluted vessel was restored to its place (Theophylact. Simoc. Historia, i. 11). St. Myrops of Chios "collected the unguent (μύρα) that flowed from the relics of the holy martyrs and apostles" buried at Ephesus, "and healed the sick therewith." From this circumstance she even received her name (Bolland. July 13, ex Synaxariis Graecis).

(2) In the Life of St. Sampson (§ 23; Surius, June 27) we read that a healing oil used to flow from his tomb on the anniversary of a miracle performed by him. St. Bonitus "ordered the sick to be anointed with oil, which he had ordered to be raised for a blessing out of the tomb of St. Peter at Clusina in Tuscany" (Vita S. Bon. vi. 26; Bolland. Jan. 15, p. 1074). A dying woman was healed by the oil flowing from the tomb of St. Eloy (Vita, ii. 51; Surius, Dec. 1). The church of St. Mary trans Tiberium is said in the Acta S. Quirini, 8 (Boll. Jun. 4), "fundere oleum fundatoris."

In the East, SS. Andrew, Nicholas, Theodorus Stratelates (Goar, u.s. 452), and above all Demetrius, were noted for this miracle. See especially the Analecta de Unguento seu Oleo e S. Demetrii Tumulio, in the supplement to the works of Simeon Metaphrastes (iii. Migne, Ser. Gr. 116).

This substance was also called manna. Thus among the relics collected by Angilbertus at Centule was some of "the manna of St. John the Evangelist" (Scriptum S. Angil. 15, in Bolland. Feb. tom. iii. 103). See also Menolog. Basil. May 8, St. John Ev. as cited by Ducange, Gloss. Graec. v. μάννα. Gregory of Tours speaks of it as a dust, probably dust saturated with the supposed oil: "Cujus (S. Joan.) nunc sepulcrum manna in modum farinae hodieque eructat" (De Mirac. i. 30). But others speak of it as fluid (Duc. Gloss. Lat. in Manna).

(3) In the case of Demetrius, and many others, there is no ambiguity; the oil itself is supposed to be a miraculous product. But it is sometimes doubtful whether this is really meant. For there was a custom of placing oil in or near the tombs of the saints in the hope that it would derive virtue from their remains, or from the earth into which they were resolved. Thus Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 303, says of the tomb of St. Felix (Natal. 6, l. 38), that it was anointed. And again (Nat. 13, l. 590):—

"Ista superficies tabulae gemino patet ore
Praebens infusae subjecta foramina nardo,
Quae cineris sancti veniens a sede reposita
Sanctificat medicans arcana spiritus aura."

From Paulinus Petricorius, quoted above, we learn that the practice was common in the 5th century. The tomb of St. Martin was especially famous for the oil that received virtue from it (Greg. Turon. de Mirac. S. Mart. i. 2; comp. ii. 32, 51; iii. 24; iv. 36; &c.). It is, we suppose, of oil thus sanctified in the Memoria of St. Stephen that St. Augustine speaks, when he relates the recovery of a boy from apparent death on being anointed "ejusdem martyris oleo" (De Civit. Dei, xxii. viii. 18). St. Chrysostom: "Not the bones of the martyrs only, but their tombs and coffins, pour forth abundant blessing. Take holy oil, and thou wilt never suffer the shipwreck of drunkenness" (Hom. in Mart. ii. 669). A magnate of Antioch, anointed with oil from the tomb of Euthymius, was at once healed (Euthym. Vita, 127; Monum. Gr. Cotel. ii. 309).

(4) There was an icon of the Blessed Virgin at Constantinople in the 7th century, from which oil was believed to flow continually. Of this Arculfus, the French bishop who went to the Holy Land in 690, declared himself to be an eyewitness (Adamnanus, de Locis Sanctis, iii. 5).

(5) Far more common are stories of healing by oil from a lamp burnt in honour of Christ or the saints. The following examples are from the East. The wounded hand of a Saracen was healed by oil from a lamp before the icon of St. George (Mirac. S. Georg. vi. 55; Boll. Apr. 23). St. Cyrus and St. John "appeared to a person suffering from gout, and bade him take a little oil in a small ampulla from the lamp that burnt before the image of the Saviour" in the greater tetrapyle at Alexandria, and anoint his feet with it (Vitae SS. Cyr. et Joan. § 2; Boll. Jan. 31; see also Vita Euthymii, 147, in Cotelieri Monum. Gr. ii. 325; Vita Lucae Jon. Combef. Auctarium, ii. 1012; Vita Eudocimi i. 9, Boll. July 30).

Similar stories are found in the Western writers. Thus Nicetius of Lyons, by means of "the oil of the lamp which burnt daily at his sepulchre, restored sight to the blind, drove demons from bodies possessed, restored soundness to shrunken limbs," &c. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 37). An epileptic was cured by oil from the lamp that burnt night and day at the tomb of St. Severin (Transl. S. Sev. Auct. Joan. Diac. Boll. 8). It was revealed to a blind woman, that oil from the lamp of St. Geneviève would restore her sight, if the warden of the church were to anoint her with it (Mirac. S. Genof. § 14). A week after she brought a blind man, who was healed in the same manner (ibid.). On the lamps at tombs see LIGHTS, sect. ix. p. 997.

Mabillon, in 1685, found in a private collection at Milan (Iter Ital. Ap. 28; Mus. Ital. i. 14) an "Index oleorum sacrorum quae Gregorius Magnus misit ad Theodelindam Reginam." The MS. bears the heading, "Notitia de olea (sic) Sanctorum Martyrum, qui Romae in corpore requiescunt." This he printed in 1705 in App. 3 to his tract, De Cultu Ignotorum Sanctorum. It may be seen also in the Acta Martyrum Sincera of Ruinart, p. 619, and in the Anecdota Ambrosiana of Muratori, ii. 191. It gives the name of above sixty saints, and claims many thousand more as contributing to the production of the sacred oil ("Sancti Cornili et multa milia (sic) Sanctorum"). One entry deserves to be cited from its singularity, "Oleo (sic) de sede ubi prius sedit Sanctus Petrus." Muratori (u. s.) has a disquisition bearing on the present subject.

OIL FROM THE CHURCH LAMPS USED IN HEALING.—St. Chrysostom, speaking of the ornaments of a church, says, "This table is far more honourable than that table (in your house), and this lamp than (your household) lamp: and they all know it, who, having in faith and at a happy time anointed themselves with (its) oil, have dispelled diseases" (Hom. 32 in S. Mat. Ev. § 6; vii. 373). From this we infer that oil from any church lamp was thus used, before the custom arose of setting lights before icons, and of taking the oil that fed them with a view to engage the intercession of the saint represented. We have an example in the life of Nilus the Younger, who invited a priest to his oratory, to pray over a sick person and "to anoint him with oil from the lamp." We are told that "in this manner he healed monks and laymen who were harassed by evil spirits, anointing them with oil by the hands of priests" (Vita, viii. 58, 59; Boll. Sept. 26). The practice is not extinct. In one "Office of Supplication" for the sick, printed by Goar, we have this rubric: "And he anoints him with holy oil from the lamp, saying this prayer." The heading of the prayer is, "A prayer on the unction of the sick with holy oil" (Euchol. 842). An instance in the West is related by Gregory of Tours (de Mirac. S. Mart. i. 18). In a cattle plague a person "went to the holy basilica, and took the oil of the lamps which hung from the arched roof;" and anointed the animals affected with a good result. [W. E. S.]

OIL, RITUAL USES OF. (1) THE OIL OF THE CATECHUMENS, Oleum Catechumenorum, Baptizandum.—There was a general custom from an early period of anointing catechumens once or oftener during their catechumenate with "exorcised" or "hallowed" oil. [UNCTION.] Forms for the benediction or exorcism of this oil are found in most of the ancient offices: e.g. "A thanksgiving (eucharist) touching the unction of the mystic oil" is ordered and sketched in the Apostolical Constitutions, vii. 42. As it was usual to anoint the possessed with a view to their deliverance from the power of Satan, and catechumens, as unbaptized, were considered his subjects, a similar rite would readily suggest itself as appropriate in their case.

(2) THE OIL OF CHRISM (see CHRISM).—This had a twofold use in connexion with baptism: (1) in the West, and at an early period in Egypt, it was employed by the priest immediately after baptism [BAPTISM]; and (2) it was used at confirmation both in the East and West. [UNCTION.]

(3) THE OIL OF THE SICK, Oleum Infirmorum, Oleum pro Infirmis, Oleum pro populo, εὐχέλαιον.—The use of oil with prayer for the sick was a tradition from the apostles. In our Lord's lifetime they "anointed with oil many that were diseased, and healed them" (Mark vi. 13). St. James prescribes its use to presbyters in general, "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord" (James v. 14). There is abundant proof that the example and precept were followed. [SICK, VISITATION OF.]

Oil was blessed for the sick, not by the clergy only, but by laymen of great repute for sanctity. It was even done by women. Thus St. Monegund, about 570, on her death-bed "blessed oil and salt," which were afterwards given to the sick with good effect (Vita, § 9, in Acta S. O. Ben. i. 204; Greg. Tur. Vitae Patr. xix. 4). From the story of a nun who, having dreamt that St. Radegund her abbess, anointed her with oil, awoke healed, we may perhaps infer that it was her practice also (Radeg. Vita, i. 35, auct. Fortunato). In the West this office was restrained to the bishops at a somewhat early period. Pseudo-Innocent says that it was lawful for presbyters and others to apply "the oil of chrism" to the sick, but that it must be "made by the bishop" (Epist. i. 8). This was at Rome. The rule seems to have been enforced elsewhere much later. About 730, however, Boniface orders "all presbyters to obtain the oil of the sick from the bishop and have it by them" (Statuta, 29; ed. Würdw. 142; comp. Capit. Reg. Fr. vi. 179). The early Gallican church knew no such restriction; but Pepin, 744, seems to have borrowed it from Rome (cap. 4; in Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 158). The council of Châlons, 813, decides that "the sick ought to be anointed by the presbyters with oil, which is blessed by the bishop" (can. 48).

This rule never obtained in the East. Thus Theodore of Canterbury, by birth of Tarsus, A.D. 668: "According to the Greeks it is lawful for presbyters . . . to make exorcised oil and chrism for the sick, if it be necessary" (Capitulare apud Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vii. 3, § 7). Among them it is now generally consecrated as required by a sick person, either in their house or in the church, by seven priests, if they can be brought together, though one is sufficient (Metrophanes Critop. Confessio, 13; in Kimmel, Monum. Fidei Orient. ii. 153; Goar. Euchol. 408, 432). The Armenian rule in the 8th century was that the priest should bless the oil of the sick, "using proper prayers, as much as was needed for the occasion" (Joan. Cathol. can. 11, Mai, u. s.).

(4) OIL IN THE AGNUS DEI.—The Ordo Romanus, about 730, tells us that at Rome, on Easter-eve, the archdeacon, coming early to the church of St. John Lateran, "pours wax into a clean vessel of large size, and mixes oil with it in the same, and blesses the wax, and pours out thereof into the figure of lambs" (Mus. Ital. ii. 31). [AGNUS DEI, Vol. I. p. 44.] The same Ordo says (32), "Similiter in suburbanis civitatibus de cera faciunt," where for "cera" Pseudo-Alcuin reads "oleo" (De Dic. Off. 19).

(5) OIL, THE ELEMENT IN BAPTISM.—Turribius, bishop of Astorga in Spain, A.D. 447, in a letter to two other Spanish bishops, Idacius and Ceponius, speaking of the apocryphal books received by the Priscillianists, says: "That is especially to be noted and execrated in the so-called Acts of St. Thomas, that it says that he baptized not with water, as the preaching of the Lord directs, but with oil only, which practice those books of ours (in the context, libri canonici) do not admit, but which the Manicheans follow" (Epist. § 5; ad calc. Epist. xv. Leon. M. 130, ed. Ven. 1748).

The fact of manichean baptism in oil will hardly be doubted by those who are aware that the practice was at least not unknown among the orthodox Christians of Persia. Our authority for this is the Menology of the Greek church in its account of the martyrs Dadas, Goblelaas, and Kasdo. (Lesson for Sept. 29; Lib. Mens. Venet. 1628.)

(6) OIL IN THE EUCHARISTIC BREAD.—For many ages the oblates of the Nestorians and Syrian Jacobites have been made with oil. Among the former the preparation of the dough, which is accompanied by prayer, is the subject of rubrical direction. It is to be made with "fine flour and salt and olive oil, and three drops of water" (Officium Renovationis Fermenti; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. i. iii. 7; sim. Badger, Nestorians, ii. 162; see also Le Brun, Explication, Diss. xi. 9).

(7) OIL IN THE FONT.—From the second century downwards, the bishop consecrated the water of baptism by prayer, though the sacrament was considered valid without it. See BAPTISM, § 42, Vol. I. p. 159. That no oil or μύρον was at first used in this consecration, or poured into the water after it, we may infer from the silence of the earlier writers. Our first witness is Pseudo-Dionysius, who is generally supposed to have written about 520: "The chief priest pours the μύρον in lines forming a cross, into the purifying font of baptism" (De Hierarch. Eccl. iv. 10; comp. ii. 7). [FONT, BENEDICTION OF, p. 680.]

The orders both of the East and West supply internal evidence of the fact, that the consecration of the water was originally considered complete without the infusion of the oil or chrism. This was a later ceremony added to the several offices at various and uncertain periods.

(8) OIL IN CHURCH LAMPS.—The lights of a church were so costly that at an early period some stated provision for them, beyond the voluntary offerings of the faithful, became necessary. We might infer this from a tradition of Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius the Younger. It is said that "once on Easter Day going into the church (at Jerusalem) to celebrate the holy resurrection of Christ, she gave 10,000 sextarii of oil to be used for the lights" (Nicephorus Call. Hist. Eccl. xiv. 50). In a will ascribed to Perpetuus of Tours, about 470, we read: "From the revenues of those (estates aforementioned) let oil be furnished to light perpetually the tomb of the lord (domni) Martin" (App. ad Opp. Greg. Tur. 1318). Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Let those who are able present wax tapers, or oil to be put into the lamp" (Serm. 76, § 2).

The council of Bracara, 572, directed that a third part of all the ordinary oblations of the people should be spent "pro luminariis ecclesiae" (can. 2). Gregory of Rome, in 603, gave lands and buildings to the church of St. Paul at Rome, with the proviso that all revenues therefrom should be spent on its lights (Epist. xii. 9).

OLD TESTAMENT (IN ART). The manner in which the Old Testament was generally employed in early Christian art indicates a conviction of the identity of the revelation contained in it with the fuller one made in the New Testament. The cycle of subjects selected from it for pictorial representation, and the mode in which they were intermingled with subjects from the Gospels, may be regarded as a visible exemplification of Augustine's words, "Novum Testamentum in vetere latet. Vetus Testamentum in novo patet." From the almost boundless wealth of persons and histories offering themselves to the pencil of the artist in the older books of the Bible, only those, as a rule, are chosen which the Christian consciousness regarded as typical of the great redemptive acts of Christ, or of the Sacraments of the Church. In the Western church, where alone any large remains of ecclesiastical art have been preserved to us, a rule was very speedily established in practice rigidly defining not only what subjects were suitable for employment in religious art, but the very form and arrangement in which they were to be represented. Hieratic types were prescribed for each of these chief symbolic events, from which, when once defined and accepted by the church, it was not permissible for an artist to diverge. So permanent was this formulated type, so unchanging the accessories, that a very small fragment of a fresco or a mosaic is frequently sufficient to enable us to determine its subject with perfect certainty. Instead of having the licence "quidlibet audendi," the ecclesiastical artist was confined within trammels so close that he became little more than the mechanical reproducer of authorised designs. It is needless here to repeat what has been already said [FRESCO, Vol. I. pp. 690-701] of the typical character of early Christian art. It will be sufficient to indicate the subjects from the Old Testament which we find portrayed, and the type commonly followed. We would premise that we give art its widest meaning, including paintings, mosaics, the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi, gilt glasses, ivories, lamps, &c.

(1) The Creation of Woman.—The formation of Eve out of the side of Adam was an early-recognised and favourite symbol of the church, the spouse of Christ, proceeding from the pierced side of the Second Adam (Tertull. de Anim. c. 43). This is, however, only found represented on a few sarcophagi, and that not with sufficient clearness to render the identification unquestionable, though there can, we think, be little doubt of its correctness. The most remarkable example is on the upper left-hand corner (the spectator's left) of a sarcophagus of the 4th century, discovered under the floor of St. Paul's without the walls of Rome, now in the Lateran Museum (Appell. Monuments of Early Christian Art, No. 5; Brownlow and Northcote, Roma Sotteran, pl. xix. p. 301; Westwood, Sculp. of the Sarcoph. p. 50). Dean Burgon enumerates eleven instances among the fifty-five sarcophagi in the Lateran Museum. Sometimes our Lord wields the wonder-working rod. An ivory of the 4th century, given by Gori (Thes. Vet. Diptych. vol. ii. p. 161; Agincourt, Sculp. pl. xii. No. 1), represents unmistakably the extraction of Eve from Adam's side, with other subjects from the opening chapters of Genesis—the murder of Abel, &c.

(2) The Fall.—Few subjects are more frequent in every class of Christian art. Our first parents usually stand on either side of the tree of knowledge, round which the serpent twines, hiding their shame, sometimes with their hands alone, sometimes with fig-leaves. A lamp, figured by Agincourt (Terres Cuites, pl. xxiv. No. 2), represents Eve seeking for a veil at the moment that she takes the fatal fruit. On the Lateran sarcophagus already referred to the serpent offers the apple in his mouth. Our Lord, as a beardless young man, presents Adam with a bundle of ears of corn, and Eve with a lamb, the emblems of their future labours in tilling the ground and spinning wool. On the celebrated sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bosio, p. 45; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 277; Bottari, vol. i. pl. 15; Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. 6, nos. 5–11; Appell. p. 9; Parker, Photogr. 2997, Sculpture, pl. xiii.) the serpent is absent; Adam and Eve turn their backs to one another and to the tree, and the emblems of labour stand by their side. By a singular eccentricity, on a gilded glass given by Buonarruoti (Vetri, tom. i. fig. 2, and p. 8), Eve wears a necklace and bracelet of gold. Martigny (p. 16, b) refers in explanation of this to some Rabbinical writings, which assert that immediately after her fatal offence Eve was decked with every variety of female dress and ornaments. The subject is frequent in the catacomb frescoes both of Rome and Naples. (Bellermann, Katakomben zu Neapel, pl. 5; Appell. no. 23.) The expulsion from Eden occurs on a sarcophagus on the Lateran Museum (Parker, Sculpture, pl. xv.; see also Bottari, Sculpture e l'itire, tav. ii.).

(3) Abel and Cain.—The sacrifice of the lamb by Abel naturally offered itself to Christian typology as prefiguring the death of the Lamb of God, as well as the sacrifice of the Eucharist. In the latter reference Abel's offerings, "munera pueri tui iusti Abel," occur in the canon of the Mass in connexion with the sacrifice of Abraham, and the bread and wine of Melchizedek. The subject is more frequent on sarcophagi than in wall decorations. We have, however, an example of the latter in the mosaics of the sanctuary of St. Vital's at Ravenna, where Abel stands alone, clad, shepherdlike, in a goat-skin, holding a lamb in his arms extended in prayer over a sacrificial table, on the other side of which Melchizedek is offering bread and wine, thus indicating the spiritual identity of the gifts with the Real Presence in the Eucharist. [MOAICS, p. 1322.] On some sarcophagi Cain and Abel often appear together, making their respective offerings of a sheaf of corn or grapes and a lamb to the Deity, represented as an old man, seated (Bottari, tav. li.; cxxxvii., Bosio, p. 159).

(4) Noah.—The ark as a symbol of the church carried safely through the deluge of God's wrath, and Noah as a type of redeemed humanity admitted to the church by the waters of baptism, receiving from the dove, figuring the Holy Spirit, the olive branch of heavenly peace, is repeated constantly in all examples of early Christian art (cf. Tertull. de Baptismo, c. viii.). The countless representations of this one scene, depicted purely symbolically, without the slightest attempt at historical accuracy, evidence the strong hold it had on the early Christian mind. This was one of the subjects selected by St. Ambrose for the adornment of his Basilica at Milan. [FRESCO, Vol. I. p. 699, no. 10; DOVE, p. 575.]

(5) Abraham's Sacrifice.—The purely symbolical character of early Christian art is evidenced by the perpetual recurrence of this specially typical act, alone out of the whole of the incidents in the life of Abraham. It is one of the scenes which meet us everywhere. The primitive character of this type appears from a passage from St. Gregory Nyssen, quoted in the second Nicene council (act. iv.; Labbe, Concil. vii. 736), describing a picture which he says he never looked on without tears, in which the sacrifice of Isaac was represented just as we see it on the walls and ceilings and on the sarcophagi of the catacombs. St. Augustine speaks too of it as "tot locis pictum" (Contr. Faustin. lib. xiii. c. 72). It is needless to particularise the variety of costume found in different examples. In one instance Abraham is vested in the high priestly robes of the Jewish ritual (Bottari, tav. clxi.). The substituted ram appears hard by, sometimes struggling in the brambles (which were regarded as a type of our Lord's crown of thorns), sometimes standing free. Abraham's sacrifice appears in the mosaics of the sanctuary of St. Vital's at Ravenna, in conjunction with the reception of the three angels. The lunette containing these subjects corresponds to that containing the conjoined sacrifices of Abel and Melchizedek. The eucharistic and sacrificial reference of the whole series is evident.

(6) Melchizedek.—As already stated, the offering of bread and wine made by the royal priest to the father of the faithful, is one of the eucharistic subjects at St. Vital's. [EUCARIST, p. 626.] This subject is also the first of the series of Old Testament representations in the name of St. Mary Major's at Rome.

(7) Moses.—There is no Old Testament history from which so many illustrations have been taken as that of the great deliverer and law-giver of God's ancient people. The sacramental character of the passage of the Red Sea, the giving of the manna, and the water flowing from the smitten rock, having been so recognised by our Lord and His apostles, these events naturally took their place among the leading eucharistic types, and are found perpetually recurring in every variety of Christian art.

(a) The first of these symbolical incidents in the life of Moses is his loosing his sandals from his feet before the burning bush. The act was regarded by the fathers as typical of the duty of putting away all worldly thoughts and cares in approaching to the Divine Presence (cf. Ambros. de Isaac, c. 4; Greg. Naz. Or. xlii. tom. i. p. 689). This is one of the most frequent subjects in the catacomb frescoes, and appears in early mosaics, as at St. Vital, Ravenna, and St. Catherine, Mount Sinai.

(b) The Passage of the Red Sea.—We do not find this subject so frequently represented as we might have expected from its universal recognition as a type of baptism. It is not found in paintings, only on sarcophagi. We may instance one from the Vatican cemetery (Bottari, tav. xl.; Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. viii. no. 1). The subject is represented with far greater detail and a larger number of figures on other sarcophagi (Bosio, p. 591; Bottari, tav. exciv.; Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lxvii.). In the Museum of Aix is one discovered at Arles, which in addition to the Gathering of the Quails, and the striking of the Rock, represents the Exodus from Egypt and the overthrow of Pharaoh (Millin, u. s. p. 9). Three sarcophagi at Arles, two in the museum, and one at St. Trophimus, also present the scene in detail, with the remarkable addition of the pillar of fire going before the Israelites.

(c) Moses striking the Rock.—This subject, so distinctly typifying the waters of baptism and the supplies of spiritual grace and strength flowing from the smitten rock, "which was Christ" (1 Cor. x. 4), meets us perpetually. It is seen constantly in the catacomb frescoes, and is seldom absent from the sarcophagi, where the thirsty crowd, generally wanting in the pictures, are eagerly drinking of the copious streams which are gushing from the rock struck by the miraculous rod. In close connexion with this subject there is almost always found on the sarcophagi a group of persons in flat caps, who seize an old and bearded man carrying a rod by either arm, and lead him off as a prisoner (Bosio, 103, 285, 287, 295, 425). This has been usually identified with the apprehension of St. Peter. Martigny considers that it is intended for the rebellion of the Israelites, which preceded the miraculous gift of water (Exod. xvii. 4). Probably there is an intentional combination of the two scenes, thus evidencing the complete identification of the two revelations in the mind of the early Christians, by whom Peter was regarded as the antitype of Moses, "the leader of the new Israel," as Prudentius calls him. This is also indicated by the marked resemblance the figure of Moses in this subject usually bears, in the general look of his hair and beard and the outline of his features, to the traditional type of St. Peter, and is still more strikingly brought out in some of the gilded glasses representing the striking of the Rock, where not only is the resemblance unmistakable, but all doubt is removed by the name PETERUS being superscribed. (See Brownlow and Northcote, Rom. Sott. fig. 33, p. 287; pl. xvii. no. 2; pp. 248, 263, 287, 303.)

(d) The Manna and the Quails.—The manna, as a symbol of the Living Bread that came down, might have been expected to appear more frequently than it does. Only one indubitable example is found among the catacomb pictures. This was discovered in 1863 in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, and was described by De Rossi (Bulletino, Oct. 1863, p. 76; see MANNA, p. 1084). Dr. Appell cites another example from the sarcophagus of the abess Eusebius in the museum at Marseilles, figured by Millin (pl. lviii. no. 2). He also mentions one example of the quails from the Arles sarcophagus in the museum at Aix, already spoken of. It is not at all improbable that the same combination of Old and New Testament symbolism spoken of in connexion with the striking of the rock has place also in this allied miracle, and that a large number of the pictures usually identified with the multiplication of the loaves and fishes in its closing scene, the gathering of the fragments, have also, as Martigny suggests (following Bosio's lead) a reference to the gathering of the manna in baskets. The venerable bearded personage represented has more resemblance to the type of Moses than that of Christ (Bosio, p. 251).

(e) The giving of the Tables of the Law.—This subject is found in juxtaposition with that of striking the rock on a very large number of the sarcophagi. Moses usually stands with his right foot on a rock, symbolizing Mount Sinai, and receives the tables from a hand emerging from a cloud (Bosio, pp. 363, 367, 589; Bottari, tav. xxvii.).

(8) The Grapes of Eshcol.—Dr. Appell mentions that a sarcophagus in the museum at Marseilles, traditionally said to have contained the bodies of two of St. Ursula's virgins, bears on its cover the parallel subjects of the two Israelite spies bearing a large bunch of grapes on a staff, and the miracle of turning the water into wine at Cana (Millin, u. s. p. lix. no. 3; Dr. Piper, De Caumont, Bullet. Monument. vol. xxi. pp. 553-559).

(9) David.—Singularly enough, this remarkable type of Christ is only known to appear once in the whole range of Christian art. This is in a fresco filling one of the compartments of the ceiling of a cubiculum in the catacomb of Callistus (Bosio, p. 239; Bottari, tav. lxiii.; Aringhi, i. 54). In his right hand the youth wields the loaded sling, and with his left raises the fold of his short girdled tunic, bearing a supply of stones.

(10) The Ascension of Elijah.—This subject, at once a type of our Lord's ascension (Greg. Magn. in Evangel. Hom. xxix. c. 6), and a proof of the rapture into heaven of the glorified bodies of the living saints (Iren. lib. v. c. 5), was a special favourite with the early Christians, who delighted to have it sculptured on their sarcophagi and painted in their burial vaults. Elijah is usually portrayed standing in a four-horse chariot, an almost exact reproduction of the triumphal cars of the Roman emperors carved on their arches and stamped on their coins. With his right hand he delivers his mantle to Elijah. Attendant figures of a diminutive size stand for the sons of the prophets, watching the prophet's ascent. In some instances the Jordan [p. 890] is personified by a river-god, with a crown of rushes, leaning on his arm (Appell, p. 341). The finest example is on a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, figured by Brownlow and Northcote (fig. 30, p. 250), and Dr. Appell (Monuments of Early Christian Art, p. 22); see also Bosio, pp. 73, 77, 161, 257; Aringhi, tom. i. pp. 305, 309, 429; Bottari, tav. lii.; Allegranza, Spiegazioni, tom. v.; Perret, tom. iv. pl. xvi. no. 21.

(11) Ezekiel's Vision of the Valley of Dry Bones.—Striking as the symbolical force of this subject is as a foreshadowing of the Resurrection, it is of rare occurrence in early Christian art.

It appears on a few sarcophagi, and is always represented in the same manner. The prophet stands erect, holding his roll, extending his right hand towards a group of two naked men standing up, into whom the spirit of life has just been breathed, and a third, still inanimate, extended on the ground, by whose side are two human heads, one a mere skull, the other partially covered with flesh. (Bottari, tav. xxxviii. cxxiv., cxv.; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. viii. no. 3; Bosio, pp. 95, 425; Parker, Photogr. 2921.)

(12) Daniel.—Daniel in the Lions' Den disputes for frequency of representation with Moses Striking the Rock, and the History of Jonah. It meets the eye everywhere, and always conforms to the same general type, with many minor modifications. The prophet is almost always entirely naked, standing, with his hands extended in prayer, between two lions. Habakkuk, according to the apocryphal addition, stands by, with the hand which has conveyed him through the air sometimes still grasping his hair, and offers the prophet a basketful of round bread cakes, decussated, exactly resembling our "hot cross buns" (Bosio, 155, 285). A fish is sometimes added, in evident allusion to Christ as the food of the soul, as in the very curious design, from a sarcophagus at Brescia, given by Dr. Appell (p. 31). In the earliest known example, in the cemetery of Domitilla (Brownlow and Northcote, p. 73, fig. 11), Daniel is clothed in a short tunic; but this is so exceptional that Le Blant (Inscriptions Chrétiennes de Gaule, tom. i. p. 493) is only able to produce five similar examples, and all of these of comparatively late date. Sometimes he wears a cincture (Bottari, tav. cxv.). The apocryphal story of his destruction of the dragon with balls of pitch and hair is also sometimes depicted on sarcophagi. There is an example from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, p. 57; Bottari, tav. xix.; Parker, Photogr. 2920). The woodcut given [DRAGON, p. 579] from this sarcophagus renders description needless. The position of the serpent twining round a tree sets historical truth at defiance. It is found on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Ver. Illust. pars iii. p. 54), and on one in the museum at Arles, and on a gilt glass published by Garrucci (Vetri, iii. 13), where Christ stands behind the prophet, who turns to him for succour before offering the food to the dragon who is issuing from a cavern.

(13) The Three Children in the Furnace.—This is another constantly recurring representation. Not so frequent is the preliminary scene, when they are required to worship the Golden Image. It is found in a fresco from the catacomb of St. Callistus (Bottari, tav. lxxviii.); and a sarcophagus from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, 63) in connexion with the furnace scene. Nebuchadnezzar is seated in front of his statue, attended by his courtiers. Two of the youths are already in the furnace; one of them is helping in the third, who is being pushed forward by an officer. A fourth figure, "one like unto the Son of God," stands in the centre. It also occurs in a fresco from the cemetery of Callistus (Bosio, p. 279) and on a sarcophagus at St. Ambrogio at Milan (Allegrezza, Spiegaz. tav. iv.; Appell, p. 33). The image is a bust, set on a pedestal; the Hebrew youths wear Phrygian bonnets and a short tunic. In the more usual subject of the furnace they also wear the bonnet and sometimes trousers, and stand erect with their arms extended in prayer [FRESCO, No. 12, p. 700; FURNACE, 704]; (Bottari, tav. lxi., xli., lxii., cxliii., cxv., clxxvi. 6; Bosio, pp. 63, 129). The furnace is sometimes wanting, and the youths stand among flames on the ground (Bosio, pp. 463, 495). There is one example in which there are only two youths. In one from St. Priscilla (Bottari, tav. clxxxi.; Bosio, p. 551) by a beautiful symbolism, a dove is depicted in the air above the heads of the youths carrying the olive branch of peace in her mouth.

(14) Jonah.—As a type of our Lord's Resurrection this prophet occurs constantly in the catacomb frescoes and on the sarcophagi, on lamps, diptychs, gilt glasses, and sepulchral slabs. Three scenes in his history are of constant recurrence, sometimes forming distinct pictures, as in the cemeteries of Callistus (Bosio, p. 225) and Marcellinus (pp. 377, 383), sometimes through exigencies of space ingeniously combined into one compendious scene (Bosio, pp. 289, 463). (a) Jonah being cast into the sea and swallowed up by the sea monster; (b) being vomited forth; (c) reclining under his gourd, to which a fourth is sometimes added, (d) deprived of the shade of his gourd and lamenting over the sparing of Nineveh (Bosio, u. s.). He is always absolutely naked. The "great fish" is an impossible monster of the dragon type, with a very long and narrow neck, and large head and ears and sometimes even horns, and an elongated sinuous tail. The gourd also is a plant totally unknown to nature, covered with dependent swelling pear-shaped fruit. Its trailing branches cover a trellis, beneath which the prophet lies supporting himself on one arm, with an aspect of chagrin. One of the most spirited representations of the history is on a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, from the crypt of St. Peter's (Bosio, p. 103; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 335; Bottari, vol. i. tav. xlii.; Appell, p. 19; Parker, Photogr. 2905). In a sarcophagus from St. Lorenzo (Bosio, p. 411) the histories of Jonah and Noah are combined, and the dove is conveniently perched on the prow of the ship.

(15) Job.—Job, seated on a heap of ashes, or on a dunghill, visited by his friends and reproached by his wife, is found on Christian art monuments with some degree of frequency. It appears in the catacomb frescoes (Bosio, p. 307; Bottari, tav. cv.; Perret, tom. i., pl. xxv.; Bottari, tav. xci.) and on sarcophagi, though more frequently in southern France than in Italy. There are examples in the Museum of Arles and Lyons (Millin, u. s. pl. xlvii. 1). The best representation of the scene is on the tomb of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359 (left-hand corner of the lower tier). In a fresco given by Bottari (tav. xci.), and Bosio (p. 307), Job holds a potsherd with which he is scraping his leg.

(16) Susanna.—As a type of the church persecuted by the two older forms of religion—the Pagan and the Jewish—the history of Susanna is found on sarcophagi, but only rarely. It is more frequent on those of France than in Italy. The mode of representation is always the same. Susanna, veiled, is standing as an orante between the two elders. An additional symbolism is exhibited in some of the French monuments, where a serpent coiled round a tree is dashing his tongue at some oaves among its branches (Bosio, p. 83, no. 4; Bottari, tav. xxxii., lxxxi.; Buonarruoti, Vetri, p. 1; Millin, u. s. pl. lxxv. 5, lxxvi. 8, lxxvii. 4). An allegorical picture given by Perret (vol. i. pt. lxxviii.) represents the story under the image of a lamb between two wild beasts, intended for wolves. The application is made certain by the words "SUSANNA" and "SENIORES" above them. [CHURCH, p. 389.]

(17) Tobias.—The fish caught by Tobias, whose gall drove away the evil spirit and cured blindness, was regarded by the early Christians as a distinct type of Christ (cf. August. Serm. iv. de Petr. et Paul.; Optat. lib. iii.). In a catacomb fresco we see him starting on his journey with the angel for his guide (Agincourt, Peinture, cl. vii. n. 3). The most frequent subject is his catching the fish. Once in the vault of a cubiculum of St. Callistus he is depicted quite naked, carrying the fish by a hook in his right hand, and his traveller's staff in his left (Bottari, tav. lxxv.; Bosio, p. 243; Macarii Hagioglypta, p. 75). He is also naked, save a cincture, in another fresco (Perret, vol. iii. pl. xxvi.), in which he presents the fish to the angel. More generally, as on the gilt glasses, he is clothed in a short tunic, and has his right hand down the fish's throat (Buonarruoti, tav. ii. no. 2; Perret, vol. iv. pl. xxv. no. 33; Garrucci, Vetri, iii.; Hagioglypta, p. 76). A fresco from the cemetery of Priscilla, badly drawn and misunderstood by Bosio (p. 474), is decided by Garrucci (Hagioglypta, p. 76, note 2) to represent Tobias carrying the heart, liver, and gall of the fish, with his dog running before him. On a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, pars iii. p. 54) the dog is depicted fawning on old Tobit on his son's return.

This list includes all the subjects from the Old Testament embraced in the ordinary cycle of early Christian art. A few isolated subjects may be found here and there, not enumerated above, chiefly on ivories and other minor works of art, but they are quite exceptional, and it does not fall within the purpose of this article to dwell upon them. It will be seen that the leading principle of early Christian art is the unity of the two covenants, and the interpretation of the Old Testament by the New, and the exhibition of the New as the fulfilment of the Old. This principle had its most complete development in the system of parallelism, by which type and antitype were placed in such immediate juxtaposition that the eye could embrace both at once and observe their correspondence. It was not an unfrequent practice to devote one wall of the nave of a church to the Old Testament, and the opposite wall to the New. This is specially recommended in the letter of Nilus to Olympiodorus cited in the acts of the fourth session of the second Nicene council (Labbe, Concil. vii. 749). "Novi et Veteris Testamenti historiis hinc inde parietes templi repleri doctissimis pictoris opera velim," the object being, as there stated, that the unlearned who were unable to read the Holy Scriptures might be instructed by the sight, and be excited to emulate the devotion and noble deeds thus depicted. The legates of pope Hadrian I. at the same council acknowledged that this was the received custom, and mentioned a basilica erected by a former pope John in which it was adopted, referring particularly to the pictures on opposite walls of the expulsion of Adam from Paradise, and the admission of the penitent thief (Labbe, ibid. 750). The basilicas erected by Paulinus at Nola contained the one subjects from the Old, the other from the New Testament. [FRESCO, p. 701.] In the same article is a list of the twenty-one scriptural paintings, all but four taken from the Old Testament, with which St. Ambrose decorated his basilica at Milan (ibid. p. 700). We have a remarkable example of the same principle of arrangement in England in the churches erected by Benedict Biscop at the end of the 7th century at Wearmouth and Jarrow. At St. Peter's, Wearmouth, the south wall was occupied with scenes from gospel history, the north with corresponding subjects from the apocalypse. At St. Paul's, Jarrow, the parallelism between the Old and New Testament was developed on the opposite walls, Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice, answering to our Lord bearing His cross, and the Brazen Serpent to the Crucifixion (Beda, Vit. Abbott. c. 5, cc. 5, 88).

The very remarkable scenes of mosaic pictures from the Old Testament in the basilica of St. Mary Major's at Rome, stand completely isolated, and form a class by themselves. They are simply a series of scenes from the sacred narrative treated purely historically, without the slightest hint of symbolism. These pictures, which begin with the interview between Abraham and Melchizedek, and carry on the history through the lives of the succeeding patriarchs to the times of Moses and Joshua to the battle of Bethhoron, have been described in an earlier article, to which the reader may be referred (MOAICS, p. 1327).

We shall not here enter on the very interesting series of Old Testament pictures contained in early Greek MSS., such as that in the Imperial Library at Vienna (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xix.) and the Book of Joshua in the Vatican (ibid. pl. xxviii.), which have been treated of in the article MINIATURE.

OLIVE. This tree appears to be intended among those which surround the mystic Orpheus, or Orpheus-Shepherd. Bottari, tav. lxxviii. Also in tav. cxviii. and tav. cxv. it accompanies the Good Shepherd; at least the trees represented are very like young olives or willows, and in cxv. the olive is clearly drawn. Less attention seems to have been paid to St. Paul's allegory of the olive-tree of the church than might have been expected. The olive-branch is borne by Noah's dove [DOVE], and the sepulchral dove of peace constantly bears it. See a well-marked branch in inscription 91 at p. 60, vol. i. of De Rossi's Inscript. Christianae Urbis Romae. See CROSS, Vol. I. p. 497, for the olive-wreath with the palm. That no certain representation, and only one problematical sketch, of a palm exists in the Utrecht Psalter, seems to disconnect that wonderful document altogether from Alexandria and Egypt. Trees and olive-crowns occur on some of the mixed or Gentile ornaments of the sarcophagi. See, however, Aringhi, i. 311, where a well-carved olive-crown is combined with the monogram; also Parker Phot. 2930, from Lateran Museum. The writer can find no reference in Art to Zechariah's vision of the two olive-trees and candlestick. The vine and palm are generally associated with the Mount of Olives. The great difficulty of representing an olive-tree so as to be easily recognized for what it is may be one reason why it is so seldom attempted. For 12th-century Byzantine olive, see Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. iii. p. 177, and plate iv. vol. iii.

An example is given in the annexed woodcut of olive branches on a sepulchral slab, from Aringhi, R. S. t. ii. p. 644. He gives various reasons for the symbolic use of the tree, but they are rather natural or secular than Scriptural; for example, its fruitfulness, permanent leafage, &c. He does not mention any representations of the whole tree, only of its branches, as borne by Noah's dove, or the sepulchral dove signifying flight into Rest. There is an olive-tree on the celebrated casket of Brescia. (Westwood, Early Christian Sculptures and Ivory Carvings, p. 37.) It seems to the writer that the two trees placed on either side of the Shepherd (Bottari, cxiii. cxvi. cxviii. cxxii., all from the catacombs of SS. Marcellinus and Peter) are intended for olives, and that they may involve allusion to the Hebrew and Gentile church. [R. St. J. T.]

OMENS. It was to be expected that some at least of the superstitions of heathenism would survive in the church. In fact they did survive, and none more vigorously than the observation of omens and portents, which Christianity has never been able to extinguish. Chrysostom laments (Hom. in Galat. i. c. 7, p. 669, Montfauc.) the influence exercised upon the minds of Christians by ethnic superstitions, such as forecasts from chance sounds or expressions (κληρονομισμοί), from the flight of birds (οϊανισμοί), or from other signs (σύμβολα). And again (Catechesis ii. ad Illumin. p. 141) he inveighs strongly against certain superstitious practices of his time, and among them against omens. If, he says, when a man first leaves his door, he meets one who has but one eye, or is lame, he reckons this ominous of evil. This is part of the pomps of Satan; for it is not the meeting a man that makes the day evil, but the spending it in sin. . . . If a man meets a virgin he says, "this will be an unprofitable day with me;" but if he meets a harlot it will be a fortunate day. Augustine (de Doctr. Chr. ii. 20) stigmatises similar superstitions. An omen is drawn, he says, from the throbbing of some part of the body. If, when two friends are walking arm in arm, a stone, or a dog, or a child chance to come between them, they stamp the stone to pieces as a divider of their friendship; nay, they even beat the dog or the innocent child from the same superstition. A man returns to bed if he has sneezed while putting on his shoes; he returns to his house if he has stumbled on going out; he is terrified with the apprehension of future evil if the rats have gnawed his clothes: less wise than Cato, who, when the rats gnawed his boots, said that it was no marvel, but if the boots had gnawed the rats it might have been thought a portent. A kindred superstition is the observation of lucky and unlucky days of seasons against which the same father (Enchiridion, c. 79) also inveighs, as utterly unworthy of a Christian.

OMOPHORION (ὠμοφόριον, ὠμόφορον). The omophorion, as its name implies, is an article of dress worn over the shoulders; and thus we find it as a part of the ordinary female dress. Thus Palladius tells of one Taor, a virgin, who never wished for a new dress, or omophorion, or sandals (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 138; Patr. Gr. xxxiv. 1237). The church at Balcherna was said to possess the omophorion of the Virgin Mary (Leo Grammaticus, Chronographia, p. 241, ed. Bekker).

In its ecclesiastical sense, the word is used to describe an ornament worn by patriarchs, and also by bishops generally in the Greek church. This consists of a long band of woollen material, passing once round the neck, with the ends falling before and behind to the knees or lower, and on it are embroidered crosses. There seems little doubt that it has been a recognised vestment since the 6th century at latest. Thus Isidore of Pelusium, writing early in that century, after speaking of the ὀσθῶν worn by deacons, goes on to dwell on the woollen omophorion worn by bishops, the material being meant to suggest the notion of the lost sheep borne on the shoulders of the Good Shepherd. Therefore it is, he adds, that when in the service the book of the gospels is opened, the bishop lays aside his omophorion as in the presence of the chief Shepherd Himself (Epist. lib. i. 136; Patr. Gr. lxxviii. 272). These words of Isidore are copied almost verbatim by Germanus,^a patriarch of Constantinople in the 8th century (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patr. Gr. xcvi. 396; cf. also Symeon Thessal. de Sacra Liturgia, c. 82, ib. clv. 260). Another early example may be drawn from the life of Chrysostom by Palladius (c. 6; Patrol. Gr. xlvii. 23), where Theophilus of Alexandria is accused of ill-treating a monk named Ammonius, in that he ἐνεῖλε . . . τὸ ὠμοφόριον ἐν τῷ τραχήλῳ οὐκ εἰς χερσὶ, and then beat him about the head.

Again, at the third general council of Constantinople (A.D. 680), in its eighth Actio, in which the heretic Macarius, bishop of Antioch, was on his trial, his views were at length received with cries of "Anathema! rightly let him be deposed from his bishopric, let him be stripped of the omophorion that encircles him" (Labbe, vi. 759). At the fourth general council of Constantinople (A.D. 870) the rule is laid down as to the wearing of the omophorion at the proper time and place by those qualified to wear it (τοῖς ὀρισθέντας ὠμοφορεῖν ἐπισκόπους: can. 14, Labbe, viii. 1376).

In the Byzantine historians, the omophorion is frequently referred to. One example will suffice:—Cedrenus (under twenty-first year of Constantine) tells us how Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, was strangled by the Arians with his own omophorion (vol. i. 529, ed. Bekker).

A confirmation of our statement as to the early use of the omophorion, may be derived from the fact that in the still existing ancient mosaics in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, said to be of the 6th century, are figures of 4th century bishops wearing white vestments with omophoria, on which are coloured crosses (Marriott, Vestiary of Christianity, p. lxxv.).

This being the case, we may at once dismiss the story told by Luitprand (Relatio de Legatione Constant. c. 62; Patrol. cxxxvi. 934), to the effect that even the patriarch of Constantinople only wore the omophorion (here called pallium) by permission of the pope ("scimus, immo videmus, Constantinopolitanum episcopum pallio non uti, nisi sancti patris nostri permisso,"), but that by means of bribes leave was obtained from the Roman usurper Albericus, in whose hands the then pope, John XI. (ob. A.D. 936), completely was, for the patriarch and his successors to wear this ornament, without any further permission being necessary. Hence, adds Luitprand, the custom of wearing the pallium spread from the patriarch of Constantinople to the bishops of the eastern church generally.

Into the question whether the omophorion properly belonged to a prelate of the rank of a patriarch or metropolitan, or merely marked the episcopal order, it is not our purpose to enter. The evidence we have brought forward seems to us to lead strongly to the latter conclusion. The point is discussed at length by Goar (Euchologion, p. 312); reference may also be made to Ducange's Glossarium Græcum, s. v. ὠμοφόριον. [R. S.]

ORACLES. [PAGANISM.]

ORANGE, COUNCILS OF (ARAUSICANA CONCILIA). Two councils are recorded: the first as celebrated for its thirty canons on ecclesiastical discipline, as the second is for its twenty-five decrees on dogma. The first had St. Hilary of Arles for its president, was attended by St. Eucherius of Lyons on behalf of his suffragans, by fourteen other bishops and the representative of a fifteenth who was absent, but no sees are given. It met Nov. 8, 441. Its first canon is remarkable, as permitting presbyters, if a bishop cannot be had, to sign with chrism and benediction heretics in a dying state desiring to be Catholics. The second, which in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection stands first, ordains that nobody that has received power to baptize should ever set out without chrism. Doubtful readings make the remaining clauses obscure, but the highest minister named in this connexion is not the bishop but the priest. The fifth forbids those who have taken sanctuary to be given up. The seventh threatens with ecclesiastical censures any person infringing on the liberties of those who had been formally manumitted in church. The words of the thirteenth are: "amentibus quaecunque pietatis sunt conferenda"; and the next three relate to the possessed by devils. The wording of the seventeenth, "cum capsâ et calix offerendus est; et admixtione eucharistiae consecrandus," is rightly called by Mabillon "obscurissimus" (De Liturg. Gall. i. 5, 19), though its first part is in keeping with our Sarum Missal (Bona, Rev. Lit. ii. 9, 2). Canons eighteen, nineteen, and twenty relate to the treatment of catechumens. Canon twenty-one is directed against two bishops ordaining a third. Canon twenty-two forbids the ordaining married men deacons unless they will undertake to live no longer as such. Canon twenty-six forbids the ordaining deaconesses under any circumstances. Canon twenty-seven indicates how the profession of widowhood is to be made. Canon twenty-eight directs that all of either sex relinquishing their vow of chastity shall be treated as offenders, and subjected to due penance. Canon twenty-nine decrees the observance by all, absent or present, of the canons which have been made; and also that no synod shall separate without fixing where the next is to meet. The last canon enacts that bishops incapacitated from discharging their episcopal duties through any physical ailment, shall not delegate them to presbyters, but get another bishop to undertake them (Mansi, vi. 4, 33-52). The second, A.D. 529, July 3, had St. Caesarius of Arles for its president, and was attended by thirteen other bishops, but no sees are given. And though its decrees are purely dogmatic, eight lay notables say of them in turn: "consensi et subscripsi," like the bishops. St. Caesarius calls them "constitutionem nostram," in subscribing first. But it would be difficult to point out one that is not borrowed word for word from St. Augustine, or from those who followed him in controversy with the Pelagians or semi-Pelagians, against whose various errors they are directed. The first eight, for instance, form eight consecutive dogmas in the work of Gennadius (De Eccl. Dogm. 38-45); the thirteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, and nine-tenths of the twenty-fifth, which is the longest of all, are from the same work (c. 46-51). The Sentences of Prosper, or excerpts by him from the writings of St. Augustine, supply most, if not all, of the remaining. (Mansi, viii. 711-24.) [E. S. Ff.]

^a Ducange (s. v.) states that Germanus distinguishes between the omophorion worn by a patriarch or metropolitan and that worn by an ordinary bishop. The Greek of the passage is certainly somewhat peculiar, and may perhaps be corrupt, but it seems hardly possible to deduce the above inference from it:—τὸ ὠμοφόριον ἐστὶ τοῦ ἀρχιερέως κατὰ τὴν στολὴν τοῦ Ἀρσῶν ἡν περ ἐφόρουσιν οἱ ἐν νόμῳ ἀρχιερεῖς συνδαρίους μακροῖς τὸν εὐώνυμον ὦμον περιτίθεντες κατὰ τὸν ζώνον τῶν ἐντολῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ. Τὸ δὲ ὠμοφόριον δὲ περιβέβηται ὁ ἐπίσκοπος δηλοῖ τὴν τοῦ προβάτου δορὰν . . . Surely the ἀρχιερεῖς merely means a prelate (of whatever kind), as opposed to the priest (ιερεῖς), whose special vestments—sticharion, peritrichelon, girdle, and phenelon—Germanus had just mentioned; and then adds to these an ornament belonging to the higher rank of the ministry, with which he connects a double symbolism.

ORANTI. The figures which bear this name, and are so frequently found in the catacomb frescoes, are generally to be described as male or female forms in the Eastern attitude of prayer.

The former, of course, more frequently represent or symbolize some special personage or character. They are, for the most part, in a standing position, with the arms extended. In some instances, they may be taken as symbolizing the church of believers, but most frequently they appear to be portraits, or rather memorial pictures of the dead. The celebrated one in SS. Saturninus and Thrason—somewhat grand in form and conception, though grotesquely ill-drawn—is seen in its present state in Parker's photographs, 469 and 1470; also in Bottari, tav. 180. Others are on tav. 172, 183, and Aringhi, ii. pp. 76, 79, from SS. Marcellinus and Peter; from St. Agnes, p. 183, and Rohault de Fleury, pl. lxi.; but see infra. Female Orantes are often represented in rich garments, and profusely adorned with necklaces and other jewellery. See photographs 467, 475-6, 1751-2, 1775, 1777, and the mosaics of SS. Oranede and Pudentiana, 1481-2 in Parker. This Martigny (p. 356) rightly explains: "En décorant ainsi leur image, on avait bien moins pour but de retracer aux yeux ce qu'elles avaient été dans la vie, que d'expliquer allégoriquement la gloire dont elles jouissaient dans le ciel." [PARADISE.] Compare Ruskin, Modern Painters, vol. iii. p. 49, for similar treatment of the Blessed Virgin by Francia and Perugino, with comments. For the Virgin Mary as an Orante in the later pictures of the catacombs, see Mr. Hemans's Essay in the Contemporary Review, vol. iii. The late Mr. Wharton Marriott (Evidence of the Catacombs, p. 15) says that he can find, after careful examination, but one Orante, properly so called, in all the catacombs, which can, with any probability, be interpreted as referring to the Virgin Mary. [Compare MARY THE VIRGIN IN ART, p. 1150.]

Orante. Martigny.

For male Oranti, see Aringhi, R. S. t. i. p. 606, ii. p. 259. Birds, sometimes bearing the olive-branch, and typical of the flight away to rest, are in these and other instances added to the youthful figures. For the Orante, as a supposed "companion" to the Good Shepherd, see Evidence of the Catacombs, pp. 12, 13, 17, with references to Dr. Northcote and Bosio.

Martigny quotes (Tertullian, de Orat. xiii.)

that the Pagan custom in prayer was to raise both hands to heaven, "duplices ad sidera palmas;" but Christians only extended the hands—"Ne ipsis quidem manibus sublimius elatis, sed temperate ac probe elatis" (see woodcut, p. 1463). [PRAYER.]

ORARIUM. (1) Besides its technical meaning of a stole, this word is used in the literal sense of a handkerchief, primarily, as the derivation shews, to wipe the face. Jerome, writing to Nepotianus, and dwelling on the proper mean to be shewn in dress, observes, "ridiculum et plenum dedecoris est, referto marsupio, quod sudarium orariumque non habeo gloriari" (Epist. 52, § 9, vol. i. 264). Ambrose uses the word for the napkin bound about the face of Lazarus (de Excessu Fratris sui Satyri, ii. 78; Patrol. xvi. 1396). For further references, see Greg. Turon. (Hist. Franc. vi. 17; de Gloria Martyrum, i. 93; Patrol. lxxi. 389, 787); Prudentius (Peristeph. i. 86). See also Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

(2) See STOLE.

ORATION (FUNERAL). [FUNERAL ORATION; OBSEQUIES.]

ORATIO MISSAE. A part of the Mozarabic liturgy, following next after the offertory, which, though called Oratio, is not, strictly speaking, a prayer, for it is generally cast in the form of a short address or exhortation to the people, reminding them of the particular person or fact commemorated on the day. It is therefore one of the variable parts. Sometimes it is called simply "oration." In the Gallican sacramentaries it is sometimes called "Praefatio Missae" (which must not be confounded with the Preface, commonly so designated), sometimes "Missa." It is a feature peculiar to this family of liturgies. [C. E. H.]

ORATORIUM (1). A stool, or possibly a cushion, on which to kneel at prayer, is so called in the earliest Ordo Romanus, supposed to have been compiled about 730. Thus, "The fourth in the choir precedes the pontiff, that he may set the oratorium before the altar" (§ 8; Mus. Ital. ii. 8; compare § 34; p. 22; § 35; p. 23; App. § 8; p. 35).

(2). We are told by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, A.D. 870, who may be taken as a good witness to things existing in his day, though we cannot depend on his account of their origin, that Hilary of Rome, A.D. 461, made three "oratories" in the baptistery of the basilica of Constantine, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, St. John the Evangelist, and the Holy Cross severally, "all of silver and precious stones," and that "in the oratory of the Holy Cross he made a CONFESSION, where he placed the wood of the Lord, with a golden cross gemmed, weighing 20 pounds." All three oratories had gates, the two former of brass with silver locks or bolts (argento clusas), the last of "purest silver" (Vitae Pont. n. 47). The oratories of the Baptist and evangelist also had confessions, but we are not told what was in them. We may assume, however, from the ordinary use of the confession, that they contained supposed relics of those saints; and this is confirmed by the fact that a supposed fragment of the true cross was put in the confession of the third. Several "oratoria" of the same materials, dedicated to SS. Thomas, Apollinaris, Sosius, John the Baptist, John the Evangelist, and to the Holy Cross, are said to have been given by Symmachus, A.D. 498, to the basilicas of St. Andrew and St. Peter. They all had confessions, and in the confession of the last was also "lignum Domini" (ibid. n. 52). Now here, we appear to have the description of a miniature chapel, i.e. of a shrine or tabernacle at which the people were invited to pray, on the same grounds as in a larger oratory, viz. its dedication, and possession of relics. Such larger oratories, with the entire bodies of martyrs or others under their confession, were frequent in the large churches of Rome [see (3) below]; and the small fabrics of precious metal of which we have now treated, appear to have been made in imitation of them.

I. The Greek historians, though commonly using ἐκκλησία, often gave these descriptive names to churches. Thus Eusebius (Hist. x. 3; comp. de Laud. Constant. 17) says that, when peace was given to the church, "there were feasts of dedication in every city, and consecrations of newly-built oratories" (προσευκτηρίων), and that the emperor adorned the city named after him "with many oratories" (εὐκτηρίους) (de Vita Const. iii. 48). Socrates (Hist. i. 18), that Constantine ordered "an oratory" (οἶκον εὐκτηρίων) to be built under Abraham's oak, and "another church" (ἐτέραν ἐκκλησίαν) at Heliopolis (ibid.). We are not aware that the Latin "oratorium" was ever used, as εὐκτηρίων, &c., were, to denote a church with full privileges.

II. A "memoria" or sepulchral chapel built over the remains or some relic of an eminent Christian, or it might be only to perpetuate his name and do him honour, but at the same time used for prayer, was called an oratory. The following are examples both from the East and West. Sozomen (Hist. ix. 2) tells us that an oratory (οἶκος εὐκτηρίος) was constructed under ground, so as to enclose the remains of certain presbyters, and a house built over it in which was a secret descent to it. Theodore says that "they built many enclosures for prayer (σηκούς εὐκτηρίους) to Marcian" (Hist. Relig. in Marc. iii.). They placed the abbat Thomas in a tomb, and "built a small oratory over him" (John Moschus, Prat. Spirit. 88). The foregoing, it will be observed, are instances in which the oratory has no immediate connexion with a church.

III. Many, however, belonging to the last century of our period, were so connected, being built either (1) within, or (2) on to the church itself, or (3) in close proximity to it.

(1) John VII. A.D. 705, "made an oratory of the holy mother of God inside the church of the blessed apostle Peter" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 87), before the altar, in which oratory he was himself buried. Gregory III., A.D. 731, "made an oratory within the same basilica, by the principal arch on the men's side," in which he deposited relics (ibid. n. 91). The same pope enlarged a basilica "in which there were previously diaconia and a small oratory" (ibid.). In the life of Hadrian, 772, we read that he "made in the church of the blessed Peter, through the several oratories, silver canistra, twelve in number" (ibid. n. 97). In that of Leo III. 795, mention is made of "the oratory of St. Stephen in St. Peter, which is called the Greater" (ibid. 98).

For small shrines or tabernacles within a church, also called oratories, see (2).

(2) Many oratories were built against churches with an entrance into them, or placed within buildings (as porches, vestries, baptisteries) connected with churches. These were the early form of the side-chapel and chantry, afterwards so common (see Muratori, Dissert. xvii. in S. Paulini Poenata). Anastasius Bibliothecarius tells us that Sergius I., A.D. 687, restored all the cubicular round (in circuitu) the basilica of the blessed apostle St. Paul" (Vitae Pont. n. 85), and those attached "circumquaque" to St. Peter's (ibid.). That by "cubacula" we are to understand oratories is evident from the same author's account of Symmachus, A.D. 498; in which, after enumerating several "oratories" built by him, he immediately adds, "All which cubacula he built up complete from the foundation" (ibid. n. 52). St. Paulinus, too, A.D. 393, added "cubacula" to his church at Nola, "inserted in the longer walls of the basilica" (Epist. 32 § 12), which were intended, as he expressly says (ibid.), for the private use of persons "praying or meditating on the law of the Lord" (Ps. i. 2), as well as for memorials of the departed. Elsewhere (Poema, 27, l. 395; comp. 19, l. 478), he speaks of them; and of those whom the desire to pray had attracted to them. That these oratories opened into the church, appears from the fact that a thief, who had concealed himself in one of them, escaped when the door of the church was unlocked in the morning (Poema 19, l. 480).

(3) There is also frequent mention of oratories near a church, and belonging to it, but not part of the same structure. Such appears to have been one at Tours in the 6th century, viz. "Oratorium atrii beati Martini." (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Martyrum 15.) At Rome in the 8th there was an oratory of St. Leo, "securus fores introitus Sanctae Petronillae." (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 95.) Theodore, A.D. 642, built one "foris portam beati Pauli Apostoli" (ibid. n. 74). This position appears to have been common at Rome; for the earliest Ordo Romanus, in giving directions for striking the light on Maundy Thursday [See LIGHTS, CEREMONIAL USE OF, § v.] orders it to be done "in a place outside the basilica; but if they have no oratory there, then they strike it in the doorway there." (§ 32; Mus. Ital. ii. 21.)

IV. The name of "Oratory" was given to different parts of the interior of a church. Thus, in a law of Theodosius, the nave is called "the people's oratory" (ἐκκλησίον τοῦ λαοῦ Epist. Theod. et Valentin. Codex Theodos. ix. 45; tan. 3, p. 366). Compare the expression τὸν ἐκκλησίον ναόν, denoting a part, expressly distinguished from the bema and the narthex (ibid. l. 4; p. 364). In the West, the word has been used to denote the choir of a church. A bishop of Mans is said to have taken great pains in the construction of the "upper parts" of a new church, "oratorium scilicet quod chorum vocitant, sedemque pontificalem," &c. (Act. Pontif. Genom. 34; Mabill. Anal. Vct. 312, ed. 1723).

V. (1) Every monastery, whether of men or women, had its oratory. Thus St. Augustine, writing in 423 to women: "Let no one do in the oratory anything but that for which it was made, and from which it has received its name." (Epist. 211, ad Sanctimon. § 7). Sim. in the Regula ad Servos Dei, adapted from this, § 3. Cassian about the same time, of the monks in the East: "He who at terce, sext, or none, has not come to prayer before the psalm which has begun is over, does not venture to enter further into the oratory" (De Coenob. Inst. iii. 7). In the rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530, the word occurs frequently, e.g., "Oratorium hoc sit, quod dicitur" (c. 52).

(2) The oratories in monasteries of women had no priests attached to them until the beginning of the 5th century, and the practice seems to have spread somewhat slowly. They were publicly professed in church, and attended it regularly in a body, a part, spoken of as enclosed, being assigned to them. These facts are proved by the following testimonies. St. Basil, Epitimia in Canonicas, 17; ii. 531; St. Ambrose, de Lapsu Virg. v. § 19; Palladius, Hist. Ambros. 138. St. Jerome, when describing (in 404) the life of those in the house founded by Paula, says that "only on the Lord's day did they go out to the church, by the side of which they dwelt" (Epist. 108, ad Eustoch. § 19). Elsewhere, in 414, he implies that members of a female community went "ad loca religionis," and says that he "knew some who kept at home on festivals because of the concourse of the people" and its attendant evils (Ep. 130, ad Demetr. § 19). On the other hand, the community to which St. Augustine writes in 423 (if the epistle be wholly from his hand), though not confined to their house (Epist. 211, ad Sanctim. § 10), had a priest who celebrated, we may presume, in the oratory which Augustine mentions (§ 7).

(3) The houses of charity so numerous in the early church [HOSPITALS] were all under the management of the clergy or attached to monasteries; and there is evidence that some, and a probability that many, of them had their own oratories. For example, it is recorded of Leo III., A.D. 795, that he gave certain ornaments to the "oratory of the holy mother of God in the xenodochium at Firmi" (Anast. B. Vitae Pont. n. 98; pp. 130, 6), to the oratories in three other xenodochia at Rome, dedicated severally to St. Lucy, St. Cyrus, and SS. Cosmas and Damian (ibid. 139), and to "the oratory of St. Peregrine, which is placed in the hospital of the Lord at Naumachia" (ibid.).

VI. (1) Chapels under the name of oratories were often attached to episcopal palaces. E.g., in the Life of John the Almoner by Leontius (c. 38), we read, "Facit missas in oratorio suo" (Rosweyde, 199). Gregory the Great says of Cassius of Narni, that a little before his death "in episcopii oratorio missas fecit" (Hom. 37, de Evang.). Gregory of Tours, 573, consecrated "cellulam valde elegantem," which had been the buttery of his palace, for an oratory, and removed to it relics of SS. Martin, Saturnius, and Julian (de Glor. Conf. 20). It was "infra domum ecclesiasticam urbis Turonicae" (Vitae P.P. ii. 3). Pope Theodore, 642, "fecit oratorium beato Silvestro intra episcopium Lateranense" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 74), i.e., in the palace which Constantine was said to have given to the see in the time of Melchiades (Labbe, Conc. i. 1530). See also Liber Diurnus Rom. Pontif. v. 10.

(2) Oratories (= domestic chapels) were common in or near the houses of the wealthy. By a law of Justinian they were to be devoted to prayer alone, "We forbid to all the inhabitants of this great city, and much more to all others under our rule, to have oratories (ἐκκλησίους οἰκούς) in their houses, and to celebrate the sacred mysteries therein. . . . But if any simply think it right to have sacred chambers in their houses for the sake of prayer only, and nothing whatever pertaining to the sacred liturgy be performed there, we permit this to them" (Novell. 57). Compare the Carolingian law: "He who has an oratory in his house may pray there. But let him not presume to celebrate the sacred masses therein without the license of the bishop of the place." The punishment was to be the confiscation of the house and excommunication (Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 383; comp. v. 102, and Capit. Ingilheim. 826, c. 6, &c.). The council in Trullo, 691, orders the clergy who serve in oratories in a house, to do it under the rule of the bishop (can. 31). Another canon (59) says, "Let not baptism be on any account celebrated in an oratory within a house." In the West, the council of Agde, 505 (can. 21), orders that "if any of the clergy chose to celebrate or attend masses on festivals (Easter, Christmas, &c., had been named) in the oratories (unless the bishop order or permit it), they be driven from communion." A canon of Theodulf of Orleans, 797, shews that this rule had been relaxed by time: "Let not the priests on any account celebrate masses in the oratories, except with such precaution before the second hour that the people be not withdrawn from the public celebrations" (can. 46; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1147). In another injunction of the same bishop the rule is extended to suburban monasteries and churches, and the early celebration permitted is to be "foribus reseratis" (Additio altera, Labbe, u. s. 1857), which here can only mean with doors closed (comp. resserré).

(3) Such oratories (often on the homesteads, or attached to the houses of the wealthy) were often unconsecrated, and still more frequently served by priests not submissive to authority. So early as 541 the fourth council of Orleans had to forbid the domini prædiorum to "introduce strange clerks against the wish of the bishop" of the diocese to serve "in the oratories" (can. 7). The council of Châlons, about 650, states that the clergy who served the "oratories in the villis of the powerful" were not allowed by their patrons to submit to the archdeacons (can. 14). The council of Paris, 829 (i. 47), complains that masses were wont to be celebrated in gardens and houses, or at least in "aediculae," which they built near their houses." These are contrasted with "the basilicas dedicated to God," which their builders had forsaken. Presbyters were "compelled" to celebrate in them, and all this "in defiance of episcopal authority." Such an abuse naturally tended to degrade both the character and the position of the clergy. Agobard tells us that the "domestici sacerdotes" were employed as huntsmen and butlers, and in various other servile capacities (De Privilegio et Jure Sacerdotii, 11). To avert such evils, masses were absolutely forbidden by many authorities in all but dedicated churches, as in the Excoptions of Eggbriht, 740 (can. 52); by Charlemagne in 769 (Capit. i. 14), and in 789 (Capit. iii. 9); by Theodulf of Orleans, 797 (Capit. 11); by a council of bishops held at some unknown place in France, 802 (can. 9; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1179); by the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813 (can. 49); and by the council of Aix, in 816. See also Jonas of Orleans, 821 (Instit. Laic. 11, in Spicil. Dach. i. 33), who speaks of the unconsecrated "aediculae" of the rich in terms which the council of Paris seems to have borrowed. We must suppose, however, that during the prevalence of heresy a breach of this rule would have been justified in the West, as we know that it was in the East. Thus, Theodore Studita says (Epist. i. 40, ad Nauoc.), that in that case it was lawful "even to perform the liturgy in an oratory."

Another check was the law that all who built oratoria for more than private prayer should endow them. Gregory I. directed that an oratory built by a nobleman at Firmi should be consecrated, provided that "no human body had been buried there," and that there was a suitable endowment for the cardinal presbyter who was to serve it (Epist. x. 12). He permitted the consecration of another oratory outside the walls of the same city, "percepta primitus donatione legitima;" but ordered that in this case the mass should not be publicly celebrated at the consecration, and that a presbyter cardinalis should not be appointed to serve it, nor a baptistery built in connection with it (Ep. vii. 72). Similarly, Zachary of Rome, writing to Pipin about 743 (Epist. viii. 15). And these restrictions are made conditions in the form of mandate for consecration in the Liber Diurnus (v. 4). Charlemagne enacted generally, that "those who had or wished to have a consecrated oratory, should by the advice of the bishop make a grant out of their property in that same place" (A.D. 803, c. 21; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 401). See also Justinian, Novella, 123, § 18.

Much information on this subject may be found in J. B. Gatticus, de Oratoriis Domesticis, ed. 2, Rom. 1770; Josephus de Bonis, de Oratoriis Publicis, and Fortunatus a Brixia, de Oratoriis Domesticis, both printed by J. A. Assemani (Rome, 1766) as a supplement to the work of Gatticus; Z. B. Van Espen, Jus Eccl. Univ. ii. i. v. 8; J. M. Cavalieri, Comment. in Rit. Congr. Decreta, v. 4, Venet. 1758; and many others. But it should be mentioned that these writers are chiefly concerned with the later history and rights of oratories.

ORATORY. [PREACHING.]

ORDEAL. This article is limited to an account of some of the more notable forms of a superstition very prevalent among christian nations, not only in the first eight centuries, but long afterwards, viz., a belief that on the subjection of an accused person to some extraordinary physical test, supernatural intervention might be expected for the purpose of making known his guilt or his innocence. The pagan origin of one kind of ordeal is referred to under PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF. The following are the more remarkable forms under which it continued to exist, and even became more widely diffused after paganism had been overthrown.

Under the general denomination of JUDICIUM DEI we have

I. The Duel, a form especially prevalent among Teutonic nations. In the year A.D. 500, the code of laws promulgated at Lyons by Gondebald, the Arian king of Burgundy, and known as the Loi Gombette, gave legal sanction to this mode of ordeal. Barbarous as were the times, the preamble of the enactment relating to the subject implies a sense that such a law requires some justification, and this is found in the alleged fact that the morality of the community is at so low an ebb that it is a common practice for individuals to offer evidence on oath with respect to matters of which they have no certain knowledge, or even knowingly to perjure themselves. It is accordingly enacted (with reference apparently to an already existing institution analogous in some respects to the English frithborh of a later period) that whenever a cause of dispute shall have risen, and the party against whom judgment is given shall still deny his obligation to what is demanded of him or his commission of the alleged offence, by a sacramental oath^a (sacramentorum obligatime negaverit), the dispute shall be thus decided: if the party on the side of him to whom the sacramental form of oath has been proffered, shall refuse to make sacramental attestation (noherit sacramenta suscipere), but, confident in the rightfulness of his cause, shall declare themselves able to convince his antagonist by arms, and those of the opposite party refuse to yield, it shall be lawful to decide the dispute by combat ("pugnandi licentia non negetur." It is, however, required that one of the witnesses, of those who had come prepared to make sacramental attestation, shall be a combatant ("Deo judicante configat"); it being right, the law goes on to say, that if any man unhesitatingly affirms his knowledge of a matter in dispute, and proffers his sacramental oath in attestation, he should not hesitate also to fight. Then, if the witness on the side which has offered to take the oath ("testis partis ejus quae obtulerit sacramentum") be vanquished, all the witnesses who had offered to do the same are required forthwith to pay a fine of 300 shillings; but if he who declined to take the oath should be slain, the party of the victor are to be indemnified, as to the mulct, out of the dead man's possessions ("de facultatibus ejus novigildi solutione pars victoris reddatur indennis." Canciani, Barbarorum Leges Antiquae, iv. 25, 26).

This formal sanction of duelling confirmed the custom; and both among the Franks and the Lombards a similar recognition was extended to it by legislation. The code of Rotharis (A.D. 643), king of the latter nation, opposed it as one form of superstition to repress another, in directing that any man bringing the accusation of witchcraft against a freedwoman (calling her "striga, quod est maxa"), should be compelled to make good his charge in single fight,—"si perseveraverit, et dixerit se probare posse, tunc per Campionem caussa, id est per pugnam, ad Dei judicium decernatur" (Canciani, i. 79). The character of Luitprand, who reigned over the Lombards A.D. 713–735, is illustrated by his superiority to this superstition. He says that he hears that many are defeated in the duel, although theirs is notoriously the juster cause, but confesses his inability to repeal an "impious law," sanctioned by the custom of the race. The utmost he could do was to direct that the party defeated in conflict should not therewith lose his whole substance, but be allowed to make a composition,—"sicut antea fuerit lex componendi. Quia incerti sumus de judicio Dei; et multos audivimus per pugnam sine justa caussa suam causam perdere. Sed propter consuetudinem gentis nostrae Longobardorum legem impiam vetare non possumus." Luitprandi Leges, iv. 65; ib. i. 127.

The advance of education and general enlightenment under Charles and his son Lewis, seems to have in no way checked this superstitious practice. In the year 809, at the council of Aachen, the same mode of proving his innocence is conceded to a criminal found guilty of a capital offence (Pertz, Legg. i. 155), and a distinct article (art. 25) of the same capitulary, forbids that any shall venture to call in question the validity of such a test, "ut omnes judicio Dei credant absque dubitatione" (ibid. i. 157). A capitulary of the year 819 permits those accused of theft to vindicate their honour in a contest with their accuser, to be fought "scuto et fuste" (Baluze, i. 782). The single combat between counts Bera and Sanila, in the reign of Lewis the Pious, of which a minute description is given by Ermoldus Nigellus (book iii. v. 550–638), is perhaps the most notable instance to be met with at our period.

The voice of the most enlightened churchmen was not unfrequently, though vainly, raised against this kind of ordeal. "Purgation," or the formal proof of innocence, is described by ecclesiastical writers as of two kinds, "canonica" and "vulgaris"—the former being by "sacramentum et juramentum," that is by sacramental and simple oath, the latter by the duel, hot or cold water, &c.—methods to which Agobard refers as devices of men, "hominum adinventio," and which Ivo of Chartres denounces as a law for which no sanction can be claimed, "nulla sanctione fulta lex" (Migne, Patrol. clxii. 37). We learn from the former writer that Avitus, bishop of Vienne in the 6th century, in a conversation with king Gondebald, strongly condemned the duel as a method of deciding personal disputes. (Migne, civ. 125.)

But while the voice of the church appears to have been generally raised against the duel as a barbarous and inequitable test, inasmuch as superior physical powers, or skill in the use of weapons, thus became the real criterion of right and wrong, the religious superstition of the age favoured the resort to other methods, which appealed to the belief in the miraculous. One of the earliest instances of this kind^b is that ^a I.e. an oath to which it was supposed additional solemnity was imparted by the person to whom the oath was administered touching at the same time the relics of a saint or a cross (in later times a crucifix), or a copy of the Gospels.

^b The different forms of ordeal referred to in connexion with the miracles of St. Alban in the 3rd century, e.g. ordeal by hot water, the trial of relics by fire, Bibliomancy, &c., probably point to the essentially unhistoric character of the whole tradition (see Hardy, Introd. i) Descript. Catalogue, I. ii. p. xxxiv).

recorded by Gregory of Tours, of Simplicius, a bishop in the first half of the 4th century. Simplicius was accused of adultery, and both he and the woman implicated in the charge vindicated themselves by taking live coals in the folds of their garments, and holding them there for nearly an hour, their garments remaining uninjured (de Gloria Conf. c. 76; Migne, lxxi. 967). Among other and more common forms of ordeal was—

II. The Ordeal of Hot or Cold Water.—Both of these methods were sanctioned by ecclesiastical authority. Among the Formule Veteres Exorcismorum (see Baluze, Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 639; Bouquet, Scriptores, iv. 597), there is given a form of exorcism used on the employment of either test. In that of ordeal by hot water, the two parties in the dispute repaired to the neighbouring church; there they knelt down, while the priest recited a prescribed form of prayer. Mass was then celebrated, and the two presented their alms and received the holy communion, having previously been solemnly adjured if in any way participant in or cognizant of the alleged crime not to communicate. Then mass was performed, after which the priest proceeded to the appointed place of ordeal, bearing with him the gospels and the cross; he then chanted a short litany, and finally pronounced the following exorcism over the water before it was heated: "I exorcise thee, thou creature water in the name of God the Father Omnipotent, and in the name of Jesus Christ His Son, our Lord, that thou mayest become exorcised water, to put to flight all powers of the enemy and every phantasm of the devil; so that if this man, now about to put his hand in thee, be innocent of this fault of which he is accused, the compassion ["pietas"] of Almighty God shall deliver him. But if, which may God forbid, he be guilty, and shall have dared presumptuously to put his hand in thee, may the power of the same Almighty One condescend to declare this concerning him, so that all may fear and tremble before the holy and glorious name of our Lord, who lives and reigns ever One God throughout all ages." When the water had been raised to boiling heat, the accused recited the Lord's Prayer, made the sign of the cross, and then drew from the vessel containing the water a heavy stone, previously placed therein by the presiding judge.

The severity of this form of ordeal seems to have given it the preference in cases where the accused was of the servile class. In the year 816, a capitulary of Lewis the Pious directs that slaves accused of homicide shall submit to this test, in order that it may be made apparent whether they had designedly slain their victims, or done so only in self-defence. If the slave's hand exhibited marks of injury from the ordeal, he was to be put to death (Baluze, i. 177; see also 1251).

The method of procedure at the ordeal of cold water was similar; but here the difficulty was reversed; for while, in the former method, it consisted in escaping injury, in this it was almost impossible to obtain a conviction. The accused was only held guilty if he or she floated on the surface, the element having been previously adjured by the priest to refuse to receive him or her if really criminal (non suscipiat te aqua incredulum aut seductum). A deviation from this method is recorded by Gregory of Tours, on an occasion when a woman accused of adultery was flung into the Rhone, with heavy stones fastened round her neck; she, however, invoked the aid of St. Genesis, and was miraculously borne along on the surface of the current, and her innocence established (de Gloria Mort. c. 70; Migne, lxxi. 799). But the former method was undoubtedly the more common though in the opinion of Le Brun (Hist. critique p. 467), it was not recognised by law before the 9th century, when pope Eugenius II. gave his sanction to its employment (Migne, cxxix. 985-7). Lewis the Pious, on the other hand, in a capitulary of Aachen of the year 829, ordered it to be discontinued (Baluze, i. 668), though not, probably, with the view of abolishing a superstitious practice (for other forms of ordeal were still resorted to), but, as Muratori has pointed out, because it practically amounted to an evasion of justice.

III. Judicium Crucis, otherwise known as Stare ad Crucem.—In this mode of ordeal, the accused and his accuser lifted their arms to a horizontal position, so that the entire body of each represented the figure of a cross. Then some chapters from the Gospels, or a portion of the church services, were read aloud, and he who, from fatigue, was first compelled to let fall his arms was held to be defeated. Herchenrad, bishop of Paris in A.D. 771, having become involved in a dispute with a monastic body, offered to submit the question at issue to this test, and was victorious (Muratori, Dissert. in Antiq. Ital. Medii Aevi, vol. iii.).

A capitulary of Charles the Great of the year 799, directs that persons accused of perjury shall "stand cross-fashion" ("stent ad crucem," Pertz, Legg. i. 37). Another of the year 803, directs that if the prosecutor of a freeman who is unable to pay a fine, refuses to receive the "sacramenta" of twelve men in evidence of such inability, then the dispute shall be settled either "by the cross" or by a duel fought with clubs and shields (Baluze, i. 397). Similarly, in the year 806 a decree of the same emperor enjoins that in disputes respecting boundaries, "the will of God and the truth of the matter" shall be ascertained "judicio crucis" (ibid. i. 444). [MORTIFICATION, p. 1320.]

IV. The Ordeal of Hot Iron.—This consisted either in drawing a bar of iron from a furnace with the naked hand, or in walking over heated ploughshares with naked feet—modes denoted by the expressions, "judicium calefacere," "judicium portare," where judicium is equal to ferum. It is prescribed as a method of self-vindication from the charge of manslaughter in the code of Luitprand, king of the Lombards, "et si negaverit ipsum occidisse ad novem vomeres ignitos ad Judicium Dei examinatos accedat" (Canciani, i. 162). A capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 803, enacts in the case of a man who is accused of having slain a neighbour in defence of his own freedom, but denies the deed, that he shall pass over (accedat) nine fiery ploughshares, to be tested "judicio Dei" (Baluze, i. 389). According to Milman, this mode of ordeal was especially reserved for accused persons of august rank; and he mentions as individuals by whom it was undergone "one of Charlemagne's wives, our own queen Emma, the empress Cunegunda" (Lat. Christianity, bk. iii. c. 5).

V. The Ordeal of Swallowing Food.—It was believed that bread and cheese, administered with due prescribed solemnities to an accused person, would infallibly choke him if he knowingly perjured himself (Muratori, u. s.).

The most remarkable and elaborate protest against this superstition, in all its forms, was undoubtedly that contained in a treatise by Agobard, bishop of Lyons in the 9th century, who, about the year 830, composed a treatise contra damnablem opinionem putantium divinū iudicii veritatem igne, vel aquis, vel conflictu armorum pateberi (Migne, civ. 250). This remonstrance produced no small effect in its own day; and Palgrave (Hist. Normandy and England, i. 241) ascribes the prohibition of the water-ordeal at the synod of Worms, A.D. 1076, to its influence. Agobard relied mainly on Scripture for his arguments. He was, however, opposed by Hincmar, who in his manifesto (de Divortio Lotharii et Tetbergae) upheld the system, especially the water-ordeal. He maintained, that where faith was really present in the hearts of those who conducted or submitted to these tests, the result was an infallible declaration of the divine will; only doubt and vacillation would deprive it of its efficacy (Migne, cxxvi. 171).

The belief had, indeed, taken too strong a hold of the church to be readily dispelled by mere argument; and in England, nearly a century later, we find the forms II. and IV. referred to and sanctioned with considerable circumstantiality. The language, however, is calculated to suggest that, either through fraud or connivance, these tests had been often successfully evaded, and that the physical injury likely to be sustained was but trifling (Brompton, Chronicon; in Twysden, Scriptores, p. 856). Even so late as the 11th century, these practices still prevailed in the church. Ivo, of Chartres, when writing to Hildebert, bishop of Mans, respecting an accusation brought against one Gislandus, a priest, deems it necessary to give special instructions that none of the above tests shall be resorted to (Migne, clxii. 37). Compare MISSA (10), p. 1200.

I. NAMES FOR ORDERS AND COLLECTIVE NAMES FOR THE CLERGY.—1. Ordo.—This is the earliest and most general Latin word; first found in Tertull. de Ehort. Cast. c. 7, "differentiam inter ordinem et plebem constituit ecclesiae auctoritas," usually with a defining epithet; o. ecclesiasticus, Tertull. de Monog. c. 11; de Idol. c. 7; 1 Conc. Carth. c. 1; o. clericalis, e.g. S. Leon. M. Epist. 6 (4), c. 3, vol. i. p. 620; Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 2; o. sacer, e.g. S. Leon. M. Epist. 4 (3), vol. i. p. 612; S. Greg. M. Epist. iv. 26. The word ordo in this sense was probably transferred from Roman civil life, in which it was the ordinary designation of the governing body of both a municipality and a collegium. (a) Of the senate of a provincial town, o. mutinensis, Tac. Hist. ii. 52; o. Berytiorum, Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions d'Asie Mineure, No. 1847 a; o. splendidissimus Thagastensium, Renier, Inscr. Rom. d'Algérie, No. 2902, and frequently in the Corpus Juris, e.g. Dig. 50, 9, 3. Even so late as the end of the 6th century Gregory the Great, writing to the civil as well as to the ecclesiastical authorities of Ariminum, uses "ordo" for the former, "clerus" for the latter (Epist. i. 58); so also at Naples (id. Epist. ii. 6). (b) Of the officers of a collegium, e.g. Orelli-Henzen, No. 4054 (=Grut. 1077), No. 4115 (=Grut. 391, 1). (It is uncertain whether the addition of "sacer" to "ordo" is meant to distinguish the ecclesiastical from the civil use of the word, or whether it was not simply a continuation of a civil use, e.g. ἡ ἐπὶ σύγκλητος of the Roman senate, C. I. No. 2715; ἱερὰ σύνοδος of a meeting of theatrical artists, Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions d'Asie Mineure, No. 1619.) But it became more common, especially in later times, to use ordines in the plural: ordines ecclesiastici, Tertull. de Exhort. Cast. c. 13; o. sacri, probably first in Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 3; S. Greg. M. Moral. lib. xxiii. c. 25, p. 756, Hom. in Evang. lib. ii. hom. 39, c. 6, p. 1648, and frequently afterwards. (For the later restriction of the phrase to bishops, presbyters, and deacons [and sub-deacons], see below.) In this sense "ordo" and "ordines" were used not of church officers only, but (cf. κλήρος below) of any "estate" of men or women in the church. S. Hieron. in Esai. lib. v. c. 19, 18, speaks of "fideles" and "catechumeni" as forming two of the five "ecclesiae ordines." S. Greg. M. Moral. lib. xxiii. c. 20, p. 1065, says that the church consists of three orders, "conjugatorum, videlicet, continentium, atque rectorum"; id. Hom. in Ezech. lib. ii. hom. 4, c. 5, p. 1344, speaks of the same three orders as "praedicantium, continentium, atque bonorum conjugum," cf. ibid. lib. ii. hom. 7, c. 3, p. 1378; so, much later, Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 2: "tres sunt ordines in ecclesia laicorum, clericorum, et monachorum." In earlier times, Optatus, de Schism. Donat. lib. ii. c. 46, had avoided the ambiguous use of ordo by the use of a less technical phrase: "quatuor genera capitum in ecclesia, episcoporum, presbyterorum, diaconorum, et fidelium;" so in later times, intermediate between the earlier phrase, "ordo martyrum, virginum," &c., and the subsequent "omnes martyres, virgines," &c., is "chorus martyrum, virginum," &c.

2. Κλήρος, κληρικοί, clerus, clerici.—(a) Κλήρος is first found in the plural = ordines in the sense spoken of in the preceding paragraph, in 1 Peter v. 3, where τῶν κλήρων is evidently identical with τοῦ ποιμνίου. Hence, even so comparatively late as the beginning of the 5th century, laymen, as well as church officers, are spoken of as constituting a κλήρος (λαϊκὸς κλήρος, Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 20, Migne, P. G. vol. xxxiv. 1059 = λαϊκὸν τάγμα, Conc. Nicaen. c. 5). Probably its first use in the singular of the collective body of church officers is in Clem. Alex. Quis div. salv. c. 42, p. 948, ed. Pott. (=Euseb. H. E. iii. 23), of St. John at Ephesus; Tertull. de Monog. c. 12. Afterwards frequent in both Greek and Latin, e.g. in the fathers, S. Cyp. Epist. 2, vol. ii. p. 224; S. Petr. Alex. Epist. Canon. c. 10, S. Basil. Epist. 240 (192); in canon law, e.g. Conc. Illib. A.D. 306, c. 80; 1 Conc. Carth. c. 6; Conc. Nicaen. c. 1, 14; in the Const. Apost. e.g. ii. 43; in civil law, e.g. Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, c. 40 (39), 9. Of the clerical office in the abstract, probably first in Origen, Hom. in Hierem. 11, c. 3, vol. iii. p. 189. In the plural of the clergy of different churches, Hippol. Ref. Haeres. ix. 12, ed. Duncker, p. 460; S. August. Enarr. in Ps. lxxvii. c. 19, vol. iv. p. 824. Occasionally distinguished from ordo, S. Greg. M. Epist. i. 58, 68; and also combined with it, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 13, "omnis ecclesiastici ordinis clerus." Karlomanni, Capit. Liftin. A.D. 743, § 1, ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 18. The original meaning of κλήρος in this sense, though mistaken by mediaeval writers, hardly admits of dispute. The word was the ordinary Hellenistic designation of a rank or class; it is so used (1) in non-ecclesiastical late Greek, e.g. Epict. Diss. i. 18, 21; Lucian, Hermot. c. 40; Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions, No. 1257; (2) in Judaeo-Christian Greek, e.g. Test. xii. Patr. Levi, 8; Orac. Sibyll. vii. 138; (3) in early patristic Greek, e.g. S. Iren. adv. Haer. i. 27, 1; iii. 3, 3; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 1, p. 650, ed. Pott.; Euseb. H. E. v. 1 (letter of the churches of Vienne and Lyons). There is a trace, but not more than a trace, of the use of the word in reference to the governing body of a θιασος, or Greek religious association; but there is no room in modern philology for the quaint fancy of Jerome that the clergy derive their collective name from Deut. x. 9, xviii. 2; Ps. xvi. 5, lxxiii. 26: "propterea vocantur clerici vel quia de sorte Domini vel quia ipse Dominus sors, id est, pars clericorum est" (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 (2) ad Nepot. c. 5; cf. S. Ambros. de Fuga Saec. ii. 17, vol. i. p. 420), or for that of Augustine: "et cleros et clericos hinc appellatos puto . . . quia Matthias sortem electus est" (S. August. Enarr. in Ps. lxxvii. c. 19, vol. iv. p. 824). The prevalence of these explanations in later times is probably due to their having been copied by Isidore of Seville, de Eccles. Off. ii. 1, 1, and thence into most mediaeval textbooks. (b) Κληρικοί, clerici, probably first in S. Cyp. Epist. 40, c. 3, vol. ii. p. 334; Epist. 66, c. 2, vol. ii. p. 399; S. Alex. Alexandr. Deposit. Arii (Migne, P. G. vol. xviii. 581, and in the Benedictine edition of S. Athanas. vol. i. p. 313); Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 2 (a law of Constantine in A.D. 319), which gives the earliest definition of the word, "qui divino cultui ministeria religionis impendunt, id est, qui clerici appellantur"; S. August. Enarr. in Ps. lxxvii. c. 19, vol. iv. p. 824, whence probably Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Off. ii. 1, 1: "omnes qui in ecclesiastici ministerii gradibus ordinati sunt generaliter clerici nominantur." But sometimes, especially before κληρικοί had become established, periphrases were used to designate the members of the κλήρος, e.g. οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ, Epist. Cuii. ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 28; Conc. Nicaen. c. 3; οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ καταριθμούμενοι, Conc. Chalc. c. 2; οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ καταλεγόμενοι, Conc. Trull. c. 3, 27; οἱ ἐν κλήρῳ κατελεγεμένοι, Conc. Chalc. c. 3; οἱ ἐκ τοῦ κλήρου, Conc. Ancy. c. 3; οἱ ἀπὸ κλήρου, S. Petr. Alex. Serm. de Poenit. c. 10, Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 556.

3. τάξις, τάγμα (= Latin ordo; cf. Vitruv. i. 2), Conc. Ancy. A.D. 314, c. 14; Conc. Neocaes. c. 1; Justin. Novell. 6, c. 5, usually with a defining epithet, ἡ ἱερατικὴ τ. (τὸ ἱερ. τάγμα), Conc. Laod. c. 3; Justin. Cod. tit. i. lib. 3. 47 (46); Socrat. H. E. vi. 18, vii. 7; Sozom. H. E. i. 23; ἡ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ τ. Conc. Laod. c. 24; Conc. Chalc. c. 6. Also used, like ordo and κλήρος, of any class or rank of persons in the church, e.g. of laymen, Conc. Nicaen. c. 5; Conc. Constantin. c. 6; of monks (ἀσκητῶν), Conc. Laod. c. 24; of catechumens, Conc. Neocaes. c. 5; cf. the Pflavian fragment of Hippolytus in Gallandi, vol. ii. p. 488, where the seven θεῖα τάγματα are prophets, apostles, martyrs, priests, ascetics, holy men, just men.

4. βαθμός, gradus, possibly used from the first in a metaphorical sense, but more probably with reference to the platforms on which the several ranks stood or sat in church; first in 1 Tim. iii.

13; β. τοῦ κλήρου, Epist. Synod. Sardic. ap. S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 37, vol. i. p. 123; β. πρεσβύτερος, S. Greg. Nazianz. Epist. 8 (11), vol. ii. p. 8; Conc. Chalc. c. 29; β. διακονίας, S. Greg. Nyss. de Vita S. Macrin. ap. Migne, P. G. vol. xlv. p. 988; β. ιερατικός, Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, 53 (52); β. ἐπισκοπῆς, Conc. Ephes. c. 1; Conc. Sardic. c. 5; Conc. Chalc. c. 2; apparently of all orders from readers upwards, Conc. Sardic. c. 10, but of the higher orders only in S. Basil. Epist. 3 ad Amphilocho. c. 51, p. 325; εἶτε ἐν βαθμῷ τυγχάνοιεν εἶτε καὶ ἀχειροθετῶ ὑπηρεσία προσκαρτέροιεν; cf. Justin. Novell. 123, c. 4, οἰοῦν ὅτι τε τάγματος ἢ βαθμοῦ, where there may be a similar distinction. Gradus is also sometimes used in distinction from ordo, S. Leon. M. Epist. 1 (6), vol. i. p. 593: "nec in presbyteratus gradu, nec in diaconatus ordine, nec in subsequenti officio clericorum"; 4 Conc. Brac. A.D. 675, c. 7: "qui gradus jam ecclesiasticos meruerunt, id est, presbyteri abbates sive levitae" (are as a rule to be exempted from corporal punishment); but elsewhere "gradus ordinum," Conc. Taurin. A.D. 401, c. 8, or "sacratī gradus," Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 2, or "clericatus gradus," Can. Eccl. Afric. c. 27, or "sacratissimi ordines clericorum," S. Siric. Epist. ad Himer. c. 7, are used of any of the ranks of the clergy.

5. Among other equivalent words which were in use may be mentioned σχῆμα, Justin. Novell. 3, 1; Conc. Nicaen. c. 8 (al. τάγμα); ἀξίωμα, Const. Apost. ii. 28, viii. 1; Conc. Nicaen. c. 8; Conc. Trull. c. 7; ἀξία, Conc. Chalc. c. 2; Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, 42 (41), c. 9; sacri honores, 8 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 7.

6. Several collective names for the clergy are based upon the fact that a list or roll of the clergy was kept in each church; hence οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ καταριθμούμενοι, Conc. Chalc. c. 2; οἱ ἐν κλήρῳ καταλεγόμενοι, id. c. 3; Conc. Trull. c. 3, 27; οἱ ἐν τῷ κανόνι ἐξεταζόμενοι, Conc. Nicaen. c. 16; οἱ ἐν ἱερατικῷ καταλεγόμενοι τάγματι, Conc. Trull. c. 11, 24; οἱ ἐν ἱερατικῷ καταλόγῳ, id. c. 5; rarely, κανονικοί, S. Cyrill. Hieros. Procatech. c. 4, p. 4; S. Basil. Epist. 1 ad Amphilocho. c. 6, where, however, it is probably feminine, though interpreted by Balsamon and Zonaras as masculine (so Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 614).

II. INTERNAL ORGANIZATION OF THE CLERGY (i.e. grades and divisions of orders).—It is clear from the use of the designations οἱ προϊστάμενοι (1 Thess. v. 12), οἱ ἡγούμενοι (Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24), οἱ προηγούμενοι (Clem. R. i. 2, 1; Herm. Vis. 3, 9), and also from the use of κλήρος and ordo in the singular, which has been pointed out above, that a distinction was drawn in the earliest period between the governing body of a church and its ordinary members. What were the elements of that governing body, and how far the distinction which was thus created corresponded to the later distinction between clergy and laity, are questions of too great intricacy and uncertainty to be properly discussed here. But side by side with the use of κλήρος and ordo in the singular, which almost passed away with the civil organization from which it was derived, is found, also in early times, their use in the plural to designate, not the governing body, but all "estates" of men or women in the church. In the κατάλογος, or list of members of each church, as in the corresponding lists of the Greek and Roman associations, with which the early churches had much in common, the members were arranged in groups; each of these groups was a κλήρος or "orde"; the number of such groups was not rigidly defined, and the variety which exists in the lists which have come down to us makes it extremely difficult to lay down any general propositions concerning them. The enumeration of orders in the Apostolical Constitutions is probably a relic of such a list. It specifies bishop, presbyters, deacons, readers, singers, doorkeepers, deaconesses, widows, virgins, orphans [laymen] (C. A. ii. 25; viii. 10, 12), but elsewhere there is a shorter enumeration of clerks, virgins, widows [laymen] (iii. 15; cf. viii. 29). The difficulty of determining which of the classes thus enumerated corresponded to the clergy of a later age is increased by the fact that sometimes the members of the clerus seem to have been regarded as identical with the persons whose names were inscribed on the canon, a word which was in ordinary use under the empire, in reference to fixed payments and allowances of provisions (Conc. Nicaen. c. 3, οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ apparently = ibid. c. 16, οἱ ἐν τῷ κανόνι ἐξεταζόμενοι; so in S. Epiphanius. c. Haeres. iii. 1, p. 812, εἰ τινα γὰρ εἶδε τῶν φιλοχρηματούτων τοῦ κλήρου ἢ ἐπισκοπῶν ἢ πρεσβύτερων ἢ ἑτερόν τινα τοῦ κανόνος).^a Of the classes who were thus included in a common list with the church officers, those which survived longest were those of widows and virgins. When the distinction between clergy and laity began to be more sharply drawn, these classes remained for some time on the border-line; and it is an indication of the conservative character of forms of public prayer that the ancient enumeration of orders survived in the missals long after it had ceased to be recognized in conciliar decrees, or by ecclesiastical writers. For example, in bishop Leofric's Exeter missal, in the Bodleian library (A.D. 969), the "ordines" include bishops, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, doorkeepers, confessors, virgins, widows,

^a As the word has been very frequently misunderstood, it may be advisable to trace its several meanings with undoubted instances of their occurrence: it denoted (a) the fixed sum paid by the perpetual occupier of a fundus emphyteuticus, Cod. Theod. 5, 13, 30; 11, 16, 13; (b) the fixed contribution of corn or other produce paid by a province to Rome, hence, e.g., "Canon Aegypti," Vopisc. Vit. Firm. c. 5; (c) the total amount thus contributed and available for distribution in fixed rations among the Roman populace, hence "canon urbis Romae," "canon urbaricus," Cod. Theod. 14, 15, 2, 6; cf. Novell. Majorian. tit. 7, c. 16, ed. Haenel, Novell. Constit. p. 320; Lamprid. Vit. Elagab. c. 27; Spart. Vit. Sever. c. 8; Bulenger, de Vectig. Rom. ap. Graev. Thes. vol. viii. 894; Falconer, ad C. Datum Epist. ap. eund. vol. iv. 1490; Kuhn, Städt. u. bürgerl. Verfassung des Röm. Reichs, i. p. 274 sqq. Hence the double enactment of Conc. Nicaen. c. 16, καθαιρήσεται τοῦ κλήρου καὶ ἀλλότριος τοῦ κανόνος ἔσται, i.e. he will lose not only his rank but his allowance: hence also the importance attached to ἐπιστολαὶ κανονικαί, i.e. letters which entitled the bearer to a fixed allowance in the church to which he travelled. That a similar connotation came to attach itself to the word κατάλογος is clear from Justin. Novell. tit. 3, 2, where the emperor deprecates the formation of δευτέρους καταλόγους by ordaining more than the fixed number for a church, and providing for those so ordained in some extraordinary way.

and all the people of God (fol. 108). But in the meantime, though not uniformly throughout christendom, the distinction between those who held office and those who did not had become sharply accentuated. Between them came those who had taken monastic vows (μάλλον τῷ λαῷ παρά τοὺς ἱερατικούς πλησιάζοντες, S. Dionys. Areop. Epist. viii. ad Demophil. p. 599), the τάγμα τῶν ἀσκητῶν, Conc. Laod. c. 24, or τάγμα τῶν μοναζόντων, S. Basil. Epist. Canon. ii. ad Amphilocho. c. 19. Into this class were merged, not only the ancient orders of widows and virgins, but also that of deaconesses; the former became simple nuns, the latter were more usually abbesses. Hence there came to be only three orders or estates—the “ordo clericalis,” the “ordo monachorum,” and the “ordo laicorum” (Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 2; cf. Hugo de S. Vict. de Sacram. lib. ii. pars 3, c. 14). It may be added that the distinction between monks and clerks was apparently always recognized in the West, e.g. S. Hieron. Epist. 125 (4) ad Rusticum, vol. i. p. 944, “ita vive in monasterio ut clericus esse merearis,” and usually in the East, e.g. S. Cyrill. Alexand. Epist. ad Episc. lib. c. 4; S. Athanas. Epist. ad Dracont. c. 9, vol. i. p. 211; but not always in the East, e.g. Schol. in Nomocan. tit. 1, c. 31, ed. Rallé and Potlé, Athens, 1852, vol. i. p. 71; Balsamon, in Conc. Carth. c. 35, vol. i. p. 357, though elsewhere Balsamon includes among clerks only those monks who had received episcopal ordination, in Conc. Carth. c. 6, vol. i. p. 119; in Conc. Trull. c. 77, vol. i. p. 247.

But even if the term “orders” be limited, as it will be limited in what follows, to the “ordo clericalis” in its later sense, there is great diversity of use in regard to the persons whom it denotes. No two periods and no two churches altogether agree as to the grades into which the clergy were to be divided, or as to the offices which created a difference of grade in distinction from those which were merely differences of function between persons of the same grade. A complete account of this diversity of use would be considerably beyond our present limits; but the following incomplete account will give the leading facts in regard to (1) the grades which were at various times recognised, (2) the groups into which those grades were divided.

(1) Grades of Orders (gradus ordinum, Conc. Taurin. A.D. 401, c. 8).—1. Bishops, presbyters, deacons.—Without here entering into the question of the primitive distinction between bishops and presbyters [see PRIEST], there is no doubt that from the end of the 2nd century these three grades were generally if not universally found, and even so late as the 4th century they are sometimes treated as comprising all the clergy; e.g. in the synodical letter of the council of Antioch in reference to Paul of Samosata, Euseb. H. E. vii. 30, “bishops, and presbyters, and deacons, and the churches of God;” so S. Cyrill. Hieros. Catech. 16, 22, p. 256, bishops, presbyters, deacons [monks, virgins, laymen], and even much later Suidas, p. 2120 c, defines κληρὸς as τὸ σύστημα τῶν διακόνων καὶ πρεσβυτέρων. (The later tendency to treat bishops as not being a separate order, but as constituting with presbyters the “ordo sacerdotum,” Conc. Trident. sess. xxiii. c. 2; Catech. Rom. ii. 7, 26, may be either a survival from the earlier time in which, whatever may have been the distinction between them, bishops and presbyters together formed the “ordo ecclesiasticus,” or an exaltation of the conception of the priesthood; the latter seems to be the view of a 15th century pontifical in the library of St. Geneviève at Paris (B. B. l. 50, fol. xiv.), “episcopatus non est ordo sed sacerdotii culmen et apex atque tronus dignitatis.”) 2. The earliest addition to these three grades (there is no certain evidence of its primitive coexistence with them) appears to have been that of readers. The four grades of bishop, presbyter, deacon, and reader form the nucleus of every organization in both East and West, and they are sometimes the only grades which are recognized, e.g. Tertull. de Praescript. Haeret. c. 41; Διὰτ. Κλήμεντος, ap. Lagarde, Jur. Eccl. Reliq. p. 74, Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 84; Conc. Sardic. c. 10; S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xlii. c. 11, p. 756; Conc. Ephes. Act. i. cap. 23. The only churches which have preserved the order of bishops without retaining that of readers are probably those of England and Abyssinia (Ludolf, Historia Aethiopica, Append. pp. 306, 320). 3. The complex character of the duties of deacons caused them to be divided, and a new order of assistant-deacons (ὑποδιάκονοι, subdiaconi; ὑπηρέται, ministri) was recognised; among the earliest instances of such a recognition are S. Cyp. Epist. 24, vol. ii. p. 287; Const. Apost. viii. 11, 12, 20; Conc. Illib. c. 30; Neocaes. c. 10; Laod. c. 22, 43; Sozom. H. E. i. 23; Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 7. The five grades of bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, and reader are apparently the only grades recognized in S. Joann. Damasc. Dial. c. Manich. c. 3, vol. i. p. 431; S. Sym. Thessal. de Sac. Ordin. c. 156, p. 138 (but id. de Divino Templo. c. 26, 27, 30, p. 275, omits subdeacons); they became the ordinary grades of the Greek, Coptic, and Nestorian churches (see Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, 1; Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. i. pp. 118, 122; but the Scholiast in Rallé and Potlé's edition of the Councils, vol. i. p. 71, states that the current practice agreed with the Nomocanon in also recognizing the order of singers; the Copts and Nestorians also subdivided the higher orders as mentioned below). 4. Sometimes the order of readers was subdivided so as to make a separate order of singers, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 19; Nomocanon, tit. i. c. 31; the subdivision has remained in the Syrian churches, both Jacobite and Maronite, who, however, also subdivide the higher orders as mentioned below. Sometimes when singers are recognized the order of subdeacons is omitted, Const. Apost. viii. 10, and some MSS. of Can. Apost. 69. 5. Sometimes doorkeepers were added as a separate order, Justin. Novell. 3 praef.; but ibid. c. 1, § 1, doorkeepers are distinguished from clerks; similarly in Const. Apost. ii. 25 doorkeepers are mentioned, whereas ibid. viii. 10, they are omitted; so in the Nestorian canons of the patriarch John, circ. A.D. 900, ap. Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. cap. 6, can. 11, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 117: “de omnibus ordinibus, sacerdotum et clericorum atque ostiariorum.” They are also mentioned in the canons of the Alexandrian church, wrongly attributed to St. Athanasius, but are not recognized in the later Alexandrian (Coptic) ordinals, nor in other eastern churches. 6. Sometimes exorcists are added, the eight orders of bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, exorcist, reader, singer, doorkeeper, being enumerated, Conc. Laod. c. 24. They are mentioned as members of the clerus by St. Cyprian, Epist. 16; but they are apparently excluded in Const. Apost. viii. 25, and though sometimes mentioned, e.g. by Greg. Barhebraeus, Nomocon. c. 7, § 8, they never had any general recognition as a separate order in the East. (a) From this list sometimes singers are omitted, Cod. Theodos. lib. 16, tit. 2, 24 (a law of Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian in A.D. 377 = Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 6, where some editions insert "acolutos," against MSS. authority, apparently to make the list tally with the later Roman lists); so Nomoconon, tit. 1, c. 31. (b) Sometimes doorkeepers as well as singers are omitted, so apparently Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 10 (which is one of the few recognitions of exorcists in Eastern canons); this is the case even in some of those Western ordinals which give a ritual for the ordination of doorkeepers, viz. those which quote the decretal of Zosimus (Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isid. p. 553), in which only six orders are specified. 7. Sometimes acolyths are added to the orders enumerated above, S. Cyprian. Epist. 28, 3; possibly Cod. Theodos. lib. 16, tit. 2, c. 10; Isid. Hispal. Etym. 7, 2, 2, but when this is the case singers are commonly omitted. This is the earliest Roman list, being found in the 3rd century in the account which Cornelius gives, ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 43; it is not found in the East, nor until the 8th century is it common in the West, one of the rare instances of its occurrence being in a Gallican inscription of A.D. 517, given by Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, No. 30; probably also ibid. No. 617, A.D. 445, assuming that "sequentibus" is a translation of ἀκολουθοῖς. But it came at last to be the usual list of the western canonists, e.g. Capit. Hadrian. c. 72; Yves of Chartres, Serm. 2, vol. ii. p. 263; Alcuin, de Div. Offic. c. 34; Hraban of Mainz, de Cleric. Instit. c. 4 (where, however, readers and singers appear to be identified), and Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. lib. ii. p. 3, c. 5, ap. Migne, P. L. clxxvi. p. 425. It was adopted in later times by the council of Trent, sess. xxiii. c. 2, with the exception that bishops and presbyters are classed together as "sacerdotes." But Innocent III., though recognizing acolyths, excludes exorcists and readers, thus giving the six orders of bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, acolyth, and singer, which he regards as the Christian counterpart of the Levitical orders "pontifices, sacerdotes, levitas, nathinaeos, janitores, et psaltas" (Innoc. III. de Sacro Altaris Ministerio, i. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxvii. p. 775). 8. In some Oriental churches there are grades which in the west either do not exist or are not ranked as grades but as functions: (a) chorepiscopi are distinctly ranked as co-ordinate with the other grades of clerks in Conc. Chalced. c. 2; Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 40 (39), § 9; Gennadius, Epist. Encycl. in Act. Conc. Constan. A.D. 459, Mansi, vii. 911, Pitra, vol. ii. 184; and among the Jacobite Syrians, the Maronites (both of whom have a separate form of ordination for chorepiscopi), and, according to George of Arbela, the Nestorians. (b) Periodetae are also ranked as a separate order in Cod. Justin. l. c., probably in Conc. Laod. c. 57 (cf. Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. ii. p. 321), among the Syrians both Jacobite and Maronite, and, according to Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. c. 1, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 106, among the Nestorians (but in regard to the eastern status of both chorepiscopi and periodetae, see Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. i. pp. 121 sqq.). (c) Archdeacons are reckoned as a separate order among the Copts, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians. (d) The Copts also recognise an order corresponding to the archpresbyters or protopresbyters of the Latin and Greek churches, whom they call Igumeni [ἡγούμενοι, properly used of abbots or archimandrites, Denzinger, i. 117]. (e) The Nestorians recognise an order of officers to whom they give the name Scijhara, who are a special grade of singers, Denzinger, i. 124. 9. The oriental churches also recognise grades of the episcopate; the Copts have bishops, archbishops (= metropolitans), and a patriarch, for each of whom there is a distinct form of ordination, Denzinger, i. 116, ii. 33; the Jacobites and Maronites have bishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs; the Nestorians, according to Ebedjesu, have bishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs, but according to George of Arbela there is properly a distinction between patriarchs and catholici [CATHOLICUS, Vol. I. p. 321]. The western church has also sometimes recognised differences of grade in the episcopate. Isid. Hispal. Etym. vii. 12, 2, recognises bishops, archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs. Hrabanus Maurus identifies archbishops and metropolitans, de Cleric. Instit. c. 5. But the council of Trent made these grades to be with "priests simply so called," i.e. presbyters, grades not of the episcopate but of the priesthood, Catech. Rom. 2, 7, 26. 10. From the 6th century it appears to have become the custom, especially in the Gallican churches, to confer upon persons the privileges and immunities of the clergy by giving them the tonsure without admitting them to any special office in the church; such persons were called clerici, but it is admitted by canonists and by the council of Trent that they were not an "ordo" (Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. pars i. tit. iii.). 11. Several other classes of church officers appear at various times to have been recognised as members of the clerus, e.g. (a) copiatae, Cod. Theodos. lib. xiii. tit. 1, 1 (but distinguished from clerici, ibid. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 15), S. Epiphanius, Expos. Fid. c. 21, p. 1104 [COPIATAE, DECANI, FOSSARII]; (b) custodes martyrum mentioned apparently as co-ordinate with deacons in the Liber Pontif. Vit. S. Silvestr. = Synod. Gest. S. Silvestr. c. vii. Migne, P. L. vol. viii. 802, in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Hinschius, p. 450; (c) custodes sacrorum, Isid. Hispal. de Dicin. Off. 2, 9; (d) κοπιῶντες, Ps.-Ignat. Epist. ad Antioch. c. 12; (e) θέωροι, Balsam. in Conc. Trull. c. 77, vol. i. p. 247; (f) ἐρμηνευταὶ γλώσσης εἰς γλώσσαν, S. Epiphanius, Expos. Fid. c. 21, p. 1104.

It is possible that mystical reasons had something to do with the elimination of some of these classes from the list of grades which came ultimately to be received by theologians in the West; the seven orders were the seven manifestations of the work of the Holy Spirit, e.g. Yves of Chartres says that "sancta ecclesia septiformis gratiae est munere decorata" (D. Ivon. Carnot. Serm. 2, ii. p. 263); so Hugh of St. Victor: "septem spiritualium officiorum gradus proinde in sancta ecclesia secundum septiformem gratiam distributi sunt" (Hugon. de S. Vict. de Sacram. lib.

ii. pars 3, c. 5). But Innocent III. de Sacro Altaris Minister. lib. i. c. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. cccvii. p. 775, finds an equally valid mystical reason for six orders, "senarius enim numerus est perfectus;" and still later canonists agree with Isidore in reckoning nine, adding clerks and bishops to the seven grades which were ordinarily received by theologians (Catalani, note to the Pontificale Romanum, pars 1, tit. 2); so in the Maronite pontifical, Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars ii. p. 406). Alcuin (Albinus Flaccus) reckons eight orders, by making bishops distinct from presbyters, assigning the mystical reason that the gates of the temple in Ezekiel's vision had each eight steps (Albin. Flacc. de Divin. Off. 33; Ezek. xl. 31, 34, 37). The same number, without the reason, is given by Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. 1, 4, and in St. Dunstan's and the Jumièges pontificals.

(2) Groups of Grades of Orders.—The several orders tended to combine into groups; but the groups varied widely under different circumstances.

1. Sometimes the bishop was regarded as standing apart from the other officers of the church. This distinction, which is important in relation to the history of the episcopate, shews itself from the fourth century onwards in the restriction of the use of κλῆρος and κληρικοί to those who were not bishops. This may not have been universally or invariably the case, as many passages, e.g. in the Apostolical Canons, may be interpreted in either way; but the following instances are clear: in the Canon Law, Conc. Ephes. c. 6, εἰ μὲν ἐπίσκοποι εἴεν ἢ κληρικοί; Conc. Chalced. c. 3, μὴ ἐπίσκοπον. μὴ κληρικόν; 1 Conc. Carth. c. 9, 11; Conc. Trull. c. 17; in the Civil Law, Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 11 (A.D. 354), antistites et clerici; id. 16, 2, 32 (A.D. 398); episcopi et clerici; Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 39 (38), τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἢ τοὺς κληρικούς; id. Novell. 6, c. 8 (A.D. 535), 123, c. 6; in the Fathers, e.g. S. Cyrill. Alex. Epist. 1, x. p. 4; id. Ep. 2, x. p. 20; S. Leon. M. Epist. 167, 1, i. p. 1420; Theodoret, H. E. 2, 7, p. 851; in inscriptions, e.g. at Corycus in Cilicia, θεοφιλεστάτου ἐπισκόπου καὶ [τοῦ εὐ]αγοῦ[s] κλῆρου; Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions d'Asie Mineure, No. 1421 = C. I. G. 8619; so in Suid. p. 2120, c. κλῆρος τὸ σύστημα τῶν διακόνων καὶ πρεσβυτέρων.

2. Sometimes the higher orders, both collectively and in the abstract, are designated by words connoting sacredness or priesthood; ιερατεῖον, Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 3; εἰ τις πρ. ἢ διακ. ἢ δλας τῶν τοῦ ιερατείου τιδ. S. Athanas. Epist. Encycl. 1, i. p. 88; id. Epist. ad Rufin. i. p. 769, τῷ ιερατεῖῳ καὶ τῷ λαῷ τῷ ὑπὸ σέ. S. Basil. Epist. 198 (263), iii. p. 289. Ἱερατεία, Cod. Just. lib. 1, tit. 3, 53 (52), A.D. 532; id. Novell. 6, c. 7. Ἱεροσύνη, S. Epiphani. adv. Haer. 2, 1, 48, 9, i. p. 410; Sozomen, H. E. i. 34; S. Basil. Epist. 188 (Canonic. 1), § 14, iii. p. 275—all in the abstract of the office; in the concrete, S. Maxim. Conf. Epist. 21, ap. Migne, P. G. xci. p. 604. Ἱερατικοί, Conc. Laod. c. 24, 27; S. Basil. Epist. 237 (264) iii. p. 365 = τὸ ιερατικὸν πᾶν, id. Epist. 240 (192), § 3, iii. p. 370. So Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. ii. 44: "quicunque ejusdemque gradus sacerdotio fulciuntur vel clericatus honore censentur." The distinction between various grades of orders which was thus created was by no means uniform. (i.) In the East—a. Sometimes bishops and presbyters were classed together in distinction to deacons and other clerks, e.g. Auct. Vit. Spiridonius ap. Haenel, Corp. Leg. ante Justin. lat. p. 209, "omnibus qui sunt partium ecclesiasticarum, sacerdotibus inquam et diaconis." Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, 10 (law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 398), "sacerdotes et ministri"; S. Sym. Thessal. de Divino Templo, c. 26, 27, p. 275. b. Sometimes deacons were included among those who had sacred or priestly rank, e.g. Conc. Laod. c. 24; ιερατικούς ἀπὸ πρεσβυτέρων ἕως διακόνων; S. Basil. Epist. 237 (264), vol. ii. p. 365. c. Sometimes subdeacons appear to have been also included, e.g. Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 3; by implication, S. Epiphani. Expos. Fid. c. 21, vol. i. p. 1104; so according to Balsamon, who may, however, be simply stating the practice of his own day, Conc. Trull. c. 77, which makes the tripartite division ιερατικούς ἢ κληρικούς ἢ ἀσκητάς. But in the East as in the West subdeacons were for several centuries on the border-line; they had sometimes the privileges of the higher, sometimes those of the lower, division of the clergy. (ii.) In the West a distinction was ultimately drawn between "ordines" and "sacri ordines"; the latter were for some time regarded as consisting of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but the earliest canonical restriction of the phrase to these three orders is probably Conc. Benevent. A.D. 1091 (Mansi, vol. xx. p. 738), which is the authority quoted by Gratian, pars i. dist. 60, 4. But the earlier use of "sacri ordines" for all classes of church officers is occasionally found even after the limitation had become ordinarily fixed, (e.g. in a Reims pontifical, no. 179 (162), fol. 109, "sacri ordines" are distinguished not from minor orders but from the orders of virgins or widows). The modern inclusion of the subdiaconate among "holy orders" dates from the 12th century. It is expressly excluded by Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. lib. ii. pars 3, c. 13. Peter the Singer, A.D. 1197, speaks of the inclusion as a recent institution Verb. Abbr. c. 60; Migne, P. L. vol. ccv. 184, and about the same time Innocent III. says that "hodie" a subdeacon is in holy orders and may be elected bishop (Epist. x. 164; Migne, P. L. vol. ccxv. 1257); Durand (Rationale, ii. c. 8), ascribes the inclusion to Innocent III. himself. (Cf. Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. 12, c. 5; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, art. 2.) Earlier traces of this elevation of the subdiaconate are S. August. Serm. 356, de Diversis, c. 2, vol. v. p. 1575; Can. Eccles. Afric. c. 25; Conc. Gerund. A.D. 583, c. 1; 2 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 531, c. 3; on the other hand in most Oriental churches subdeacons still retain their primitive place, and do not enter into the sanctuary.

3. Sometimes bishops, presbyters, and deacons were classed together, without express reference to their sacred or priestly character, as forming a higher class of clergy; the existence of this distinction in early times is made apparent, without being expressly stated, by differences in discipline, e.g. in Can. Apost. 42, 43, 54, 55; afterwards it came to be commonly expressed, e.g. 1 Conc. Matiscon. A.D. 581, c. 11; Episcopi, presbyteri, vel universi honoratiores clerici; Joann. Diac. Vit. S. Greg. M. i. 31; hence "inferiores clerici," Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 28; "inferioris ordinis clerici," S. Augustin. Epist. 43 (162), c.

8; Alcuin (Albinus Flaccus), de Divin. Off. c. 33, "tres superiores gradus;" Amalarius of Metz, de Eccl. Off. 2, 6, where "inferiores ordines" are "ordines subjecti diacono et presbytero." Sometimes the reference to relative superiority or inferiority is omitted, but bishops, presbyters, and deacons specially enumerated, and the other orders are summed up as "clerici," e.g. Can. Apost. 4, 8, 16; Conc. Nicaen. c. 3, Antioch. c. 2, 3 Chal. c. 6, 3 Carth. 9, 15; will of Perpetuus of Tours, A.D. 474, in D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. iii. p. 303; Karlomanni Capit. Liftin. A.D. 740, ap. Pertz, M. G. H. Legum. vol. i. p. 18. The line was afterwards drawn at subdeacons (one of the earliest instances of which is in the Leges Wisigothorum, lib. ii. tit. 1, c. 18), but it was not until the 13th century that the subdiaconate was ordinarily ranked among "maiores ordines;" from that time "sacri ordines" are identical with "maiores ordines," and included bishops, presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons, "minores ordines" including acolyths, exorcists, readers, and doorkeepers. The distinction does not exist in Oriental churches.

(3) Succession of, and intervals between, grades of orders.—There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any rule against the appointment of a layman to any office whatever in the church, still less is there any evidence to shew that a clerk who had begun in a lower grade had to pass by any regular steps of succession to a higher. There are instances (1) of bishops who had never been presbyters [BISHOP, Vol. I. p. 219], to the examples given in which place may be added the case of Paulinianus in S. Hieron. Epist. 82 (62), vol. i. p. 518: the cases mentioned in S. Leon. M. Epist. 14, ad Anastas. c. 6, vol. i. p. 688; S. Greg. Magn. Epist. ix. 109, vol. ii. p. 1014: the case of St. Caesarius of Arles, Vit. c. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. lxvii. 1005: the very late instance of a bishop of Lyons, in A.D. 841, in Pertz, M. G. H. Script. i. p. 110, Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. i. 68; and of John, bishop of Constance, mentioned in Walafrid Strabo, Vit. S. Gall. lib. i. c. 23, Migne, P. L. xiv. 998, Greith, Altürische Kirche, p. 382: the complaint of pope Celestin, Epist. ad Episc. Gall. c. 3: and the Brehon law that when a bishop "stumbled," i.e. committed adultery, the reader shall be installed in the bishopric, Senchus Mor, ed. Hancock, p. 59: see also Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. cviii.; Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. i. p. 146: and for evidence that some popes never passed through the presbyterate, Mabillon, l. c. p. cxix. The case of Photius, who was accused and ultimately deposed because, among other reasons, he had not passed through the lower grades, can only be mentioned here; the weakness of the Latin attack upon him is shewn in the writings which contain it, especially Nicolas I. Epist. 12, 13, Migne, P. L. vol. cxix., Mansi, vol. xv.: Ratramn. of Corbey, Lib. contr. Graec. iv. c. 8, Migne, P. L. cxi. 334, D'Achery, Spicil. vol. i.; Aeneas of Paris, adv. Graec. c. 210, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxi., D'Achery, Spicil. vol. i.; Photius's letter in defence will be found in Migne, P. G. vol. cii., Epist. i. 2. (2) Of presbyters who had never been deacons (e.g. St. Cyprian, according to Pontius, Vit. S. Cypr. c. 3; St. Augustine, according to Possidius, Vit. S. August. c. 4; probably St. Basil as St. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 43, c. 27, vol. i. p. 792, mentions only his being reader, presbyter, bishop: Cosmas mentioned in S. Greg. Magn. Epist. xiii. 28, vol. ii. p. 1237: the case is also contemplated in the Canon Law, Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 74, c. 9, = Ivo, Decret. vi. c. 106). (3) Of deacons who had never been subdeacons (e.g. St. Chrysostom in Socrates, H. E. 7. 3, p. 313; the subdiaconate is not mentioned in the enumeration of necessary grades in Conc. Sardic. c. 10, and it is not even now necessary among the Jacobite Syrians, Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 82).

But although these instances are important as shewing not only that the rules which were laid down from time to time were limitations of an earlier freedom, but also that ordinations per saltum, as they were afterwards called, were regarded as canonically valid, yet they must probably be considered as exceptions to a prevailing tendency. As early as the Pastoral Epistles promotion to a higher grade is held out as an inducement to "use the office well" (1 Tim. iii. 13), and a person who had only recently been converted is made ineligible for the office of a "bishop" (μὴ νεόφυτον, 1 Tim. iii. 6). This latter regulation had evidently come to be disregarded at the beginning of the 4th century, and the council of Nicaea, c. 2, in re-enacting it extended it to all clerks (the meaning of the difficult Greek text of the canon is probably best expressed by Rufinus, H. E. 2, 6, "ne quis nuper assumptus de vita vel conversatione Gentili, accepto baptismo, antequam cautius examinetur, clericus fiat;" so in effect Dionysius Exiguus, but Hefele ad loc. takes a slightly different view). But in the course of the same century there are traces of the growth of a tendency to appoint no one to a higher office until he had passed through the lower. The tendency was probably fostered by the civil law in regard to appointments, "ut gradatim honores deferantur," Modestin. in the Dig. 50, 4, 11, quoting a letter of Antoninus Pius; "gerendum honorum non promiscua facultas est, sed ordo certus huic rei adhibitus est," Callistratus in the Dig. 50, 4, 14, § 5. This tendency finds its first authorized expression in Conc. Sardic. c. 10, which however deals with the special case of a wealthy man or lawyer (πλούσιός τις ἢ σχολαστικός) being elected to a bishopric, and requires such a man to pass gradatim through the offices of reader, deacon, and presbyter. Gregory Nazianzen is less definite. He lays down as a general rule that a man should fill a lower office in the church before filling the highest office (Orat. 2, Apolog. § 111, vol. i. p. 62, sometimes interpreted that he should be a reader before being a presbyter). The first writer who speaks of passing "per solitos gradus" is Jerome (Epist. 60 (3), ad Heliodorum, vol. i. p. 337). Leo the Great discourages the omission of the lower grades, but does not disallow it (Epist. 12, vol. i. p. 674), whereas Gregory the Great speaks of the omission as "grave nimis" (Epist. ix. 109, vol. ii. p. 1014, writing to Brunhild; cf. ibid. ix. 106, vol. ii. p. 1009, "ordinate ad ordines ascendendum est").

When the rule had been fairly established, there still arose cases in which it created a difficulty. In such cases the rule was at once observed and evaded by accumulating ordina-tions, i.e. a person was admitted to successive grades on the same day or at short intervals. Early instances of this practice are that of Wulfad, in whose favour Charles the Bald wrote, Epist. Caroli R. in Conc. Suession. A.D. 866; Mansi, vol. xv. p. 708, and that of a bishop of Salerno mentioned by Leo Marsicanus, Chron. Casin. ii. 98; Migne, P. L. vol. clxxiii. One edition of the Roman pontifical (that which was published by Albertus Castellanus at Venice in 1520 and dedicated to Leo X.) makes provision for the case of a pope who was elected either as a layman or in minor orders, "accipiet primam tonsuram et minores ordines, ut alii inferiores," with this difference, that he is to be vested from the first in mitre and rochet, and to receive the instruments of the several orders at his faldstool. But even when grades were not accumulated, it was not until the 8th century that ordinations per saltum began to be considered invalid or to be punished by deposition.

One of the earliest instances is in the Frankfort capitulary of A.D. 789, which deposes a bishop Gaerhod, who admits that he had not been ordained presbyter or deacon (Capit. Francofurt. § 10, ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 73). Of later instances the mediaeval canonists furnish an abundant crop, e.g. Innocent III Epist. vii. 192. A presbyter who has not been ordained deacon is allowed to retain his orders, but has to go through the ceremony of being ordained deacon, id. Epist. viii. 118; a deacon who does not know whether he received minor orders or not, is required to receive them "ad cautelam," id. Epist. x. 146; a deacon who has knowingly passed over the subdiaconate is sent to a monastery for a time.

The question what grades were necessary resolves itself into two questions—(i.) what was the first grade, (ii.) what were the necessary subsequent grades. (i.) The inference to be drawn from recorded historical examples is that, as a rule, those who dedicated themselves to the service of the church began as readers. An indication of this is found as early as the time of Cyprian (Epist. 33, vol. ii. p. 319, of the ordination of Aurelius; but the use of "placuit" shews at the same time that there was no existing rule on the subject). In the following century Basil (according to S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 43, c. 27, vol. i. p. 792) and Chrysostom (according to Socrat. II. E. vii. 3; Pallad. Vit. S. Chrys. c. 5) both began as readers. In the 5th century there are the instances of Felix of Nola (Paulin. Poem. XV. de S. Felice, v. 108; Migne, P. L. vol. lxi. 470), and of John of Châlons (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. iv. 25). The same inference as to the custom of beginning as readers follows (1) from the constant practice of the Greek church; (2) from the earliest papal decretals on the subject, those of Siricius, Zosimus, and Gelasius, which are quoted below; (3) from Conc. Milev. A.D. 416 (cf. S. August. Epist. 63 (240), vol. ii. p. 231), 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 14. The earliest indication of the practice of beginning as a doorkeeper is probably that which is indicated by Paulinus of Nola Epist. 1 (6) ad Sever. c. 11; Migne, P. L. vol. lxi. 158 (although this may shew rather his own humility, than the prevalence of a custom); but in the 9th century the rule was laid down which has been the rule of Western canon law ever since that every clerk must pass through that grade (Silvest. Epist. c. 7; Caii Epist. c. 6; both adopted by the Pseudo-Isidore from the Liber Pontificalis, see below). Martin of Tours began as an exorcist (Sulp. Sever. Vit. S. Martin. c. 5), and Gregory the Great speaks of a monk who began as a subdeacon (Epist. 13, 28, vol. ii. p. 1237).

It must also be noted that there was a counter tendency to that which ultimately prevailed; it was probably not until the clerical office became a regular profession that promotion from one grade to another became an ordinary rule; persons who were well fitted for particular offices sometimes remained in them to the end of their lives. Ambrose (de Offic. Ministr. i. 44) writes as though division of labour were recognized in the church, and as though it were a function of the bishop to find out the office for which each person was best qualified. As instances of the prevalence of this view we find an acolyte of eighty-five years of age (Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, no. 36) a deacon of fifty-eight (ibid. no. 430), a subdeacon of thirty-two (De Rossi, Inscr. Christianae Urbis Romanae, no. 743, A.D. 448).

(ii.) The definition of the particular grades through which a clerk must pass, and of the time which he must spend in each grade, belongs to the period of the Isidorian and Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. The uncertainty which prevailed, even after those decretals had been formally incorporated into canon law, is shewn by the great variety of readings which exist in the various MSS. of the decretals. 1. The earliest of them is probably that of Siricius, Epist. ad Eumer. c. 10 (= Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 3; Ivo Carnot, Decret. 6, c. 91), which, according to the text given by Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isid. p. 520, allows a person to be ordained reader in early youth; then from puberty until thirty years of age he is to be acolyte or subdeacon; five years afterwards he is to be deacon, but no definite period is prescribed before he can become presbyter or bishop; if, however, a person is not ordained in early youth, he must be reader or exorcist for two years after his baptism, acolyte, and subdeacon for five years in all; there is no other prescription of time; but other texts give an interval of five years between a deacon and a presbyter, and of ten years between a presbyter and a bishop. 2. The decretal of Zosimus, which is probably next in order of antiquity (Epist. ad Hesych. c. 3 = Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 2; Migne, P. L. vol. xx. p. 672; Hinschius, p. 553) provides that if any one has been ordained in infancy he must remain as a reader until he is twenty years of age; if he is ordained later in life, he must be either reader or exorcist for five years after baptism; in any case he must be either acolyte (Egbert's Pontifical has "catholicus") or subdeacon for four years, and deacon for five years. No other limits are prescribed. This rule seems to have been widely recognized after the 8th century, since it is found in the Gelasian sacramentary, and in the pontificals of Egbert, St. Dunstan, Jumièges, Noyon, Cahors, Vatican ap. Muratori. 3. The Liber Pontificalis supplied the canon law with two other decretals: (1) in the Vita Caii (= Caii Epist. c. 6; Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 1; Migne, P. L. vol. v.

190; Hinschius, p. 218) Caius is said to have laid down a rule that a bishop must have passed through the seven orders of doorkeeper, reader, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon and presbyter; (2) in the Vita Silvest. p. 35 (Migne, P. L. vol. viii. 802, and vol. cxxvii. 1514, Hinschius, p. 450, whose text is followed here), that pope is said to have established the rule that a bishop must have been first doorkeeper, then reader, and then exorcist for whatever time his bishop may have determined; then acolyte for five years, subdeacon five years, custos martyrum five years [deacon five years, in some MSS.], presbyter three years.

But it would be difficult to shew that the intervals thus prescribed were even generally observed. No doubt the rule came to prevail that the conferring of each of the lower grades must precede the conferring any of the higher; but the ideal of the decretals, according to which a clerk must remain long enough in each grade to prove his efficiency in it, was probably seldom realised, except in the case of those who were devoted to the service of the church from infancy. In the case of those who sought admission to holy orders in later life, the only interval of time which maintained itself throughout, and from which a dispensation was very rarely given, was that of a year between the first admission to orders and the presbyterate. The Sarum Pontifical bewails the degeneracy of the times which left so short an interval between the "status laicalis" and the "status presbyterii supremus" (ap. Maskell, Mon. Ritual. vol. iii. p. 158); but it is probably the case that the adoption of this particular interval was due to the custom which grew up in some parts of Spain and Gaul in the 6th century of requiring an "annua conversio," i.e. a year's seclusion from secular life before admission to major orders (3 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 2; 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 9); this again was connected with, and perhaps grew out of, the rule that a monk must spend a year in minor orders and the diaconate before being ordained presbyter (S. Gelas. Epist. 9 ad Episc. Lucan. c. 2; Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 9; Hinschius, p. 650). At first this year was divided into definite periods; Gelasius directs that a person must spend three months in each of the four offices of reader (or "notarius" or "defensor"), acolyte, subdeacon, and deacon (ibid.). But afterwards the conferring of minor orders became a mere form and a clerk could pass through all grades up to the diaconate on one and the same day (but according to Roman canonists, only the pope could grant a dispensation for accumulating major orders on the same day; see Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. pars 1, tit. 2, §§ 4, 6).

In the East the primitive custom of appointing a layman to any church office lingered longer; the custom of interstitia is almost unknown. The limitations are rather limitations of age than of interval; for example Ebed Jesu, Tract. vi. c. 4, 2; ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. Nov. Coll. vol. x. p. 112, lays down the rule that boys are not to receive imposition of hands, but are only to be appointed readers; when they have reached adolescence they may become subdeacons; at the age of eighteen they may become deacons, at twenty-five presbyters; but even after a succession of grades had become established a person who had attained the requisite age might be admitted to more than one grade on the same day; among the Nestorians such an accumulation of grades became the usual rule (see the ritual in Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 227). This is in conformity with the later Western practice, which allowed a layman to be appointed to any office whatever, but compelled him to go through the ordination ceremonies of all the lower grades. (See above for the case of a layman elected pope.)

III. EXTERNAL ORGANIZATION OF THE CLERGY.

—In apostolic and sub-apostolic times there is no evidence of the existence of any other than the internal organization which has been described above. Each church has its officers, but each church was independent and complete in itself. There were friendly relations between one church and another; there was an interchange of letters and of hospitality; but there does not appear to have been any organized combination for common purposes, and still less any subordination of the officers of one church to the officers of another. But in the course of the 2nd century begin to appear the outlines of a system which has done more than anything else to shape the subsequent history of Christendom. First of all the clergy of neighbouring churches, and ultimately the clergy of the greater part of the Christian world, came to be associated in a single organization.

Into the causes which produced a tendency to organization it is not to the present purpose to enter. But the shape which the organization took cannot be understood without a reference to the influences which produced it. Those influences flowed chiefly from the system of administration which prevailed in the empire. Just as the internal organization of the church reflected the main features of the civil policy and religious associations of the time, so did its external organization follow the lines which were already marked in contemporary life.

(1.) Every year deputies (σύνεδροι, legati) from the several towns of a province met together in a provincial council (κοινόν, concilium). The objects of these councils were various and their powers extensive. They had a common fund from which they could build temples or erect statues; they decided as to the boundaries of the territories of cities; they had the right of communicating directly with the emperor in regard to the civil and judicial administration of the province. From them came the first beginnings of ecclesiastical organization in similar assemblies or "councils" of the clergy. Such councils began in Greece and Asia Minor, where the civil councils are known to have been exceptionally active (Tertull. de Jejun. c. 13, "aguntur per Græcias illa certis in locis concilia ex universis ecclesiis;" cf. Euseb. H. E. 5, 16, quoting probably Apollinaris of Hierapolis: τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν πιστῶν πολλᾶκις καὶ πολλαχῇ τῆς Ἀσίας εἰς τοῦτο [sc. against the Montanists] συνελεύοντων); in the time of Cyprian they were beginning to be a regular institution in North Africa, and from that time onwards they became permanent factors in church history [see COUNCILS, Vol. I. p. 473 sqq.]. Their importance in regard to the organization of the clergy is that, following the example of the civil councils, the ecclesiastical councils kept to the lines marked out by the civil government, and that consequently instead of the organization for ecclesiastical purposes being determined by proximity of place or similarity of origin, it was determined by the lines of demarcation of the Roman provinces. Those provinces became ecclesiastical units, and their chief cities became centres of ecclesiastical administration. (For the facts in relation to the civil councils, see Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, bd. i. pp. 365-377; id. in Ephemeris Epigraphica, 1872, pp. 200-214; Duruy, Histoire des Romains, vol. v. pp. 213-219; Fustel de Coulanges, Histoire des Institutions Politiques de l'Ancienne France, vol. i. p. 107 sqq.)

(2.) In the civil councils the president was an officer whose functions were to a great extent religious, and who bore the name of Sacerdos provinciae (Cod. Theodos. 12, 1, 46, 75, 174), or ἀρχιερεύς (C. I. G. 3487, and elsewhere). To him the other priests of the province were subordinate, and in some cases he appointed them. (Julian, Epist. 49, 63; Eunap. 57, ed. Boisson. cf. Marquardt, l. c. p. 368). When the ecclesiastical councils came to be established, their president not only received the same or an equivalent name, ἀρχιερεύς, ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, summus sacerdos, but he was also invested with the right of confirming both the appointment and in certain cases the acts of the other bishops of the province. In the East this office fell to the bishop of the metropolis, who was hence also called ὁ τῆς μητροπόλεως or metropolitanus; but in Africa, and probably also at first in Gaul and Spain, it fell to the bishop who was senior in date of appointment [see PRIMATE].

(3.) Within the limits of the great provinces were smaller organizations. The provinces were subdivided into districts, partly for fiscal, partly for commercial, but chiefly for judicial purposes. These were known as conventus, conventus iudicii, iurisdictiones, διοικήσεις (a use of the word which must be kept distinct from its use to denote the larger divisions of the empire under Diocletian). Each of them had its centre of administration, its "county-town" with its basilica or "county-hall." It was in these centres that Christian communities were first formed, and the area of the juridical conventus or "diocese" became naturally the area of the ecclesiastical organization. The jurisdiction of the bishop and presbyters was concurrent with that of the civil authority, and the seat of jurisdiction, which was also the place of meeting, was under the Christian emperors, the basilica of the civil magistrate. At first of course there were many districts in which the Christian community was not large enough to warrant the formation of any organization; where this was the case, a neighbouring bishop was charged with the oversight of such communities, until in process of time, and usually through the intervention of the provincial council, they were large enough to have bishops of their own; but even in the 5th and 6th centuries the sphere of a bishop's jurisdiction is sometimes spoken of in the plural, Sulp. Sever. Dial. 2, 3, "dum dioceses visitat;" cf. Sidon. Apollinar. Epist. 7, 6, p. 183; 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 36.

(For an account of the civil conventus or dioceses, see Marquardt, Röm. Staatsv. Bd. i. p. 341; and the early history of ecclesiastical dioceses has yet to be written.)

Such were the three chief respects in which the ecclesiastical organization followed the lines of the civil organization; in the association of churches according to provinces, in the formation of an intra-provincial hierarchy with a metropolitan or primate at its head, and in the recognition of the bishop of a city as having jurisdiction over the district of which the city was the centre, the church adapted but did not materially transform leading elements of contemporary civil life.

How close the correspondence was between the ecclesiastical and the civil organization can be shewn from many instances in both east and west. The most interesting case in the west is that of Gaul. According to the Notitia Provinciarum et Dignitatum (circ. A.D. 400), Gaul was divided into two civil dioceses: (1) D. Galliarum; (2) D. Viennensis. The former was subdivided into ten provinces, viz. Belgica prima et secunda, Germania prima et secunda, Maxima Sequanorum, Lugdunensis prima, secunda, tertia, quarta (= L. Senonia), Alpes Graiae et Poeninae. (The Veronese MS., which gives the division under Diocletian, divides Lugdunensis into two instead of four divisions, thus shewing that the subdivision took place in the 4th century; cf. Mommsen, Abhandlungen der Berlin. Acad. 1862, p. 492.) The latter was subdivided into seven provinces, viz. Viennensis, Narbonensis prima et secunda, Novem Populi, Aquitania prima et secunda, Alpes maritimae. Not only was the civil metropolis of each province an episcopal see, but in all cases except two (Elusa and Ebrodunum) the see has remained until modern times, and in almost all cases the metropolitan character of the see has also remained, the bishops being styled archbishops to the present day. For example, the metropolis of Belgica Prima was Augusta Treverorum = Trier, a bishop of which see was present at 1 Conc. Arelat. in 314; that of Belgica Secunda was Durocortorum Remorum = Reims, a bishop of which see was also present at 1 Conc. Arelat.; that of Germania Prima was Moguntiacum = Mainz; that of Germania Secunda, Colonia Agrippina = Köln; that of Maxima Sequanorum, Vesontio = Besançon, of which see a bishop existed as early as the time of St. Irenaeus. It is also remarkable that of the towns (civitates) which are mentioned in each province as being towns of importance, almost every one had a bishop. For example in the Provincia Viennensis twelve such towns are mentioned (besides the metropolis Vienna), viz. civitas Genavensium = Geneva, civ. Gratianopolis = Grenoble, civ. Deonsium (= Ad Deam Vocontiorum of the Peutinger Table = civ. Dea Vocontiorum of the Jerusalem Itinerary) = Die, civ. Valentinorum = Valence, civ. Tricastinorum (= Senomago of the Peutinger Table) = S. Paul-trois-Châteaux: civ. Vasisium (= Vasio of Pliny) = Vaison, civ. Arausiacum (= Arusione of the Peutinger Table) = Orange, civ. Cabellicorum = Cavaillon (for the name of this town there is a various reading in the Notitia, viz. civ. Carpentoratensium = Carpentras, of which a bishop is mentioned in 483), civ. Aven-uicorum (= Avennionne of the Peutinger Table) = Avignon: civ. Arelatensium (in some MSS.

metrop. civ. Araclatensis = Arelato of the Peutinger Table) = Arles, civ. Massiliensium = Marseilles, civ. Albensium. ("nunc Vivaria") = Viviers. Every one of these towns had a bishop in Roman times. The same was the case, with hardly an exception, in the other provinces. France preserves in its bishoprics to the present day the outlines of the Roman administration. On the other hand, England is an example of a country in which, the Roman organization having almost entirely passed away before the final organization of the church began, the dioceses were for the most part formed out of the Saxon kingdoms (see Stubbs, Constitutional History, vol. i. p. 224): and similarly in Ireland, "the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop was coextensive with the temporal sway of the chieftain" (Reeves, Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor, and Dromore, p. 303).

Within the skeleton thus furnished several other tendencies operated which arose within the church itself.

1. There arose a tendency to attach a clerk to a particular church, and to give local limits to the exercise of his functions. In the earliest ages there is presumptive evidence that a member of the ordo of one church might freely pass to another. It did not of course follow that he thereby became a member of the ordo of the other church. But the fact of his holding office elsewhere was recognised, and he enjoyed a certain precedence. Sometimes also he was placed on the clergy-roll, and he might thus be on the roll of several churches at once. An ambitious or a disaffected clerk was able in this way to pass easily from a narrower to a wider sphere, or to rid himself of the supervision of a too exigent superior. But this came at last to be prohibited, except with the full consent of all who were concerned. The final prohibition was indeed the result of a long struggle, nor is there any enactment of canon law, except those relating to marriage, which required to be so frequently repeated. The earliest existing enactment in the east is Conc. Nicaen. c. 16 (which however refers to an earlier canon, possibly that which is preserved in Can. Apost. 15), which provides that no one who is on the clergy-roll of any church shall leave it under penalty of excommunication; and that any ordination in one church of a clerk who is on the roll of another church, without the consent of his proper bishop, shall be invalid. These enactments were repeated, with additions, by 1 Conc. Antioch. c. 3, Conc. Sardic. c. 15, Conc. Chalcedon. c. 10, after which no further regulation on the subject became necessary in the east for two centuries and a half, when the Trullan Council recognized the fact of the non-observance of the earlier canons, and repeated them (c. 17). In Africa similar regulations were made by the councils of Carthage, and were incorporated in the African code (1 Conc. Carth. c. 5; 3 Conc. Carth. c. 21, 44; Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 54). But the struggle to evade them seems to have been stronger in Gaul and Spain; they were first made at Arles in 314 (1 Conc. Arelat. c. 21); they were renewed ten times in the 5th and 6th centuries, and three times in the 7th century; at Orange in 441 (Conc. Arausic. c. 8), at Arles in 451 (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 13), at Tours in 461 (1 Conc. Turon. c. 9), at Vannes in 465 (Conc. Venet. c. 10), at Valencia in 524 (?) (Conc. Valent. c. 6), at Arles in 524 (4 Conc. Arelat. c. 4), at Clermont in 535 (Conc. Arvern. c. 11), at Orleans in 549 (5 Conc. Aurelian. c. 5), at Arles in 554 (5 Conc. Arelat. c. 7), at Braga in 563 (2 Conc. Brac. c. 8), at Toledo in 633 (4 Conc. Tolet. c. 53), at Châlons in 650 (Conc. Cabillon. c. 13), at Toledo again in 683 (13 Conc. Tolet. c. 11); and they were sanctioned by a capitulary of Pippin in 753 (Capit. Vernense duplex, c. 12, ap. Pertz, 1, 26). In England they were recognized by the Legatine Synods in 787, c. 6 (Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 447), and by Egbert of York (Dial. Egbert Eborac. c. 7, 9, ibid. pp. 402 sqq.). Afterwards they passed into the body of canon law (see Gratian. Dist. 70; D. Ivon. Carnot. Decret. 6, 26; Hugon. de S. Vict. de Sacram. 2, 3, 22), nor has there been any serious subsequent attempt to destroy the relation of lord and vassal which they established between a bishop and the other members of the ordo ecclesiasticus.

2. A second tendency, which arose in the course of the 3rd century, and which ran pari passu with that which has just been described, took the double form of giving local limits to a bishop's powers, and of subordinating him either to the provincial council, or to a single superior. (a) Probably the first express recognition of this local limitation is in the letter of the four Egyptian bishops, Hesychius, Pachomius, Theodorus, and Phileas, to Meletius of Alexandria, in A.D. 303-5, which was published from a Latin version at Verona, by Maffei, Opusc. Eccles. ii. p. 253, and republished by Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 1. A few years later the council of Antioch expressly limits the exercise of a bishop's powers to his own province or ἐπαρχία (which may possibly be used as in Conc. Nicaen. c. 6 = διοίκησις); he could not for the future pass into another province for the purpose of making ordinations, except on the written invitation of the metropolitan and bishops of that province (Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 13); the council of Constantinople, forty years later, renews the enactment (c. 2, ἀκλήτους δὲ ἐπισκόπους ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν μὴ ἐπιβαίνειν ἐπὶ χειροτονίας ἢ τισιν ἄλλαις οἰκονομίαις ἐκκλησιαστικαῖς), but makes an explicit exception in regard to nations outside the Roman organization (ἐν τοῖς βαρβαρικοῖς ἔθνεσι). In those parts of the West in which the meshes of that organization were closer, the relation of one bishop to another were still more sharply defined. Where, as in Gaul at the beginning of the 4th century, there was a bishop for every civitas, i.e. for the centre of every circle of civil jurisdiction, it was provided that each bishop should be confined to his own circle, and should not exercise authority in the circle of his neighbour (1 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 17, "ut nullus episcopus alium episcopum conculcet," 1 Turon. A.D. 461, c. 9, excommunicates those who transgress the "terminos a patribus constitutos;" 1 Lugd. A.D. 517, c. 5; 1 Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 10). But, on the other hand, as a proof of the intimate connexion between civil and ecclesiastical organization, where, as in Ireland, the imperial system of administration did not prevail, the bishops preserved their original status; they were the officers not of districts but of single congregations; they moved about almost as they pleased; dioceses in the ordinary sense did not exist until the synod of Rath-Bresail in 1141 (see Reeves, Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor, and Dromore, append. pp. 135, 139). (b) It is also probable that in the earliest times, a bishop or a community had the power of appointing any baptized person to office without regard to the place of his baptism or to his being already on the clergy-roll of another church. But while on the one hand, as we have already seen, the councils gradually came to prohibit a member of one church from taking office in another, on the other hand they restrained bishops from ordaining such persons, partly by making such ordinations null, and partly by subjecting offending bishops to the penalty of suspension and excommunication. (c) It is also probable that in the earliest times each bishop was independent of his colleagues; the several shepherds of the flock of Christ were amenable, not to any earthly superior but to Christ Himself: "singulis pastoribus portio sit adscripta, quam regat unusquisque et gubernet, rationem sui actus Domino redditurus" (St. Cyprian, Epist. 55, da Cornel. c. 14, vol. ii. p. 821). But in the course of the 4th century there grew up the tendency, which was probably reflected from the great contemporary development of the hierarchical system in the empire, to subordinate bishop to bishop and church to church. The details of this subordination grew out of the extension to the ecclesiastical sphere of the civil system of provincial councils and provincial high priests; but the spirit which led to that extension grew up within the church itself.

3. A third tendency, which arose in the East from the gradual decay of the population, and in the West from the necessity of consolidating an organization, which had interwoven itself with the civil administration, and round which a complex growth of material interests had clustered, was the tendency to limit the number of towns in which bishops were appointed. The number of bishops in early times, in both East and West, was very large. From the small province of Asia Proconsularis, which formed but a tenth part of the Dioecesis Asiana, thirty-two bishops were present at the council of Ephesus in 431. In the provinces which made up the Dioecesis Africae, 470 bishoprics are known by name before the Vandal invasion; and possibly there may have been some truth in the retort of Petilianus to the reproach of Alypius, that the Donatists had bishops in villages and on estates, "immo vero ubi habes sane et sine populis habes" (Collat. Carthag. i. 181, ap. Gallandi Bibl. Patr. vol. v. p. 620; for the details here given in respect to Africa, cf. Gams, Series Episcoporum, p. 463; Kuhn, Städt. u. bürgerl. Verfassung des Röm. Reichs, Bd. ii. p. 436). In Ireland the number of bishops cannot be certainly ascertained, but must have been large; the Annals of the Four Masters, ad ann. 493, speak of St. Patrick as having ordained 700 bishops and 3000 priests; and Aengus the Culdee, in the 9th century, speaks of no less than 141 places in the island, in each of which there were or had been seven contemporary bishops (Todd, St. Patrick, pp. 32, 35; Reeves, Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor, and Dromore, app. A. p. 123 sqq. where several other references are given). In the East, no doubt the gradual diminution in the number of bishoprics arose from the decay of the population, but in the West it was the result of policy. The power of the bishops was thereby increased. This is expressly stated by Leo the Great, who contends that bishops should not be appointed "in quibuslibet locis neque in quibuslibet castellis . . . ne quod sanctorum Patrum divinitus inspirata decreta vetuerunt viculis et possessionibus vel obscuris et solitariis municipiis tribuatur sacerdotale fastigium et honor cui debent excellentiora committi, ipsa sui numerositate vilescat" (S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 12, c. 12, I. p. 667). In the century that followed the conversion of Chlodwig, a different policy was no doubt followed within the Frankish domain. A large number of new bishoprics then, for the first time, appear in history, and the lines of the Roman organization are broken. But this foundation of new sees lasted only for a time. There is no record of any new foundation between that of Montpellier in 585 and St. Brieux in 848. On the contrary, it became necessary to re-enact the provision of the civil law: "ut episcopi debeant per singulas civitates esse" (Pippini Capit. Vern. A.D. 755, cf. Pertz, i. p. 24); but this does not appear to have amounted to more than the affirmation of a principle, and was modified by the Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 22, which repeated the Sardinian canon. The exigencies of the case were met by the combination with the existing system of an order of bishops, who were not tied to a particular city. Such an order had existed in the chorepiscopi of the East, and under that name it was revived in France. These chorepiscopi went from parish to parish, performing especially such episcopal acts as confirmation, and the consecration of the chrism and admission to minor orders; but they do not seem to have had either jurisdiction or power of ordaining presbyters (Hrabani Mauri de Instit. Cler. i. 5: ordinati sunt chorepiscopi propter pauperum curam qui in agris et villis consistent, ne eis solatium confirmationis deesset: Pippini Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, c. 14; Pertz, i. p. 22, where they are probably meant by "episcopis ambulantes per patrias"). But they were found to give rise to many difficulties, and in the 9th century a determined and ultimately successful attempt was made to abolish them. (The history of the struggle, which is of especial interest in connexion with the origin of the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, will be found on Weizsäcker, Der Kampf gegen den Chorepiscopat des fränkischen Reichs im neunten Jahrhundert, Tübingen, 1859; see also an article by the same writer in von Sybel's Historische Zeitschrift for 1860, pp. 42 sqq., and by van Noorden in the same journal for 1862, pp. 311 sqq.) A new form of organization had been gradually developing itself during the two previous centuries, and it now became both extended and firmly established. The old Roman organization still to a great extent survived. The old Roman civitates were still bishops' sees; the limits of the old Roman conventus were still for the most part the limits of the jurisdiction of the bishops of those sees. But the importance of those towns in relation to their neighbours had in many cases seriously diminished; and the districts of which they were the centres were full, not of *pagan*i, but of Christians who required clergy, and of clergy who required supervision. Hence the dioceses were subdivided, not as they would have been in earlier times into new dioceses, but into districts in each of which an archpresbyter had a modified jurisdiction over the presbyters and other clergy. [ARCHPRESBYTERS, Vol. I. p. 139; it may be added that the idea probably came from the Eastern church, where we find the functions of archpresbyter (= πρωτοπρεσβύτερος) united with those of a περιοδευτής, or itinerant bishop, Corpus Insc. Graec. No. 8822, at Abrostola in Phrygia.] This was supplemented by occasionally sending the ecclesiastical officer who stood in the closest personal relation to the bishop, viz. the archdeacon, as a special delegate to enquire into the condition of the clergy and parishes on the bishop's behalf. Not only did such a delegation become in time a delegatio perpetua, but also in the case of some large dioceses, several of the districts under the jurisdiction of an archpresbyter were united together and placed permanently under the jurisdiction of an archdeacon. The detailed account of this last arrangement falls outside our limits; but it is necessary to mention it as forming the last important link in the series of changes by which the simple system of the early church was transformed into the elaborate diocesan organization of mediaeval and modern times. (See Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, Bd. iii. p. 364; Gréa, Essai historique sur les Archidiacones in the Bibliothèque de l'Ecole des Chartes, 3^{me} série, t. ii. pp. 39, 215; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, Bd. ii. p. 610.)

IV. ADMISSION TO ORDERS.—1. Qualifications:—The fact that in the first ages of the church a person was almost invariably appointed to office in the city in which he lived, and by the community among which he had been baptized, prevented the necessity of minute enactments in regard to qualifications for orders. It was more a matter of common understanding than of ecclesiastical rule that no one should be appointed who had been known to lead an immoral life, or whose fitness for office had not been ascertained by experience. The election was practically free. The assembly which made it was not bound by any regulations except those which it laid down for itself. The points which were looked at were the internal qualifications of character rather than the external qualifications of age or status. Upon these internal qualifications all the earliest exhortations turn. The Pastoral Epistles, 1 Tim. iii. 1–12; Titus i. 6–9, mention no others; the almost contemporary epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians c. 5, 6, exhort that deacons be “blameless, not slanderers, not double-tongued, not fond of money, temperate in all things, compassionate, careful, walking in the truth of the Lord;” the Clementines, e.g. Epist. Clem. ad Jacob. c. 2, and the earlier books of the Apostolic Constitutions, e.g. ii. 1 sqq., direct that a bishop, at the time of his ordination, shall be tested as to his having brought up his children in the admonition of the Lord, whether he is blameless in regard to the needs of this life, given to hospitality, and apt to minister; the ordinances of Clement (Διατ. Κλήμ., Lagarde, Juris Eccl. Reliq. p. 74 sqq.; Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 77 sqq.) direct that testimony shall be given whether he “have a good report from the heathen, whether he be without fault, fond of the poor, sober, not a drunkard, not a fornicator, not overreaching or abusive, or a respecter of persons, or the like: it were well that he were wifeless, but if not, let him be the husband of one wife, capable of discipline, able to interpret the scriptures; and, even if unlearned, gentle, and abounding in love towards all.” But this free right of election came gradually to be restricted. With the increase in the number of churches, with the loosening of the bands of close fellowship, which had bound together the members of the churches in the face of the common danger of persecution, and with the multiplication of the links which bound one church to another, the original system was found to be too indefinite. The communities were too large and too scattered to know the habits and character of each individual member, and the functions which their officers had to fulfil became too important and too complicated to be entrusted to any one without close inquiry. Stress began to be laid upon the necessity of examination before appointment, and definite rules had to be agreed upon. With the existence of such an examination the inhabitants of the Roman municipalities were already familiar, and it is probable that the ecclesiastical communities followed in this as in other details of their organization the analogy of the civil communities. No one could be elected to the civil “Ordo” without being previously examined as to his possession of certain qualifications: he must be free-born, of a certain age, unconvicted of any crime, and possessed of sufficient property to discharge the duties of his office. The examination into these qualifications immediately preceded the election, and the duty of making it fell on the presiding officer (see Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, Bd. i. p. 497); the chief authorities are the Lex Julia Municipalis, Corp. Inscr. Lat. No. 206, and the Lex Malacitana, a bronze found at Malaga in 1851, which gives more minute details than were previously known, and which has been published by Mommsen in the Abhandlungen der kön. Sächs. Gesellsch. der Wissenschaften, Bd. 3, and, in a separate treatise, Die Stadtrechte der lateinischen Gemeinden Salpensa u. Malaca, Leipzig, 1855; also by Giraud, Paris, 1856 and 1868; in the Corp. Inscr. Lat. ii. 1964, and by Orelli-Henzen, No. 7421). In the same way the possession of certain positive qualifications and the absence of certain disqualifications were made conditions precedent to the admission to the “Ordo ecclesiasticus,” and the presiding officer was charged with the duty of seeing that such conditions were fulfilled. But it is obvious that under such an arrangement the qualifications insisted upon must be such as to admit of an external test; and it was natural that, when once external tests began to be imposed, they should tend to become more complex and more rigid. The earliest of such tests arose out of the early controversies as to the marriage of the clergy. The only impediments to admission to orders which are expressly mentioned in the Apostolical canons are digamy, and marriage with two sisters, or with a niece, or with one who was not a virgin (c. 17, 18, 19). In subsequent lists of qualifications and disqualifications such impediments occupy so large a place that the lists themselves furnish the best contemporary evidence of the state of feeling on the subject. Three such lists in three successive centuries may be taken as typical, and, for the sake of more exact comparison will best be given in their original form. 1. In the 6th century the rules of admission to orders were settled by the civil law. Justinian (Novell. 123, c. 12) enacts as follows:—Κληρικούς οὐκ ἄλλως χειροτονεῖσθαι συγχωροῦμεν εἰ μὴ γράμματα ἴσασι καὶ ὀρθὴν πίστιν καὶ βίον σεμνὴν ἔχουσι καὶ οὐδὲ παλλακὴν οὐδὲ φυσικούς ἔσχον ἢ ἔχουσι παῖδας ἄλλ' ἢ σωφρόνως βιούντας ἢ γαμήτην νόμιμον καὶ αὐτὴν μίαν καὶ πρώτην ἐσχηκότας καὶ μηδὲ χήραν μηδὲ διαζευχθεῖσαν ἄνδρός. (Compare the disqualifications mentioned by S. Greg. M. Epist. 4, 26, ad Januar. vol. ii. p. 704; id. Epist. 2, 37, ad Joann. vol. ii. p. 600). 2. A century later than Justinian, the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, which was held under Isidore of Seville, sums up as follows the canonical disqualifications which were recognised in the West at that time: "Qui in aliquo crimine detecti sunt, qui scelera aliqua per publicam poenitentiam admisisse confessi sunt, qui in haeresim lapsi sunt, qui in haeresi baptizati aut rebaptizati esse noscuntur, qui semetipsos abscederunt aut naturali defectu membrorum aut decisione aliquid minus habere noscuntur, qui secundae uxoris conjunctionem sortiti sunt, aut numerosa conjugia frequentaverunt, qui viduam aut marito relictam duxerunt, aut corruptarum mariti fuerunt, qui concubinas ad fornicationes habuerunt, qui servili conditioni obnoxii sunt, qui ignoti sunt, qui neophyti sunt, vel laici sunt, qui saeculari militiae dediti sunt, qui curiae nexibus obligati sunt, qui inscii literarum sunt, qui nondum ad triginta annos pervenerunt, qui per gradus ecclesiasticos non accesserunt, qui ambitu honorem quaerunt, qui muneribus honorem obtinere moliantur, qui a decessoribus in sacerdotium eliguntur." (The last few phrases evidently apply not to all clerks, but only to presbyters or bishops.) 3. A century later (circ. A.D. 750), Egbert of York gives a similar list, but with important additions and omissions: "Hujusmodi tunc ordinatio episcopi, presbyteri vel diaconi rata esse dicitur; si nullo gravi facinore probatur infectus, si secundam non habuit [uxorem] nec a marito relictam; si poenitentiam publicam non gessit nec ulla corporis parte vitiatum apparet: si servilis aut ex origine non est conditionis obnoxius; si curiae probatur nexibus absolutus, si adsecutus est litteras; hunc elegimus ad sacerdotium promoveri. Pro his vero criminibus nullum licet ordinari sed promotos quosque dicimus deponendos; idola scilicet adorantes; per aruspices [et divinos atque] incantatores captivos se diabolo tradentes; fidem suam falso testimonio expugnantes; homicidiis vel fornicationibus contaminatos; furta perpetantes; sacrum veritatis nomen perjurii temeritate violantes." (Egberti Eborac. Dial. c. 15, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. iii. p. 402; Wilkins, Concilia, vol. i. p. 85.)

which were laid down between the 4th and the 9th centuries, grouping them as—I. Personal. II. Civil; III. Ecclesiastical; IV. Literary.

I. Personal Qualifications.—1. A clerk must be sound of limb, Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 3; 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; 4 Conc. Tollet. c. 19; especially he must not have mutilated himself with a view to living in chastity, Conc. Nicaen. c. 1 (cf. Socrat. H. E. 2, 26; Theodor. H. E. 2, 24); Can. Apost. c. 22; 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 7. At the same time it was held in early times that the Levitical regulations (Levit. xxi. 17 sqq.) did not strictly apply to the Christian church, and when the monk Ammonius tried to disqualify himself for ordination by cutting off his ear his mutilation was held to be no bar (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca. c. 12, Migne, P. G. vol. xxxiv. 1032; Sozomen, H. E. 6, 30); but when in later times the Levitical analogy was strictly applied, the loss of any part of any member was held to be a disqualification, and Innocent III. (Epist. x. 124) gives a special dispensation to one whose finger had been cut off against his will (the canonists based their rule on a pseudo-decretal of Innocent I. Hinschius, p. 533; Regino Prumiens. de Eccles. Discipl. lib. i. 410; Burchard, lib. ii. c. 14; Migne, P. L. vol. cxxii. p. 272). Some later Roman pontificals (quoted by Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 2) require the examiners to feel (palpare), as well as diligently to observe the persons of candidates, and even to require them to take off their shoes, lest there should be a deformity in their feet. 2. (1) A presbyter must be at least thirty years of age. This rule, which was based on a reference to the age at which our Lord began his ministry, was first laid down by Conc. Neocaes. A.D. 314, c. 11; but it does not appear to have been universally accepted, inasmuch as Jerome has to defend upon general grounds the ordination of his brother, Paulinianus, at that age (S. Hieron. Epist. 82 (62) ad Theoph. vol. i. p. 518). But it was recognised by a Syrian council, A.D. 405 (?), c. 24 (Mansi, vol. vii. 1181), by several Western councils, 4 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 1, 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6, 4 Conc. Tollet. A.D. 633, c. 20, and by the Trullan council, c. 14. It is also recognised in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 13, and in the Carolingian capitularies, Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 49 ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 75. Bishops were sometimes ordained at an earlier age, but until the 8th century there is probably no instance of such an ordination of a presbyter. The instances even then belong to the outlying provinces of Christendom. Bede, in his history of the monastery of Wearmouth (Migne, P. L. vol. xciv. 729), clearly implies that Ceolfrid was ordained presbyter at the age of twenty-seven; and pope Zachary gives permission to Boniface, "the apostle of Germany," in 751, to ordain presbyters, in cases of emergency, at the age of twenty-five (S. Zachar. Epist. 13, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxix. 952; Gratian, pars i. dist. 78, c. 5). On the other hand, some canonists allowed of no exception to the rule which made thirty the minimum age, Burchard. Wormat. Decret. ii. c. 9, Ivon. Carnot. Decret. vi. c. 30, Panorm. iii. 29; so the Conc. Melfi. A.D. 1089, c. 4. But the rule was ultimately relaxed, and the council of Ravenna, A.D. 1314, c. 2, fixed the age at twenty-five; so Stat. Eccles. Cadurc. et

Ruth. ap. Martene et Durand, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 718, and the modern Roman pontifical. The Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu also allow ordination to the presbyterate at the age of twenty-five (Tract. vi. c. 4, can. 2, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. x. p. 112). (2) The age of deacons was originally fixed at twenty-five; so Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 16 (but one version of 3 Conc. Carth. c. 4, which is in other respects identical with this canon, adds the proviso, "nisi primum divinis scripturis instructi vel ab infantia eruditi propter fidei professionem vel assertionem"); so with the Gallican and Spanish councils, Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 16, 4 Conc. Arelat. c. 1 (but the vigorous bishop Caesarius, who presided at this council and subscribed its acts, is said by his biographers never to have ordained a deacon under thirty, Vit. S. Caesar. Arelat. 1, 43, Migne, P. L. vol. lxvii. 1022), 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 20; so also with the Trullan council, c. 14, and in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 13 (the later Roman use fixed it at twenty-four, Pontific. Roman. p. 1, tit. 2, 2). (3) The age of a subdeacon does not appear to have been fixed by any canon in the West earlier than 2 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 531, c. 1 (where, however, it is only an inference that the age mentioned applies to all subdeacons), and in the East earlier than Conc. Trull. A.D. 692, c. 15; in both cases the age mentioned is twenty. Justinian fixed it at twenty-five (Novell. 123, c. 13), but the later civil law agrees with the canon law (Leo Constit. 16 and 75). But it is clear that there was in subsequent times considerable variety of usage. Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. 2, 3, 21, makes fourteen the limit; the council of Melfi in 1089, c. 4, Mansi, xx. 723, makes fourteen or fifteen. In the Gesta Abbat. S. Trudon. lib. viii. c. 2, Migne, P. L. clxxiii. p. 113, Rudolph becomes subdeacon at eighteen, which is the age fixed by the statutes of Cahors and Rodez in 1289, Martene and Durand, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 718. The council of Ravenna, A.D. 1314, c. 2, Mansi, vol. xxv. 537, makes sixteen the limit; but the almost contemporaneous Conc. Vienn. under Clement V. in 1311, makes twenty-two, and this age was adopted by the council of Trent, and remains in the present Roman ordinal. (4) There is no canonical limit of age for minor orders. The civil law fixes the minimum age for a reader at eighteen (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 13), but it is clear that ordination might canonically take place at a much earlier age. There had already arisen in the West, and there soon afterwards arose in the East, the custom of dedicating children to the service of the church in their earliest years; hence the text of the Nomocanon, which incorporates the regulation of Justinian, varies in good MSS. between the ages of eight, eighteen, and twenty; and the Scholiast ad loc. finds it impossible to reconcile any of these readings with the practice of his day which allowed ordinations to the lectorate at the age of five or six. The letter of Siricius (Hinschius, p. 522, Migne, P. L. vol. xiii. 1142; quoted by the canonists, Gratian, pars i. dist. 77, 3, Ivon. Carnot. Decret. 6, 91) directs that "whoever has devoted himself to the service of the church ought from his infancy, before the age of puberty, to be baptized and associated with the ministry of readers." The letter of Zosimus (Hinschius, p. 553, Migne, P. L. vol. xx. 672; quoted by Gratian, pars i. dist. 77, 2) directs that "if any one has given his name from infancy to the ministry of the church, let him remain among the readers until the age of twenty." In Gaul the council of Vaison in 529, c. 1, in Africa the third council of Carthage, c. 19, and in Spain the second council of Toledo in 589, c. 1, provide for the case of readers marrying when they attain to puberty; and the fact of early ordinations is proved by historical examples, e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. iv. 25, p. 126; S. Paulin. Nolan. Poem. XV. de S. Felice, v. 108; Anastas. Liber. Pontif. de S. Eugenio I. p. 134, "clericus a cunabulis"; and an extant inscription at Viviers to a reader who died at the age of thirteen, ap. Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, No. 484. The later mediæval practice, which was adopted by the council of Trent, was not to confer the tonsure before the age of seven.

II. Civil Qualifications.—1. In regard to the admission of slaves to orders both the canon and the civil law varied at different times: in the East the only early regulation is Can. Apost. 82, which allows slaves to be ordained only when they have been manumitted; this agrees with the civil law, Justin, Cod. I. 3, 37 (36), Novell. 123, 17. In the West the earliest regulation is that of Conc. Illiber. A.D. 305, c. 8, which disallows the ordination even of a freedman whose patronus was in saeculo; but 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 400, c. 10 allows such ordination with the patron's consent. In the fifth century Leo the Great, writing to the bishops of Campania, objects to the ordination of slaves as inconsistent with the dignity of the clerical office, but is at the same time a witness to the occurrence of such ordinations." (S. Leon. M. Epist. 4 (3) ad Epist. Campan. i. p. 612; for the meaning of "originali," cf. St. August. de Civit. Dei, 10, 1, "conditionem debent genitali solo propter agriculturam sub dominio possessorum.") In Gaul it would appear that ordination was at one time held to involve manumission, for 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 8, enacts that if a bishop knowingly ordains a slave without the consent of his master he must pay "duplex satisfactio;" if he has done it ignorantly, then those who "testimonium perhibent aut eum supplicaverint ordinari" are to pay such satisfaction; (this seems to imply that part of the "testimonium" which was required before ordination was that the candidate was free.) In a council held in the same city a quarter of a century later, there is a definite exclusion of both slaves and serfs: aut nullus servilibus colonariisque conditionibus obligatus juxta statuta sedis apostolicae ad honores ecclesiasticos admittatur, nisi prius aut testamento aut per tabulas legitime constiterit absolutum (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 26;) but eleven years later this rule was relaxed, and a slave might be ordained with his master's consent, or, if ordained without such consent, "is qui ordinatus est, benedictione servata, honestum ordini domino suo impendat obsequium," i.e. he might continue to be a clerk without ceasing to be a slave; it is, however, also provided that the bishop might, if the master preferred, give him two slaves in place of the one who had been ordained (5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 6). In Ireland the canons of St. Patrick, which are probably at least a century later than the foregoing councils, clearly imply that a clerk might be a slave; c. 7 provides for the excommunication of a clerk who is negligent in coming to prayers: "nisi forte jugo servitutis sit detentus." But in England Egbert of York, about the same period, expressly disallows the ordination of slaves, at least to the diaconate (Egberti Eborac. Dial. c. 15, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. iii. p. 402). The Carolingian rule was equally strict; if a slave was ordained without first obtaining his liberty he must lose his orders and go back to his master (Capit. Hludowici I. Aquisgran. general. A.D. 817, c. 6, ap. Pertz, i. p. 207, cf. Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 30; Pertz, vii. p. 79; Capit. Ticin. A.D. 801, c. 22; Pertz, i. p. 86).

2. The privileges and IMMUNITIES [p. 822] which Constantine at first conferred upon the clergy caused so many rich men to seek refuge from the burdens of taxation by taking office in the church that it speedily became necessary to enact that no person whose fortune placed him in the rank of those upon whom the weight of public burdens fell should be allowed to become a clerk; the first law on the subject has not been preserved, but the continuation of it which enacts that it shall not be retrospective is found in Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 3, A.D. 320. It was re-enacted by Constantius in 361, Cod. Theodos. 8, 4, 7 = Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 4; and again, in effect, by Honorius and Arcadius in 398, Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 32; fifty years later a law of Theodosius and Valentinian allowed ordained persons who were liable to municipal duties to discharge those duties by deputy, Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 21; but Justinian found it necessary absolutely to prohibit the ordination of persons who: θεσπίζομεν μηδένα παντελῶς μήτε βουλευτὴν μήτε ταξέωτην ἐπίσκοπον ἢ πρεσβύτερον τοῦ λοιποῦ γίνεσθαι (Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 53 (52); so, also, id. Novell. 6, c. 4; 123, c. 15). The necessity for such a provision appears even from ecclesiastical writers, e.g. Basil speaks of τῶν πλείστων φόβῳ τῆς στρατολογίας εἰσποιοῦντων ἑαυτοὺς τῇ ὑπηρεσίᾳ (S. Basil, Epist. 54 (181); Migne, P. G. 32, 400; cf. Joann. Diac. Vit. S. Gregor. M. 2, 15, vol. i. p. 49); and the rule itself was accepted, e.g., by Gregory the Great, Epist. 4, 26, ad Januar. vol. ii. p. 704, "videndum ne obnoxius curiae [i.e. liable to serve on a municipal senate] compellatur post sacrum ordinem ad actionem publicam redire"; and by 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19; Egbert. Eborac. Dial. c. 15. The Frankish kings enacted that no freeman should be ordained without the permission of the king or his officer: 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511 (shortly before the death of Chlodwig), c. 4, enacts "ut nullus saecularium ad clericatus officium praesumatur nisi aut cum regis jussione aut cum judicis voluntate"; in the following century another Frankish council, Conc. Remens. circ. A.D. 625, repeats the enactment; and among the Formulae Marculphi is a letter from a king giving such a permission (Formulae Marculphi, 1, 19, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxvii. p. 712). Several instances are found in the biographies of the same century, e.g. Sulpice of Bourges (Notit. in S. Sulpit. c. 8; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxx. p. 577); Ouen of Rouen (Vit. S. Audōn. ap. Sur. 24 Aug.). Charles the Great found it necessary again to renew the enactment (Capit. duplex in Theod. Villa, A.D. 805, c. 15; Pertz, 1, p. 134); but it is not found out of the Frankish domain.

III. Ecclesiastical Qualifications.—1. Baptism. It was so invariably assumed that any one who was advanced to office in the church had already been made a member of the church by baptism that the enactment of a canon on the subject was unnecessary. At Alexandria a catechumen might be a reader or singer, but the custom is mentioned as exceptional by Socrates, H. E. 5, 22, and, moreover, readers and singers were sometimes not reckoned in the clerus at all. In the middle of the 3rd century Cornelius of Rome expresses a doubt whether clinic baptism was sufficient in the case of Novatian, inasmuch as it had not been followed by confirmation (Euseb. H. E. 6, 43); and early in the following century the council of Neocaesarea, c. 12, is disposed, except in special cases (εἰ μὴ τάχα διὰ τὴν μετὰ ταῦτα αὐτοῦ [i.e., of the baptized person] σπουδὴν καὶ πίστιν καὶ διὰ πάντων ἀνθρώπων), to disallow altogether the ordination of those who had received clinic baptism. But the non-renewal of the enactment (except in 6 Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, c. 8, Mansi, 14, 542, which extends it to all irregular baptisms) makes it probable that it was construed rather in the spirit of its exceptions than in that of its main provision. The case of a presbyter being ordained before being baptized was so rare that no provision is made for it in any canon of the first eight centuries. The general case of uncertain or defective baptism is sometimes mentioned in ecclesiastical writers, e.g. S. Dionys. Alexand. Ep. ad Xystum ap. Euseb. H. E. 7, 9; S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 66 (35) ad Neon. Ravenn. p. 1407; id. Ep. 67 (2) ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 17, 18, p. 1427; but the special case of an unbaptized presbyter is first mentioned in Abp. Theodore's Penitential at the end of the 8th century, who apparently deals with two contingencies: a. If the presbyter has been ordained through ignorance on the part of his ordainer that he has not been baptized, the ordination is invalid, the baptisms performed by the supposed presbyter are also invalid, and he himself must be baptized, but cannot be reordained (Poenit. 1, 9, 12; Hadlan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. iii.). b. If a presbyter is ordained under the belief that he has been baptized, and then discovers that he has not, he may be both baptized and reordained, but persons baptized by him must be rebaptized (id. 2, 2, 13). In the following century a capitulary of Pippin, which mentions a similar case, does not specify what is to be done with the presbyter, but allows his baptisms provided that the Holy Trinity was invoked at the time (Capit. Compendiense, A.D. 757, c. 12; Pertz. Legum, vol. i. p. 28). As the imposition of hands was an integral part of baptism, it must be held to be implied in the general regulations as to baptism; the explicit mention of it as a condition of ordination is much later. (But it is sometimes supposed to be meant in Conc. Nicaen. c. 8, which requires returning Cathari to be χειροθετούμενους; so Hefele ad loc. and Catalani ad Pontific. Roman. p. 1. tit. 2, 3; but Gratian, 8, 1, 7, and others understand ordination, not confirmation, to be meant.)

2. There was a further rule that ordination was not to follow too closely upon baptism; the Pauline μὴ νεόφυτον (1 Tim. iii, 7) expresses both the ordinary rule and the ordinary practice. During the early years of Christianity it was obviously important that before a person was advanced to office in a church, and especially to an office which involved disciplinary control, sufficient opportunity should be given for the observation and testing of his character. The leading early canon on the subject is that of the council of Nicaea, c. 2, which refers to an otherwise unknown earlier canon (perhaps that which is embodied in Can. Apost. 80), and speaks of its having been frequently broken. The drift of the canon is clear, although there is some doubt as to the exact interpretation of the text. Rufinus, H. E. 2, 6, sums it up thus, "ne quis nuper assumptus de vita vel conversatione Gentili, accepto baptismo, antequam cautius examinetur, clericus fiat"; so also the later canonists, e.g. Gratian, 1, dist. 48 (see Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. i.). It was repeated in effect in the same century by Conc. Laod. c. 3; but although it continued to be valid, as is seen from e.g. S. Leon. M. Epist. 12, c. 4, i. p. 663, 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19, yet the necessity for it practically ceased to exist when the great mass of the population came to be of Christian parentage and to have received baptism in infancy. Gregory the Great interprets the Pauline injunction as having in his time a different meaning from that which it had in the earlier ages of the church; he applies it not to first ordination, but to subsequent promotion, and paraphrases it by "ordinate ergo ad ordines accedendum est" (S. Greg. M. Epist. ix. 106, vol. ii. p. 1009). But two centuries after the council of Nicaea the spirit of the canon was revived in another form in Spain and Gaul. A period of probation was imposed before even one who had been a Christian all his life could be admitted, if not to minor orders, at least to the diaconate. 4 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 2, 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6, 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 9, enact that no one is to be ordained "nisi post annuam conversionem," i.e. except after a year's withdrawal from secular pursuits and devotion to a religious life. 3 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 20, enacts, what is not expressly stated in the Gallican canons, that this year is to be spent in minor orders "[nisi] . . . in officio lectorati vel subdiaconati disciplinam ecclesiasticam discat." But there is no evidence of the existence of these regulations outside the limits of Gaul and Spain, and their absence from the list of disqualifications in 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19 (see above) is presumptive evidence of their not having been permanent even within those limits.

3. It was an early and apparently a universal rule that no one who had ever forfeited his position as a full member of the church, by 'professing penitence,' should be admitted to office. Before the age of councils the rule is mentioned by Origen (c. Cels. 3, c. 51, i. p. 482, ed. Delarue), and Augustine gives the reason for it, "ne forsitan etiam detectis criminibus spe honoris ecclesiastici animus intumescens superbe ageret poenitentiam, severissime placuit ut post actam de crimine damnabili poenitentiam nemo sit clericus ut desperatione temporalis altitudinis medicina major et verior esset humilitatis" (S. Augustin. Epist. 185 (50), c. 10, ii. p. 812). The Roman rule admitted of no exceptions: Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 3; S. Siric. Epist. 1, c. 14;

Hinschius, p. 522; Migne, P. L. vol. xiii. 1145; so also the Gallican rule, Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 43; Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 3; 4 Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 3; 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; so also the African rule, Stat. Eccles. Antiq. c. 68; so also the early Pontificals, quoting the decretal of Zosimus, Pontif. Eccl. S. Dunstan, Noviom., Sacram. Gelas. But the Spanish rule admitted of exceptions. 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 435, c. 2, makes the proviso "nisi tantum [si] necessitas aut usus exegerit inter ostiarios deputetur vel inter lectores"; and two later councils, Conc. Gerund. A.D. 517, c. 9, 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 54, allow the ordination of persons who made a general profession of penitence in extreme sickness, "nulla manifesta scelera confitentes sed tantum peccatores se praedicantes," and who afterwards recovered. (At the same time there is a treatise of Catalani, printed as a note to 10 Conc. Tolet. in his edition of De Aguirre's Concilia Hispaniae, vol. iv. pp. 163-194, "De disciplina antiquae ecclesiae speciatim Hispanicae circa lapsos in peccatum carnis post baptismum ne ordinentur nec administrent ordines jam susceptos.")

4. It was enacted, with a frequency which indicates that the rule was often broken, that no one should be ordained out of the church to which he belonged (i.e. probably, the church in which he had been baptized, but the question is not easy of determination: see the discussion of it in Hallier de Sacris Electionibus, pp. 605, sqq.), or promoted to a higher grade out of the church in which he was first ordained. Violations of this rule rendered the ordination invalid (ἀκυρος ἔσται ἡ χειροτονία), according to Conc. Nicaen. c. 16; Antioch. c. 24; Sardic. c. 15, 2 Arelat. A.D. 451, c. 13; 5 Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 7; 1 Turon. A.D. 461, c. 9, 10 (which, however, has the proviso, "nisi satisfactione quae ad pacem pertinent componantur"). Conc. Chalc. c. 10 excommunicates both the ordaining bishop and the ordained clerk until the latter returns to his own church; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 5, suspends the ordaining bishop for three months, and the ordained clerk during the pleasure of his proper bishop. The rule is also found, but without any express penalty for the violation of it, in Africa, 3 Conc. Carth. c. 21, 44 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 54; in Gaul, Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, c. 8; Venet. A.D. 465, c. 10; Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 11; in Spain, Conc. Illob. A.D. 305, c. 24; Valent. A.D. 524 (546), c. 6; 2 Brac. A.D. 563, c. 8; in the Capit. Hadrian. A.D. 785, c. 18; and in the Carolingian capitularies, e.g. Karoli Magni Capit. A.D. 779, c. 2; Capit. in Papia, A.D. 789, c. 3; Pertz, i. p. 70. The regulation probably arose in the first instance from the desirability of a man's being ordained among those who could bear witness to his innocence of life and soundness in the faith (so expressly Conc. Illob. c. 24), but it was kept up in later times chiefly in the interests of ecclesiastical organization. (For the origin of the system of dismissory letters, see DIMISSORY LETTERS, Vol. I. p. 558.)

5. The regulations in regard to the marriage of candidates for orders were governed by the Pauline injunction, μὴς γυναικὸς ἀνδρες (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). As to the interpretation of that injunction, there appears to have been a consensus of opinion; it excluded those who, having lost one wife, had married another. But two questions arose: firstly, whether the rule applied in the case in which the first wife had been married before baptism; secondly, whether the rule applied to others than presbyters and deacons. On these questions there were varieties of opinion; as to the first, the Eastern rule seems to have been that only marriages after baptism were to be reckoned; so Can. Apost. 17, ἡ δὲ ἀλλοτρία γάμος συμπλακεῖς μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα, Conc. Trull. c. 3; cf. Balsam. ad loc. This limitation of the rule is defended at length by Jerome, Ep. 69 (83) ad Ocean. i. p. 411, but herein Jerome stands almost alone among Western writers. (At the same time it may be noted that Jerome's general view of digamy was of the strictest; cf. Epist. 123 (11), c. 6, i. p. 904). The Western rule rigidly excluded from the priesthood all who had married a second wife, whether the first marriage had taken place before or after baptism; so S. Ambros. de Off. Ministr. i. 50, ii. p. 66; S. Augustin. de Bono Conjug. c. 18; Migne, 6, p. p. 387; S. Leon. Epist. 5, c. 3, vol. i. p. 617; Innocent. I. Epist. ad Victorice. Hinschius, p. 530; Migne, P. L. vol. xx. 474; Zosim. Epist. ad Hesych. Hinschius, p. 553, quoted (sometimes as a decretal of Innocent I.) in the pontificals of Egbert, St. Dunstan, Cahors, Jumièges, Vatic. ap. Muratori, and in the Gelasian sacramentary; and the later canonists, e. l. Gratian, 1, dist. 26, 3; D. Ivon. Decret. i. 292. (It is probable that the exceptions mentioned by Tertull. de Exhort. Cast. c. 7 [Montanist], and Hippol. Philosophum, 9, 12, refer to violations not of the rule in general, but of this stricter interpretation of it.) The attempt to extend the rule to all clerks was not altogether successful, and the fluctuations of opinion which are marked in the successive enactments are worthy of study. The following are the more important enactments which bear upon the admission of married persons to orders; for a more general account of the regulations which affected persons already in orders, see CELIBACY, DIGAMY. (1) No one who had married a second wife could become a clerk: Can. Apost. 17; 1 Conc. Valen. A.D. 374 (?), c. 1; Rom. A.D. 465, c. 2; Gerund. A.D. 517, c. 8 (which excludes any one who, after the death of his wife, "aliam cujuscunque conditionis cognoverit mulierem"); 4 Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 3 (which speaks of the necessity which had arisen for imposing a severer penalty for the violation of the rule); 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; Stat. Eccles. Antiq. c. 69; 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19; Rom. A.D. 743, c. 11; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 10; and in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 12 (but apparently limited to presbyters and deacons in id. Novell. 6, 5). (2) No one in a similar case could be a deacon or presbyter: Origen in Luc. Hom. 17, iii. p. 953, ed. Delarue; Justin. Novell. 6, 5; 123, 14; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 2. (3) No one who had married one who had been herself married before, whether widow or divorcee, could be ordained: Can. Apost. c. 17; 1 Conc. Valen. A.D. 374, c. 1; Rom. A.D. 465, c. 2; 3 Aurel. c. 6; 4 Arelat. c. 3; Epaon. c. 2; Stat. Eccles. Ant. c. 69; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, 11; Zosim. Epist. ad Hesych.; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 10; Egbert. Eborac. Dial. c. 15; Conc. Trull. c. 3. (4) No one could be ordained who had married two sisters (Can. Apost. 19), or his niece (id.), or an actress, or slave, or courtesan (id. 18. Conc.

Trull. c. 3), or who had a concubine (Can. Apost. 19; 4 Conc. Tol. c. 19; Trull. c. 3; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 6), or whose wife had been guilty of adultery (Conc. Neocaes. c. 8; cf. S. Basil. Epist. Canon. iii. c. 69). (5) The earliest positive prohibition of the ordination of all married persons is 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 2, "assumi aliquem ad sacerdotium non posse in conjugii vinculo constitutum nisi fuerit praemissa conversio" [i.e. renunciation of married and secular life], but the date and authority of this council are both very uncertain.

6. Some other ecclesiastical disqualifications appear to have been of a local or temporary nature. (1) Can. Apost. 79, Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6, 11 Tolet. c. 13, enact that no one who had been possessed by an evil spirit could be ordained (cf. the story told by Gregory the Great in his life of St. Benedict of the youth who was exorcised by St. Benedict, and told never to enter holy orders; on his attempting to do so, the evil spirit returned: St. Greg. Dial. 2, c. 16; Migne, P. L. vol. lxvi. p. 164). (2) 1 Conc. Carth. c. 8 enacts that no one can be ordained until he has rendered his accounts as procurator, actor, or tutor pupilorum, in order to secure his entire disentanglement from secular business. (3) The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua exclude "seditiosarios, usurarios, et injuriarum suarum ultores" (cf. S. Basil. Epist. 188 [canonica prima], c. 14, p. 275). (4) In England the Dialogue of Egbert gives an indication of the mixed character of the English church in the middle of the 8th century by expressly excluding "idola adorantes, per aruspices [et divinos atque] incantatores captivos se diabolo tradentes" (Egbert. Eborac. Dial. c. 15; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402; Wilkins, i. 82). (5) Illegitimacy was first made a bar by the synod of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 64, but even then there was the exception, "nisi ecclesiae utilitas vel necessitas vel meritum praerogative aliter exegerit"; but the question was an open one for some time afterwards, as is shewn by the discussion between Roscelin and Theobald d'Estampes, whether the son of a priest, as being necessarily born "ex lapsu carnis," could be ordained (Theobald's argument against the exclusion of such persons is given in D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. iii. p. 448). In the East a canon of Nicephorus, sometimes printed as an addition to the canons of Chalcedon, Pitra, Spicileg. Solesm. vol. iv. 465, id. Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 536, vol. ii. p. 328, expressly allows the ordination of the offspring of concubinage, digamy, or even fornication; but the Western rule was severer, and it further ranked as illegitimate the children of heretics and slaves (cf. Catalani ad Pontif. Roman. p. 1, tit. 2, 1, §§ 5, 18).

7. Of later regulations, the most important was that which required every candidate for orders to have a fixed source of income, or titulus.*

* The meaning of the word titulus, like that of canon, in its ecclesiastical sense, has been so often misunderstood that it is advisable to mention the chief facts in regard to its use. It is a technical term of Roman law where, from its original use in relation to taxable real property, it came to be used of taxable property, and of property yielding revenue, in general: Cod. Theodos. lib. xi. tit. 26, 1 = Cod. Justin. lib. x. tit. 30, 1 (a law of A.D. 369), "in eodem titulo et in eodem modo ad solven-

In the earliest period, when each church had its own bishop, and parish was synonymous with diocese, appointment to office was, from the nature of the case, appointment to a particular office in a particular church. This primitive practice of appointments seems to have been first departed from in the 5th century; but the departure from it was strongly condemned by the council of Chalcedon, c. 6, which enacted that the ordination of those who were ἀπολύτως χειροτονούμενοι and not ἰδικῶς ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ πόλεως ἢ κόμης ἢ μαρτυρίῳ ἢ μοναστηρίῳ should be invalid. For three centuries after the enactment of this canon there appears to be no necessity for re-enacting it; but it reappears in the Dialogue of Egbert, c. 9 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. vol. iii.) and in the Carolingian Capitularies, e.g. Karoli Capit. Eccles. A.D. 789, c. 25; Pertz, vol. i. 58; Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 28, ap. Pertz, vol. i. p. 74, "ut non absolute ordinentur," Capit. Excerpt. A.D. 806, c. 7, Pertz, vol. i. 147. In the meantime it had become the custom at all ordinations to major orders to designate the particular church which the ordinand was to serve, and from which he was to derive his income. This is the case in the Pontificals of Egbert, St. Dunstan, Vatican ap. Muratori, Rodrad, Rouen, Reims, Noyon, Ratold, and the Gelasian Sacramentary (but the omission in the Missale Francorum and the Cod. Maffeianus is to be noted). But there does not appear to be any direct canonical requirement of a titulus earlier than the end of the 11th century: Conc. Placent. A.D. 1095, c. 15, "decernimus ut sine titulo facta ordinatio irrita habeatur"; at the same time Urban II., under whom this council was held, in writing to the bishop of Toul, leaves it to his discretion to allow such ordinations or not (Append. ad Epist. Urbani Papae II. No. xvii. ap. Mansi, vol. xx. 676).

IV. Literary Qualifications.—It both follows from and confirms the general view of the nature of the clerical office in the primitive church that literary qualifications were viewed as subordinate and non-essential. The Pastoral Epistles require that a bishop shall be "apt to teach" (δικαδικός, 1 Tim. iii. 2, which is paraphrased in Const. Apost. 7, 31, into δυνάμενος διδάσκειν τὸν λόγον τῆς εὐσεβείας), but early Christian literature distinctly contemplates the existence of an unlettered bishop (Διατ. Κλήμ. 16 (18), παιδείας μέτοχος, δυνάμενος τὰς γραφὰς ἐρμηνεύειν· εἰ δὲ ἀγράμματος, πρὸς ὑπάρχων καὶ τῇ ἀγάπῃ εἰς πάντας περισσευέτω). For the first four centuries there are no conciliar or other regulations requiring knowledge of letters as a qualification for orders; and Jerome expressly mentions that, in his time, "judicio Domini et populorum suffragio in sacerdotium simplices [i.e. illiterate persons] eligi; saltem illud habeant ut postquam sacerdotes fuerint ordinati discant legem Dei ut possint docere quod didicerint et augeant scientiam magis quam opes" (S. Hieron. Comment. in Aggae, c. 2, v. 11, vi. p. 761). But in the 5th century the altered position of the clergy in reference to the laity, the formation of a liturgy, and the growing tendency to lay stress on formulae, rendered it necessary to lay a stress which had not been laid before on the possession of certain rudiments of education. A Syrian synod in 405 (?) (Mansi, vii. 1181), c. 26, enacts that not even a subdeacon is to be ordained until he is not only otherwise instructed in doctrine, but can say the Psalter; and the Roman council of 465 (?), c. 3, enacts that "inscii quoque litterarum . . . ad sacros ordines aspirare non audeant." But the first well-established enactments are those of the civil law. Justin. Novell. 6, 4, A.D. 535, enacts that clerks must be γραμμάτων ἐπιστήμονες, at any rate presbyters and deacons; so Novell. 123, c. 12, of clerks without reservation. From the 7th century onwards, and in the later canonists, knowledge of letters, the degree and kind, however, rarely specified, is made an indispensable qualification: 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19; 8 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 8, which specifies the requisite knowledge to be that of "totum psalterium vel canticorum usualium et hymnorum sive baptizandi supplementum"; in England, Dial. Egbert. Eborac. c. 15; among the Culdees of Scotland and Ireland, "Prose Rule of the Céli Dé," in Reeves' The Culdees of the British Islands, p. 95; in the Frankish kingdom, Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 20, Pertz, i. 73; in the canonists, Gratian. p. 1, dist. 24, c. 5 = D. Ivon. Carnot. Panorm. 3, c. 21 = ejusd. Decret. 6, c. 21; Burchard Wormat. Decret. 2, 18. The further regulations, themselves also comparatively rare, which specially apply to the higher orders, corroborate the inference that the knowledge of letters which was requisite for admission to the lower orders must at first have been extremely small. 2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 16, enacts that no one can be ordained presbyter or deacon "sine litteris vel si baptizandi ordinem nesciat." Conc. Narbon. A.D. 589 enacts that no bishop is to ordain an illiterate person presbyter or deacon; if such persons have been already ordained, they must be compelled to learn; if any one will not learn, he must lose his stipend. If he is still obstinate, he must be relegated to a monastery "quia non potest aedificare populum." Gregory the Great, about the same time, objects to Rusticus, a deacon who was candidate for the bishopric of Ancona, that he was reported not to know the Psalter, and suggests that the bishop to whom he is writing dum protinus urgeatur in quo alterum perperam fecerit debitorum," where Cujacius, ad loc. Cod. Justin., explains the words in italics, "in eodem tit. puta in auro vel in argento et in eodem modo id eadem quantitate"; Cod. Theodos. lib. xii. tit. 9, 3 = Cod. Justin. lib. x. tit. 73, 3; lib. xi. tit. 64, 5 (a law of A.D. 399), "sciunt iudices nihil sibi ex privatae rei canone vel eo quod ex iisdem titulis exegerint ad necessitates alias transferre licere"; Cod. Theodos. lib. xii. tit. 28, 12, "per universos," i.e. districts yielding taxable revenues; ibid. lib. xi. tit. 2, 4, tit. 12, 2, "annonarius titulus," i.e. a district yielding taxable corn: cf. "canonici tituli," ibid. lib. xiv. tit. 16, 3, "frumentarii tituli": ibid. lib. xi. tit. 1, 36, "canonici tituli." Hence the use in the Liber Pontificalis of the districts, i.e. parishes into which Rome was divided for ecclesiastical purposes, and each of which had its proper revenues: e.g. Vit. S. Marcell. p. 31, xxv. "titulos in urbe Roma constituit quasi dioceses propter baptismum et poenitentiam multorum qui convertebantur ex paganis et propter sepulturas martyrum": cf. ibid. Vit. S. Evarist. p. 6; Vit. S. Leon. p. 26. Hence the mediaeval meaning of ecclesiastical income, e.g. 3 Conc. Lateran. A.D. 1179, c. 5, "Episcopus si aliquem sine certo titulo de quo necessaria vitae percipiat in diaconum vel presbyterum ordinaverit"; Synod. Exon. A.D. 1287, c. 8, "Caveant ad sacros ordines promovendi ut titulum habeant sufficientem"; Sarum Pontifical ap. Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. iii. p. 156, "Nullus sine vero titulo vel ejus titulus ad non titulum est deductus."

should find out "quantos psalmos in nus teneat" (S. Greg. Magn. Epist. 14, 11, vol. ii. p. 1269). No doubt Gregory's personal influence did much to raise the ordinary standard of attainment; and two centuries after his time his own works were ranked with the Gospels, the Epistles, and the apostolical canons, as constituting the proper objects of a priest's study: Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, præf.; 3 Conc. Turon. A.D. 813, c. 3; 2 Conc. Cabillon. A.D. 813, c. 1, and elsewhere. So also a knowledge of the calendar was required, e. g. by Hincmar, Capit. Synod. c. 8, A.D. 852. How much knowledge of Scripture was required in the 9th century is shewn by the selection of passages which was framed, in order that candidates might learn it by heart, by Prudentius of Troyes (S. Prudent. Trec. Florilegium, ap. Trombelli Vet. Patr. Opp. Bonon. 1753, from a MS. furnished by Bianchini).

In the East the standard of attainment seems to have fallen very low. 2 Conc. Nicaen. A.D. 787, c. 2, found it necessary to make an explicit regulation that every one who was advanced to the office of a bishop must know the psalter and be able to read the Scriptures and the canons. Still later, the Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu (Tract. vi. c. 4, can. 3, ap. Mai Script. Vett. vol. x. p. 12) enact that no one must be ordained city deacon who does not know the lessons and epistles, but a country deacon may in cases of emergency be allowed who knows only some of the psalter. The implication is that in neither case was it required that he should be able to read, but only that he should know the prescribed portions by heart.

2. Mode of Testing Qualifications. Examination.

—It has already been pointed out that the ecclesiastical followed the analogy of the civil organization in requiring definite qualifications in its officers; it is also probable that the same analogy was followed in regard to the mode of testing those qualifications. At the time of election to office, either before votes were recorded or before the election was declared, the returning officer of an ecclesiastical as of a civil community enquired viva voce whether the necessary conditions had been fulfilled. This enquiry was made not of the person elected, but of those who voted for him, or who presented him for admission. It was an enquiry almost entirely into moral fitness. The reason which Cyprian gives for making ecclesiastical appointments in the common assembly of the church is that "in the presence of the people the crimes of the bad and the merits of the good may alike be disclosed, and that the ordination may be regular and legitimate which has been tested by the vote and judgment of all" ("omnium suffragio et iudicio examinata," S. Cyprian, Epist. 68, 3, vol. i. p. 1026). In another passage, Cyprian appears to distinguish between the testimony which was given by the clergy and the vote which was given by the people (id. inter Epist. S. Cornel. 10 vol. i. p. 770). This testimony is distinctly described by Basil as the result of previous enquiry and examination (Epist. 54 (181) ad Chorepisc. Migne, P. G. vol. xxxii. 400); and the giving of it formed a feature in almost all rituals of ordination. But whereas in the earliest period the enquiry of the bishop was addressed to and the testimony given by the whole body of the clergy of a church, in the ensuing period two or more deacons presented and bore testimony to a deacon, two or more presbyters to a presbyter. Afterwards the practice which was peculiar to Rome in the time of Jerome (S. Hieron. Epist. 146 (85) ad Euang.) became almost universal in the West. The clergy were represented by the archdeacon who, as the chief officer of the external discipline and activity of the church, would be most likely to be cognisant of the current reputation of any of its members. (The exceptions to this practice are comparatively few in the West; the Salzburg and Cambrai pontificals and Codex Maffieianus direct a presbyter to be presented by two presbyters, and the bishop's questions are addressed to the bystanders, which may mean of all the clergy in the sanctuary.) So important was this function of the archdeacon that Balsamon (Rallé and Potlé, Συνταγ. καν. vol. iv. p. 480) expresses a doubt whether a deacon could be ordained without it. But this public examination tended to become a mere form, and was found to be insufficient. Popular testimony was apt to be partial. The bishop himself was required to take more active steps to ascertain that the ordained was worthy. Chrysostom (Hom. in parab. de dec. mill. talent., Op. ed. Migne, vol. iii. p. 23) warns his fellow bishops that this is one of the things for which they will have to give an account. Justinian (Novell. 137, c. 1) speaks of the scandal which had arisen from clerks having been ordained without due examination. The third council of Carthage, c. 22, and the third of Braga, A.D. 572, c. 3, both lay stress on such examination in addition to the requirement of testimony ("oportet non per gratiam munus sed per diligentem prius discussionem, deinde per multorum testimonium clericos ordinare"). In order that such an examination might be more effective, Gregory the Great advised Adeodatus to associate with himself "graves expertosque viros" (Epist. iii. 49, vol. ii. p. 660); and this became ultimately the general practice throughout the West. The mediæval rule was based by the canonists (Gratian, pars 1, dist. 24, c. 5; Ivo Carnot. Panorm. 3, c. 21, Decret. 6, c. 21; Burchard Wormat. 2, c. 1) on a canon of an otherwise unknown council (Conc. Nannetense, al. Manetense, said to have been held in A.D. 895, in the pontificate of Formosus), which, as it to a great extent governs the modern Roman, and also the English, practice, may be quoted here: "Quando episcopus ordinationes facere disponit omnes qui ad sacrum ministerium accedere volunt feria quarta ante ipsam ordinationem evocandi sunt ad civitatem una cum [archi]presbyteris qui eos representent debent; et tunc episcopus a latere suo eligere debet sacerdotes et alios prudentes viros gnaros divine legis et exercitatos in ecclesiasticis sanctionibus qui ordinandorum vitam, genus, patriam, aetatem, institutionem, locum ubi educati sunt, si bene sunt literati, si instructi in lege Domini, diligenter investigent; ante omnia si fidem catholicam firmiter teneant et verbis simplicibus asserere queant . . . Ita per tres continuos dies diligenter examinentur et sic sabbato qui probati inventi sunt episcopo represententur." This examination was in some dioceses supplemented, in the case of a presbyter, by a further public examination at the time of ordination in regard to his willingness to be ordained, and to be obedient to his bishop (so the Mainz and Soissons pontificals, published by Martene; one of the Corbey pontificals, published by Morin; and Hittorp, Ordo Romanus, p. 93); the former of these questions of examination was probably intended to guard against the ordinations of persons against their will (as in the case of Paulinus, S. Hieron. Epist. 51, 60, vol. i. p. 241, or of Bassianus, Acta Conc. Chalced. xi. ap. Mansi, vol. vii. p. 278), the latter to secure the often contested rights of bishops over parochial clergy [PARISH].

There was a further test, which was, however, rather negative than positive, in the appeal to the people at the time of ordination. It is probable [see ORDINATION] that originally all appointments to ecclesiastical office were made by popular election; subsequently names were proposed by the clergy or by the bishop, and although the form of a popular election still remained, yet the part of the people was confined to the exclamation ἁγίος, "dignus est"; ultimately that which survived was the appeal of the bishop to the people that, if any one knew any reason why the person elected should not be ordained, he should come forth and declare it. A novel of Justinian (Novell. 123, c. 14, and, in effect, 137, c. 3) regulates the procedure in case of an objection appearing; but the canon law appears only to provide for the general case of a bishop knowingly, or after warning, ordaining an unqualified person (e.g. 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6). It is probable that a person who made an objection which he did not succeed in substantiating was liable to the penalty of excommunication which followed all false accusations of clerks (Conc. Illib. c. 75, Agath. c. 31), and also that an objector must himself be a faithful member of the church and of irreproachable character (3 Conc. Carth. c. 8; Conc. Chalced. c. 21); hence the clause, which still remains in the Roman pontifical, in the appeal of the bishop to the people, "si quis &c. . . rerum memor sit conditionis suae." But that the checks thus imposed on groundless accusations were not intended to crush enquiry is shewn by the fact that, when the extension of the area of dioceses, and the multiplication of parishes within the limits of a single diocese, made the appeal to the people in the cathedral church at the time of ordination less effective than it had originally been, an additional test was imposed by making a previous appeal to the people of the parish in which the ordinand lived.

Ultimately there were four, and in some cases five, tests which every ordinand had to satisfy. 1. He must have the testimony of the presbyter of his parish. This was originally given viva voce at the time of ordination, and the presbyter or archpresbyter presented the ordinand personally to the bishop ("qui eos repræsentare debent," in the Conc. Nannet. quoted above); afterwards it was given in writing, and the archdeacon presented and bore testimony to all ordinands alike, both those of whom he had personal knowledge and those who had the testimony of other presbyters. 2. He must produce evidence that his intention had been publicly declared in the parish in which he lived, and that no objector had come forward. 3. He must not have been objected to, or, if objected to, must have been cleared from the objection at the time of ordination. 4. He must have been personally tested by the bishop, assisted by other competent persons. (It is possible that the testimony of the archdeacon in the modern English ordinal may partly refer to this examination; but the fact that the Conc. Nannet., which forms the canonical authority for the practice, does not mention the archdeacon, shews that originally the examination by the bishop and the enquiry by the archdeacon were distinct. The earliest mention of the archdeacon in connexion with this examination is in late pontificals: e.g. Cod. Vat. No. 4744.) 5. The public examination by the bishop, which forms part of the modern English ordinal, is an extension, apparently without early precedent, of the examination mentioned above, into an ordinand's willingness to be ordained and to obey his diocesan. In the Roman pontifical it follows ordination, and is treated not as an examination, but as a contract (Pontif. Rom. pars i. tit. 12, §§ 29, 30).

V. CIVIL STATUS, MANNER [OF LIFE, AND DISCIPLINE OF PERSONS IN HOLY ORDERS.—(i.) Civil Status: 1. In the pre-Constantinian period of church history the officers of the church had, of course, no distinct civil status. They were liable to the same burdens as all other citizens, whether Christian or pagan; they had to take their places among the decuriones, to act as trustees, and to serve in the army. Nor is there any strong presumption that the discharge of such functions, except where it involved the recognition of the State religion, was exceptionally distasteful. The sentiment of the incompatibility of church offices with active civil life first appears in North Africa. In the busy commercial towns of that thriving district the Christian communities were numerous, and the work which devolved upon their officers was consequently considerable. At the same time such officers were among the most intelligent and most trustworthy citizens. They were consequently in demand for civil offices of trust. But when thus "saeculo obstricti" (Tertull. de Praescript. haeret. c. 41) their attention was liable to be distracted, and the administration of ecclesiastical affairs to suffer. Such employments, so far as they were voluntarily undertaken and not imposed by the civil power, were therefore discouraged. In addition to this, the analogy between the Christian ministry and the Jewish priesthood was beginning to assert itself in practice, and the frequent outbreaks of persecution made the antithesis between the church and the world exceptionally strong. The writings of Cyprian contain frequent protests against the combination of church office with civil life: he inveighs against commercial bishops (De Lapsis, c. 6); he claims for church officers that they ought "nonnisi altari et sacrificiis deservire et precibus atque orationibus vacare" (Epist. 66 (1), vol. ii. p. 397); and consequently since Geminus Victor had named Faustinus, a presbyter, as his executor, he inflicts upon the former a posthumous punishment, "non est quod pro demeritione ejus apud vos fiat oblatio aut deprecatio aliqua nomine ejus in ecclesia frequentetur" (ibid.).

2. But from the time of the recognition of Christianity by the Empire, several powerful causes contributed to foster the nascent tendency to separate church officers into a class distinct, both civilly and socially, from the ordinary members of the Christian communities.

(a) The first of these causes was the concession to clerks of the immunities from public burdens which had been enjoyed by certain classes of heathen priests, and which continued to be enjoyed by some of the liberal professions. [IMMUNITIES, Vol. I. p. 882.]

But although the existence of these immunities operated powerfully to give clerks a distinct status, and although the enactment of frequent safeguards against their abuse shews that they were largely acted upon, and although, moreover, it was unlikely that anyone who could claim exemption from public burdens would voluntarily undertake them, still it is clear that the concession did not act as a prohibition, and that church officers were still entangled with civil affairs and engaged in commercial pursuits. There is a wide difference between exemption from, and ineligibility for, the discharge of civil functions: the empire granted the former, the church came to impose the latter. But it was not until the Council of Chalcedon that the holding of civil office, or the administration of secular business, became an offence against ecclesiastical law; and it was not until eighty years after that council that the civil law finally prohibited any of the higher municipal officers from being elected presbyters or bishops (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 53 (52), A.D. 532; cf. also Justin. Novell. 123, c. 15).

(b) A second important and concurrent cause was that clerks came to be in certain cases exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law. The granting of this exemption was of itself a recognition of clerks as a distinct class, and the continued existence of it naturally tended to increase the class feeling. The date of the earliest concession is not certain: Hael, Corpus Legum ante Justinianum latarum, p. 204, gathers from Sozom. H. E. i. 9, Niceph. Call. H. E. vii. 46, S. Ambros. Epist. ii. 13, that it was made by Constantine about A.D. 331. But it is not clear that either Constantine or his immediate successors did more than recognise the validity of church discipline; i.e. of the voluntary jurisdiction to which the members of Christian societies had submitted themselves.

(c) A third cause was that after the time of Constantine the funds of the churches no longer consisted wholly of voluntary and temporary offerings. The churches could inherit and hold property (law of Constantine in 321, Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 4). The provincial governors were required to furnish annual provision not only to clerks but also to widows and virgins on the church-roll (Inc. Auct. de Constant. ap. Hael, Corpus Legum ante Justin. lat. p. 196; the regulation was repealed by Julian but restored by his successor, Sozom. H. E. v. 5; Theodoret. iv. 4). A fixed proportion of the land revenues of every city was assigned to the churches and clergy (Sozom. H. E. i. 8; Niceph. Call. vii. 46: cf. Euseb. H. E. x. 6; Vit. Const. iv. 28). The rich endowments of pagan temples were transferred in some cases to the newly-recognised religion: for example, Constantine gave the church of Alexandria the revenues of the temple of the Sun (Sozom. v. 7); and Theodosius gave the same church the wealth of the temple of Serapis (id. v. 16). It is true that these endowments did not in the fourth century reach all the clergy: for example, Basil speaks of his clergy as gaining their livelihood by sedentary handicrafts (τὰς ἐδράδας τῶν τεχνῶν, Epist. 198 (263)), and of a fellow-presbyter, before his elevation to the episcopate, as working for him (κάμει οὐ μετρίως ἡμῶν ὑπηρετῶν πρὸς τὸν βίον, Epist. 36 (228)). But the fact of church officers being raised, especially in the great centres of population, such as Constantinople and Alexandria, above the necessity of work, and of their being thus withdrawn from some of the most intimate associations of ordinary life, must have contributed, probably more than any other single cause, to isolate them from the rest of the community.

The result of these and other co-operating influences was that by the close of the fifth century the officers of the Christian church enjoyed a unique position among the citizens of the Empire. Exempt, to a great extent, from public burdens, fenced round with special privileges even in civil procedure, and endowed with revenues which the State had given them special facilities for holding, they became not merely civilly distinct, but the most powerful class in the civilised world. In the East their status remained practically what the early emperors had made it until the final fall of the Eastern empire. But in the West, it was not maintained without a struggle. For example, the law of Valens and Valentinian (Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 23) had recognised the jurisdiction of local synods in all ecclesiastical causes: this enactment was repeated, though without its subsequent extensions, in the Visigothic Code; but it is clear from the "interpretatio," and from all the "epitomes," that it was understood to apply only to disputes "inter clericos" (cf. the texts in Hael, Lex Romana Visigothorum, p. 246). Even when under the Carolingians the Eastern canon law began to be recognised in the West, and to be quoted in Capitularies, it is extremely doubtful whether such a recognition amounted to a re-enactment, and whether the claims of clerks to such a separate civil status as involved separate ecclesiastical jurisdiction were ever allowed. (For the discussion of the question see Dove, de jurisdictionis ecclesiasticæ apud Germanos Gallosque progressu, Berlin, 1855; Boretius, die Capitularien im Langobardenreich, Halle, 1864; Soh, die geistliche Gerichtsbarkeit im fränkischen Reich, in the Zeitschrift f. Kirchenrecht, vol. ix. pp. 193 sqq.)

(ii.) Manner of Life.—The distinction between clergy and laity was of slow growth, and the result of many co-operating causes. Even in divine service it was not strongly defined: in social life it hardly existed at all. Like the successors of the non-juring bishops in the eighteenth century, or like the earlier preachers of the Wesleyan Methodists, the officers of the early Christian communities worked at trades, kept shops, took part in municipal affairs, and wore the dress of ordinary citizens. (See, for examples, Funk, Handel und Gewerbe im Christl. Alterthum, in the Theol. Quartalschrift, vol. lviii. 1876, pp. 371 sqq.; COMMERCE, Vol. I. p. 411.) There was no sense of incongruity in their doing so. The Apostolical Constitutions repeat with emphasis the apostolical injunction, "That if any man would not work, neither should he eat" (2 Thess. iii. 10), and appeal to the example of the Apostles themselves as fishermen, tent-makers, and tillers of the ground. But since every church was, as every Jewish synagogue had come to be after the virtual fusion of synagogues and synedria, a court of discipline; and since the chief function of the officers of the church, as officers of discipline, was to maintain in the Christian churches a higher standard of morality than prevailed in the heathen world, there was from the first the feeling that those who judged others should, in the respects of which they took judicial cognizance, themselves be blameless. The apostolic admonition to Timothy was of universal application, "Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. iv. 12). If a church officer failed in these respects, it was competent for the church of which he was an officer to remove him. (This is clearly implied in Clem. Rom. i. 44.) But this was obviously an inconvenient form of procedure, especially when the list of offences was undefined; and it was gradually supplanted by the elaborate system of synods, provincial, diocesan, and oecumenical, which has been described above. The general regulations which these synods laid down, present, as far as they have been preserved, an accurate picture not only of the ideal but also of the actual state of the clergy in various parts of Christendom. They are in some cases extremely minute. They probably grew in most instances out of individual cases which arose, the decisions in such cases being framed as general rules for future guidance. They were for the most part only valid in the province or diocese in which they were framed; and valuable as they are in enabling us to arrive at the state of opinion at a particular time in a particular country, they must not be regarded as having had, at least in the first instance, the character of general laws. In later times, when a large number of these decisions and regulations were collected together by Dionysius Exiguus, Ferrandus, and others; and in still later times, when these earlier collections were amalgamated with other elements into a corpus of canon law, the decisions of local councils received an authority which they had not at first possessed: but for the purposes of church history and church antiquities, it is of great importance to bear in mind in each case the circumstances of their origin and the limits of their validity. If these necessary limitations be borne in mind, it will be found that during the first four centuries the ecclesiastical regulations which affected the social life of church officers were comparatively few in number. In the East the most important of such regulations were that clerks should not take usury (Conc. Nicaen. c. 17, Laod. c. 4, Can. Apost. 44); that they should not be present at the immoral masquerades of banquets or marriages (Laod. c. 54); that they should not bathe with women (Laod. c. 30); that they should not dine at club dinners (συνπρόσια ἐκ συμβολῆς, Laod. c. 55); or enter a tavern except on a journey (Laod. c. 24, Can. Apost. 54). In North Africa the regulations are mainly to the same effect: clerks must not take usury (1 Carth. c. 13; 3 Carth. c. 16); or go to taverns (3 Carth. c. 27, = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 40); nor may even their sons exhibit or witness secular games (3 Carth. c. 11). (The minute regulations of the Statt. Eccl. Antiq., frequently cited as 4 Conc. Carth., especially c. 45-63, almost certainly belong to a later period.) In Gaul and Spain the enactments against taking usury are found in four councils of this period—Ilib. c. 20; 1 Arelat. c. 12; 2 Arelat. c. 14; 1 Turon. c. 13. The fact that clerks had not yet ceased to trade is indicated by the enactment that bishops, presbyters, and deacons were not to trade out of their provinces nor go about the country in search of the most profitable markets (Ilib. c. 18). But although the regulations were neither numerous nor stringent, there is no doubt that by the end of the fifth century the officers of the church, throughout the greater part of Christendom, had become a class socially as well as civilly distinct from its ordinary members. The theory of the church was more conservative than its practice. The form of the primitive "canon," or church-roll, still remained. The various ranks still shaded off into one another. The "order" of the laity still held its place side by side by the "orders" of presbyters, deacons, readers, and widows. But the later conception of the clergy had been formed, and was beginning to express itself. The social distinction between church officers and ordinary members was accentuated by two circumstances, which, though slight in themselves, and in the first instance rather effects than causes, helped materially to increase it: the one was the adoption of a peculiar dress, the other was the adoption of a peculiar mode of wearing the hair. (a) The first of these had shewn itself at the beginning of the fifth century, but only in the form of a tendency to wear garments of a more sober hue than was customary. Jerome discourages it: "vestes pullas aequè devita ut candidas" (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 (2) ad Nepot. § 9). It was succeeded by a tendency to preserve the older forms of dress, instead of following the changes of fashion; and ultimately, chiefly under the influence of the monasteries and the canonical rule, the "habitus laicorum" (Pippin. Capit. Suession. § 3, A.D. 744; Pertz, Legum. i. p. 21) was absolutely forbidden [see DRESS, Vol. I. p. 582]. (b) The second mark of distinction was slow in its growth, but strong in its influence. At first all that was insisted upon was that the hair should not be worn long or elaborately dressed; consequently the earlier references to the subject—e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. viii. 9; Arator, Epist. ad Parthen. 69, 70, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxviii. 251—do not prove that what was afterwards known as the TONSURE actually existed. But in the latter part of the sixth century the tonsure appears to have become definitely established as a mark of separation between clergy and laity: this is clear from Greg. Turon. Lib. de Gloria Confessor. c. 32, p. 92; id. Vit. Patr. c. 17, p. 1233; and from the fact that Gregory the Great defends its use on scriptural grounds (Reg. Pastoral. pars 2, c. 7; id. Epist. lib. i. 25, p. 514, quoting Ezek. xlv. 20: but it may be remarked, as an indication of the later origin of the practice, that Jerome in writing upon that passage of Ezekiel makes no mention of it, the words which are found in most editions being confessedly interpolated: S. Hieron. in Ezech. lib. xiii. c. 44, vol. v. p. 547). In the meantime the inner life and discipline of the class which was thus being formed was largely influenced by the growth and wide extension of monasticism. This influence is especially shewn in the tendency to live in community.

This tendency to live in community has sometimes been traced to much earlier times. But although there are indications that in primitive times all who were on the church-roll, whether as officers, widows, virgins, or poor, shared a common fund and a common meal; there are no indications that they lived together, until in the fourth century church officers began to form a distinct class. The system which afterwards prevailed appears to have originated with Eusebius of Vercelli, † 371, who "gathered together all the clerks into the fold of a single habitation, that those whose purpose in religion was one and undivided might have a common life and a common refectory" (S. Maxim. Serm. 23, ap. Muratori, Anecd. Lat. vol. iv., Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lvii.; see also S. Ambros. Epist. lxiii. c. 66, 82, vol. ii. pars 1, p. 1038; Ps.-Ambros. Serm. 56, vol. ii. pars 2, p. 468, ascribed, perhaps correctly, to S. Maximus, ap. Muratori, l. c., and Migne, vol. lvii. p. 886); and probably from the example thus set by Eusebius and strongly approved by Ambrose, it was established by Augustine in his own diocese in North Africa, expressly on the monastic principle of the renunciation of private property by those who thus lived together, and who are hence called "monasterium clericorum" (S. Augustin. Serm. 355 = de divers. 49, Op. ed. Migne, Patr. Lat., vol. v. p. 1570; see also the following sermon). In the course of the next three centuries it seems to have become the prevailing system of clerical life throughout the greater part of the West. The city clergy lived together under the eye of the bishop; they dined at a common table; they even slept together in a common chamber (4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 23, makes special provision for the case of aged or infirm bishops, priests, or deacons, who required separate cells). The country presbyters in the same way were each at the head of a "domus ecclesiae," in which, as the tendency grew up to dedicate boys to the service of the church in their earliest years, they educated such boys and trained them for the higher orders. Those who so lived together, whether in the cathedral city or in the country parishes, appear to have been called "canonici," and to have had their definite portions of the offerings which were made to their respective churches. Occasionally we find that a special endowment was made for the support of their common table (S. Greg. Turon. H. F. x. 16, p. 535 of Baudin, bp. of Tours in the time of Clothair I., "hic instituit mensam canonicorum;" cf. the will of a bishop of Le Mans circ. A.D. 615, ap. Mabillon, Vett. Anal. i. 254). But as the system became general, it was found that neither the ecclesiastical canons nor the personal control of the bishop were sufficient to prevent a laxity of life among those who thus lived together; the "canonici" contrasted unfavourably with the monks who lived under the stern régime of St. Benedict. Consequently it was found advisable to frame a rule of life for "canonici" as well as for monks, and from the middle of the eighth century almost all Western clergy became "canonici regulares" [see CANONICI, Vol. I. p. 282; to which may be added the important dissertation of Muratori, de Canoniciis, in his Antiquit. Ital. vol. v. p. 183 sqq.; and a note to one of the canons of the English Legatine Synods in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. p. 461, which however admits of some question]. The ideal of this canonical life, or "vita communis," is found not only in the formal rules of Chrodegang (Mansi, vol. xiv. 313, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxxix. 1097; and in its longer form, Harzheim, Concil. Germ. vol. i. 96: D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. 565), or of Amalarius (Harzheim, l. c., Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cv. 815), but also in the letter of Pope Urban in the Pseudo-Isidorian additions to the Decretals (Hinschius, p. 143). But unfortunately it has its darker side: the penitential books of the eighth and ninth centuries, even if it be allowed that some of the offences there mentioned are rather imaginary than actual, shew that at any rate in Northern Europe the standard of clerical life had been rather lowered than raised by its dissociation from the common life of the Christian world.

(iii.) Discipline.—There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any special discipline for church officers. The distinction between the law of life which was current among the mass of men, and that which was binding on Christians, existed for all members of the church alike; and although exceptional qualities were required in a church officer, whatever might lawfully be done by any Christian might also lawfully be done by him. Neither in the Pastoral Epistles, nor in any other of the earliest records of ecclesiastical organization, is there any trace of the exceptional rules for church officers which distinguish later canons. But the exercise of the ordinary discipline is surrounded in their case with special safeguards: "Against an elder receive not an accusation but before one or two witnesses" (1 Tim. v. 9).

But with the gradual separation of church officers from the rest of the community there came also to be rules of discipline which were specially applicable to them. These rules may be conveniently considered under two heads: A. Punishable offences; B. Punishments. On most points separate articles will be found elsewhere, and therefore what is given here will chiefly be by way of summary.

A. Punishable offences may be divided into three classes:—(1) Offences relating to marriage and sexual morality, (2) offences relating to ecclesiastical organization and divine service, (3) offences relating to social life.

(1) Offences relating to Marriage and Sexual Morality.—It is especially important to bear in mind, in the case of these offences, what has been said above as to the originally local and temporary character of most of the regulations which exist. The drift of opinion in favour of celibacy was by no means uniform in either its direction or its rate of motion. (a) In regard to the marriage of ordained persons, the following are the chief disciplinary regulations:—Conc. Ancyr. c. 10, enacts that deacons who marry after ordination without having expressly stipulated for liberty to do so at the time of their ordination are to be deposed; Conc. Neoc. c. 1, enacts that a presbyter who marries after ordination is to be deposed; the Apostolical Canons go farther, and say that no clerk can marry after ordination, except readers and singers only (C. A. 26); the Apostolical Constitutions, vi. 17, extend the exception to subdeacons (ὀψοφύλακες) and door-keepers (but, on the other hand, Conc. Chalced. c. 14, speaks of the exception of readers and singers as a custom of some provinces, ἐπαρχίαι, only). These enactments were confirmed by the civil law. A law of Justinian in 530 (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 45) goes so far as to make the children of such marriages, including those of subdeacons, illegitimate; and a novel of the same emperor (Novell. 123, c. 14) subjects the offending clerk to a farther civil penalty (but this penalty was afterwards modified, on the ground of its being too severe, by the Emperor Leo, Const. 79 in Corp. Jur. Civ. iii. p. 814). The leading Western canon on the subject is 8 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 7, which enacts that anyone who after ordination either marries or becomes a layman must be deprived of his dignity and secluded for the rest of his life in a monastery; but the existence of an earlier Western canon is indicated by 2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 8, which enacts that a deacon who marries in captivity is to be deposed upon his return: 9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 10, makes the children of such marriages slaves of the church of which their fathers were officers. (b) If a person was ordained who was already married, the Apostolical Canons, c. 5, forbid him to put away his wife (προφάσει εὐλαβείας); and Conc. Gangr. c. 4, anathematizes those who refused to receive the communion from a married presbyter. But Epiphanius, ii. 59, 4, speaks of a canon to the opposite effect, which, however, he admits not to be observed: Socrates, H. E. v. 22, notes, on the other hand, that although there was no positive enactment, many clergy did abstain from their wives, and that in Thessaly a clerk was excommunicated who did not so abstain. A distinction in this respect was afterwards drawn in the East, which with some modifications has remained until modern times, between presbyters and bishops. Justinian enacted in 531 that no person could be made bishop who did not practise married continence (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 48, cf. Conc. Trull. xii. 13; and see CELIBACY, Vol. I. p. 324). In the West, Conc. Illib. A.D. 313, commands all married clerks to abstain and not to beget children under pain of deprivation; so also the doubtful addition to 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 29: 2 Carth. c. 3 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 2, gives the prohibition without specifying a penalty: 5 Carth. c. 3 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 25, makes the enactment apply to subdeacons and upwards, but not to inferior clerks: 1 Tolet. A.D. 398, assigns the milder penalty of non-promotion; so also 1 Turon. A.D. 441, c. 2; but 1 Araus. A.D. 441, c. 23, Agath. A.D. 506, c. 9, Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 13, revert to the penalty of deposition in the case of priests and deacons: Gerund. A.D. 517, c. 6, 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 2, 5 Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 4 (but not 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 17), Autissiod. A.D. 578, c. 20, and apparently 2 Matise. A.D. 581, c. 11, 3 Lugd. A.D. 583, c. 1 (all Gallican councils, and all belonging to the century which succeeded the baptism of Chlodwig), include subdeacons in the same penalty. This inclusion of subdeacons is also mentioned by Leo the Great (Epist. 167 ad Rustic. c. 3; Epist. 14 aa Anastas. c. 3), and its adoption in Gaul seems to be due to Roman influence, as Gregory the Great (Epist. i. 44, vol. ii. p. 538) speaks of it as a "mos Romanus" which had recently been imposed on Sicily. The Decretals follow in the same track (S. Siric. ad Eumer. c. 7, Hinschius, p. 521; S. Innocent I. ad Victorice. c. 9. ad

Euseper. c. 1, ad Maxim. et Sever., Hinschius, pp. 530, 531, 544): so also, with strong emphasis upon the enactment, in the Pseudo-Isidorian Epist. Clement. ii. c. 46, Hinschius, p. 48. 2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19, throws upon the rural arch-presbyters (i.e. the later rural deans) the duty of seeing that the other clergy of their districts observe the rule: in case of a breach of it, not only is the offender himself to be suspended, but the arch-presbyter who has neglected to guard against a breach of it is himself to be secluded, and fed on bread and water for a month. (c) In cases where marriage was allowed, digamy in any of its forms was strictly prohibited. In the East the Apostolical Canons (c. 17–19) refuse to allow anyone who has married (1) two wives after baptism, (2) a widow or divorcee, to be on the clergy list (cf. Const. Apost. vi. 17; Justin. Novell. vi. c. 5). But the regulations seem to have fallen into disuse, inasmuch as at the time of the Trullan Council special legislation had again become necessary, and the analogy of the Western church was expressly followed (Conc. Trull. c. 2). In the West there were numerous enactments on the subject:—(i.) 1 Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 1, disallows digamists for the future, but does not interfere with those who were already ordained: 1 Tol. A.D. 398, c. 4, degrades a digamous subdeacon to the rank of a reader or doorkeeper, and deposes a trigamist: Araus. A.D. 441, c. 25, will not allow a digamist to rise higher than the subdiaconate: Agath. A.D. 506, c. 1, will not allow a digamous presbyter or deacon to exercise his functions; so Epau. A.D. 517, c. 2. (ii.) The wife of anyone who is allowed to marry must be a virgin. 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 398, c. 3, enacts that a reader who marries a widow cannot rise higher than the subdiaconate: 1 Turon. A.D. 461, c. 4, enacts that he must in such a case hold the lowest place on the clergy list: Agath. A.D. 506, c. 1, in compassion to those presbyters and deacons who had broken the rule, does not depose them from their office, but will not allow them to minister; but 2 Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 4, deposes deacons in a similar case without hope of restoration: 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 44, orders clerks who have so offended to be separated from their wives. So also in the Decretals: S. Siric. ad Eumer. c. 11, Hinschius, p. 522; S. Innocent. ad Victorice. c. 4, ad Felic. c. 2, ad Ruf. et Euseb. c. 1, Hinschius, pp. 530, 533, 549. That it became not only the law but the usage in the West is a fair inference from the fact that the pseudo-Isidore does not even mention it in the spurious part of his collection. (d) Sexual immorality was at all times punished severely; but the canons are few in number, because the gravity of the offence was so universally recognised as to render the repetition of positive enactments unnecessary: the leading Eastern canons are Conc. Neoc. c. 1, Can. Apost. 25; but Conc. Trull. c. 4, is a remarkable indication of later Eastern usage, inasmuch as it seems to imply that a lesser punishment than deposition had come to be the rule when the woman with whom a clerk committed sin was other than a nun. The earliest Western canon is that of Elvira, c. 19, which inflicts on adulterous bishops, presbyters, and deacons the severe penalty of perpetual excommunication: much later, the Carolingian Capitularies punish an offending presbyter with scourging and two years' imprisonment on bread and water (Karlomanni Capit. A.D. 742, c. 6; Pertz, vol. i. p. 18); but the British churches were more lenient. In the sixth century an offending presbyter or deacon was punished with three years' penitence (Gildae præf. de poenit. c. 1; Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. p. 113). Theodore's Penitential, i. 9, 1, revives the Apostolical Canon which deposes but does not excommunicate a clerk; cf. Poenit. Egb. v. 1-22, Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 418. (e) In some cases the purity of the clerical order was further guarded by punishing clerks for the incontinence of their wives: Conc. Illib. c. 65, enacts that a clerk must put away an offending wife or be himself perpetually excommunicated; Neoc. c. 8, enacts that he must either put her away or cease to exercise his office; 1 Tolet. c. 7, empowers clerks to imprison their erring wives, and to reduce them to penitence by salutary fasting. See also the canon of Photius in reference to presbyters and deacons whose wives had been abused by barbarians, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. i. p. 364.

(2) Offences relating to Ecclesiastical Organization and Divine Service.—These may be divided according as they are connected with (a) the growth of the diocesan system, (b) the growth of the parochial system, (c) the establishment of ecclesiastical courts, (d) ordination, (e) divine service.

(a) It was not without a struggle that dioceses, in the modern sense of the term, were formed, and that the church officers of a particular district or province came to be regarded as an organic unity. The former of these results was chiefly due, as has been pointed out above, to the establishment of the system of synods; the latter was chiefly due to the regulations that a clerk could not be on the roll of two churches at once, and that he could not be transferred from the roll of one church to the roll of another without the consent of his former superior. The earliest enactment to this effect is Conc. Nicaen. c. 16, which laid down the rule that if any bishop appointed to office in his own church a clerk belonging to another church, the appointment (χειροτονία) should be invalid. But the fact that the rule required to be re-enacted again and again shews that it did not easily establish itself: a few years after the Council of Nicaea, the Council of Antioch (c. 3) repeated it, with the addition that the bishop who received another's clerk against his will should be liable to be punished by the synod: Can. Apost. 15 punishes a bishop in a similar case with excommunication; so Conc. Chalc. c. 20. Later on in the East, Conc. Trull. c. 17, after reciting the frequency of violations of the rule, enacts that for the future no bishop shall receive another's clerk without a dismissory letter under pain of deprivation. Still later the Nestorian synod of Patriarch John (Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. cap. 6, can. 8, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 116) punishes clerks who so passed from one diocese to another with a year's suspension, and subsequent degradation to the lowest place in their order. In the West, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 21, deposes presbyters and deacons who transfer themselves to another church: 1 Tolet. c. 12, excommunicates them, unless they are refugees from a heretical to an orthodox church: Milev. c. 15 = Cod.

Eccl. Afric. c. 90 (which probably arose out of the case of Timotheus, who had been a reader of Augustine's, but was promoted to the subdiaconate at Subsana, S. August. Epist. 63 (240), Op. vol. ii. p. 231), enacted that no one should abandon the church in which he had been ordained reader: Valent. c. 5, excommunicates and deposes presbyters and deacons who do not adhere to the place assigned to them by the bishop who ordained them; 2 Hispal. c. 3, deals with the case of a clerk who, having been dedicated to the service of the church at Italian, near Seville, had fled to Cordova, and regards such clerks as being on the footing of "coloni agrorum:" 1 Turon. c. 11, 2 Arelat. c. 13, Stett. Eccl. Antiq. c. 27, allow a clerk to migrate with the consent of his bishop: so Conc. Hertford, c. 3, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 119.

(b) It was apparently an early, if not a primitive rule, that the presbyters and deacons of a church could not ordinarily act without the bishop of that church. In the next stage of organization it was enacted that a presbyter or deacon could not detach himself from the church of which he was presbyter or deacon and set up an altar of his own (Conc. Antioch. c. 5). The next step was to provide for the cases in which monasteries or other ecclesiastical institutions were established in a city of which there was a bishop: Conc. Chalc. c. 8, following what it states to be an older tradition, subjects all such institutions to the bishop of the city; Trull. c. 31, 2 Nicaen. c. 10, do the same for private chapels. In the West, 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 7, requires the clerks of "oratoria domini praediorum" to have the consent of the bishop; but the Capitularies, by repeating the rule that "all presbyters who are in a diocese (parochia) must be under the jurisdiction (potestas) of the bishop of that diocese, and must not baptize or celebrate mass without his sanction," seem to imply that the rule had been broken (Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. c. 8; Pertz, vol. i. p. 26). The regulation that a presbyter could only celebrate the Eucharist in a place consecrated by the bishop is first found in 2 Conc. Carth. c. 9; but it does not appear to have been universally recognised, since it required re-enactment at a late date, viz. in the Liber Pontificalis, 177. Siric. c. 2 = Decret. Synod. Silvestr. c. 9, in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Hinschius, p. 450; cf. Atton. II. Verceil. Capit. c. 7, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 403.

(c) A third class of offences consists of those which grew out of the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts. The exercise of discipline by the church in ecclesiastical matters must be distinguished from its exercise of jurisdiction in civil or criminal matters. The former was inherent in the original constitution of the Christian communities; the latter was of the nature of voluntary contract. The history of both is intricate, and has yet to be fully written; it must be sufficient to mention here that while the State constantly recognised the ecclesiastical courts as courts of arbitration, and was ready to enforce their sentences when both parties had agreed to be bound by those sentences, the church on its part endeavoured in the West to compel clerks to resort in all cases to its own courts rather than to the ordinary civil courts. This is seen especially in 3 Conc. Carth. c. 9 =

Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 15, which deposes clerks who resort to secular tribunals in criminal cases, and condemns them to lose their cause in civil cases: so in effect, Conc. Milcv. c. 19 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 104, Agath. c. 8, 3 Tol. c. 13; and in the Capitularies, Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. c. 18, Pertz, vol. i. p. 26. In addition to, and also in distinction from, both forms of judicial authority, the bishops came to have an independent and extra-judicial authority, which also was enforced by ecclesiastical penalties. Conc. Agath. c. 2, enacts that clerks who neglected their duty were to be corrected by their bishop; if they pertinaciously disregarded such correction, they were to be struck off the roll and deprived of their pay. Forty years later, Conc. Valent. c. 6, suspends and excommunicates clerks in similar circumstances: still later in the same century Conc. Narb. c. 10, renews the enactment. It is not clear that any of these enactments apply to presbyters, but it is probable that they so strengthened the position of the bishops of the West as to lead them to claim a similar jurisdiction over presbyters. 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 6, held under Isidore of Seville, restores a presbyter who had been deposed by the sole authority of his bishop, and refers to "priscorum patrum synodalem sententiam" to shew that "episcopus sacerdotibus ac ministris [i.e., deacons] solus honorem dare potest, auferre solus non potest:" cf. Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 23.

(d) Offences relating to Ordination.—The offences which consisted in ordination out of the proper diocese have been mentioned above under (a). The chief other offence was ordination for money, i.e. simony. This was prohibited in the East by the Apostolical Canons, c. 28, under penalty of excommunication of both ordainer and ordained, by Conc. Chalc. c. 2, Trull. c. 22, 2 Nicæn. c. 5: in the West by 2 Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 4; 6 Tolet. A.D. 638, c. 4; Cabill. A.D. 650, c. 16; 4 Brac. A.D. 675, c. 8. (Of its prevalence in France at this period there are many indications besides the repetition of conciliar enactments, e.g. in the Life of S. Eligius, lib. ii. c. 1, ap. D'Achery, Spicil. vol. ii. p. 90, and in the Life of S. Romanus, ap. Martene et Durand, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 1634.) It was also prohibited by the civil law: a law of Leo and Anthemius, in 469 (Cod. Just. 1, 3, 31), punishes it with civil "infamia" as well as loss of the office; a law of Glycerius and Leo (Hanel, Corpus Legum ante Just. lat. 1226, p. 260, from Cod. Vat. Reg. 1997) mentions and reprehends the practice of giving notes of hand to be paid out of the proceeds of the office; cf. Justin. Novell. 56 and 123, c. 16, for the practice, which had grown up but which tended to be simoniacal, of giving presents to the clergy of a church at the time of ordination.

(e) Offences relating to Divine Service and the Religious Life.—i. The Apostolical Constitutions (2, 59) enjoin all the faithful, laity as well as clergy, to go to church twice every day, and the Apostolical Canons (c. 8) and Conc. Antioch. (c. 2) enact that clerks, if present, must communicate; but it appears from the civil law that clerks were rather negligent in this respect (Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 42 (41), 10; 1, 3, 52 (51)); and a century and a half later the Trullan Council thought it sufficient to punish a clerk or layman who, not being hindered from attending, absented himself from divine service for three successive Sundays. The Spanish rule, as given in 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 5, was that any clerk who was in the neighbourhood of a church must go to the daily sacrifice. The Gallican rule, as given in Conc. Venet. A.D. 465 (?), c. 14, punished with seven days' excommunication clerks who were without good excuse absent from the morning office. The Irish rule, as given in the Canons of St. Patrick, c. 7, was that a clerk who did not go morning and evening "ad collectas," was to be excommunicated, unless he were detained by the obligations of servitude ("jugo servitutis"). The North African rule was, that unless a clerk were present at vespers he should lose his pay (Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 49). ii. The regulations which relate to the conduct of divine service are not numerous. The Apostolical Canons (c. 3) depose a bishop or presbyter who offers upon the altar milk or honey, or birds or vegetables; or (c. 59) a clerk who reads pseudepigrapha as though they were sacred books; 3 Conc. Brac. A.D. 572, c. 10, excommunicates priests who celebrate mass without a stole on both shoulders; 13 Tolet. A.D. 683, c. 7, deposes clerks who in pique or quarrel strip the altar of its vestments or put out the church lights; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, c. 13, under Pope Zachary, excommunicates bishops, presbyters, and deacons who celebrate mass with a staff or with covered head; the Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu (Tract. vi. can. 6, c. 2) punish a clerk who officiates without his boots. iii. It was enacted that clerks must not join in divine service with deposed clerks, or heretics, or Jews (Can. Apost. c. 11, 45, 65); or fast on the Lord's day (ib. c. 64); or fail to keep Lent (ib. c. 69); or eat flesh with the blood in it (ib. c. 63).

(3) The enactments which related to the social life of the clergy during the first four centuries have been for the most part mentioned above under (ii). The following belong to later centuries:—In the East the Trullan Council made a series of enactments which, being for the most part repetitions of earlier enactments, shew that such earlier enactments had fallen into neglect. It provided that clerks should not be the lessors of taverns, c. 9; that they should not take usury, c. 10; that they should not wear unbecoming dress, c. 27; that they should not play with dice, c. 50; nor be concerned in stage-plays and stage-dancing, c. 50; nor keep brothels, c. 86. In North Africa it was enacted that they should wear a becoming dress (Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 45); that they should not waste time in walking about the streets (ib. c. 47); and that they should not sing songs at a banquet (ib. c. 62): on the other hand, they were quite at liberty to procure their livelihood by handicraft or agriculture (ib. c. 51–53). In the provincial councils of Gaul and Spain it was enacted that clerks who were engaged in trade must not sell dearer than other people (Conc. Tarrac. A.D. 516, c. 1), or drive hard bargains (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 27); that clerks must not live with secular persons without the permission of the bishop (2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 9); that they must not frequent banquets at which love-songs were sung (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 11; Agath. A.D. 506, c. 39); nor sing or dance at banquets (Conc. Antisiod. A.D. 578 (?), c. 40); nor be drunk (Conc. Venet. c. 13, Agath. c. 41); nor bear arms (Conc.

Ilard. A.D. 523, c. 1); nor keep hunting dogs or hawks (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 4: cf. Conc. Forojul. A.D. 798, c. 6; Capit. Generale, A.D. 789, c. 15, Pertz, vol. i. p. 69, which adds "jesters" to the list of prohibitions; Hettonis Basil. Capit. 11). In Ireland almost the only social regulation which is contained in the Canons of St. Patrick is that if a clerk becomes surety for a "gentile," and "quod mirum non est," if the gentile cheats the clerk, the clerk must pay his bond, or if he fights the gentile instead, must be excommunicated (Can. S. Patric. c. 8); the later collection of Irish canons repeats the enactments of the Statt. Eccles. Antiq. (see Wasserschleben, die Irische Kanonensammlung, p. 33, &c.). In England the penitentials of Bede, Egbert, and Theodore combine to afford conclusive evidence that the chief social offence against which provision had to be made was drunkenness: there is, perhaps, no more degrading picture of the state of the clergy at any period of the history of the church than that which these penitentials present (e.g., Poenit. Theodor. i. 1, 4, ap. Wasserschleben, Bussordnung der abendl. Kirch. p. 182 sqq., and Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i.).

B. The punishments by which the observance of disciplinary rules was enforced were various; the most important were the several forms of excommunication, degradation, and deposition.

(1) Excommunication.—(a) Temporary: The simplest mode of enforcing obedience was to suspend a clerk from all the privileges of church membership so long as he was recalcitrant (ἀπορρίσσειν, Can. Apost. passim; ἀκωνόντος εἶναι, Conc. Nicaen. c. 16; "a communione alienus haberi," 2 Conc. Arlat. c. 3, 1 Turon. c. 3). This did not in early times imply more than that the offending clerk could not remain with the faithful to participate in the communion, and that he consequently lost his share in the offerings. It was a corollary of this sentence that he could not exercise his office (hence Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 7, explains the phrase "archiparaphonista [i.e., archicantor] a pontifice excommunicabitur," by "ab officio suspendetur"). Sometimes the period during which a clerk should remain excommunicated was expressed in the canon: e.g. a year (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 15; 2 Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19; Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 10); three months (11 Tolet. A.D. 675, c. 8). But more commonly the time was not specified, it being understood that submission would be followed by re-admission to full status. The Apostolical Canons, however, contain a stipulation that the bishop who re-admits a clerk must be the same bishop, if still living, who had excommunicated him (C. A. 28, where Balsamon adds that even if the bishop had died, his place in this respect could only be taken by his successor, or the metropolitan, or the patriarch). In time, and especially in the West, this form of punishment became more severe than it had originally been. A canon of the fifth (?) century, which claims for itself the authority of earlier canons, separates an excommunicated clerk not only from communion but also from all Christian society ("a totius populi colloquio atque convivio") until he submits: so also in the Canons of St. Patrick, c. 28; and even more stringently in the Capitularies (Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. A.D. 755, c. 9, Pertz, vol. i. p. 26 = Conc. Vern., Mansi, xii. 577; Capit. Trin. A.D. 801, c. 17, Pertz, vol. i. p. 85). (b) Permanent: For some offences a clerk was permanently ejected from church membership (ἐξωθεῖσθαι τέλεον καὶ ἀγεσθαι εἰς μετάνοιαν, Conc. Neoc. c. 1; ρίπτεισθαι ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Laod. c. 36; παντάπασι ἐκκόπτεσθαι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Can. Apost. 28). This involved complete loss of status; re-admission was only possible through the door of formal and public penitence. Even this was in some cases denied (hence 1 Conc. Araus. A.D. 441, c. 4, "poenitentiam desiderantibus clericis non negandum"), and in the earliest of Western provincial councils the door was shut by express enactment of the canon itself ("nec in fine [sc. in articulo mortis] accipere communionem," Conc. Illib. c. 2, 19; but it may be noted that this severe form of sentence does not appear to have been repeated by later councils).

(2) Suspension and Degradation.—Of these there were several forms and degrees: (a) a presbyter might be suspended from the function of offering the Eucharistic sacrifice, but not from other functions (Conc. Neoc. c. 1); (b) a clerk might be suspended from the exercise of the functions of his office, but retain his rank (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 43; Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 2; Trull. c. 26: so also S. Basil, Epist. ii. ad Amphilocho. c. 27, id. Epist. iii. ad Amphilocho. c. 70); (c) a clerk might lose his seniority and be placed last on the clergy roll (1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 461, c. 4; Trull. c. 7; 2 Nicaen. c. 5); (d) a clerk might be degraded to a lower order (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 4); (e) a clerk might be cut off from the hope of promotion (Conc. Tauron. A.D. 401, c. 8; 1 Tolet. c. 1; 1 Araus. c. 24; Andegav. A.D. 461, c. 2; Ilard. c. 1, 5; Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 54; so also S. Basil, Epist. iii. ad Amphilocho. c. 69); (f) a clerk might be deprived of his stipend (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7; Narb. A.D. 589, c. 11, 13). (This, which was probably one of the chief effects of excommunication in early times, was retained as a separate and minor punishment, when excommunication came to carry with it greater penalties.)

(3) Deposition.—This was sometimes more and sometimes less than excommunication. In the earliest times it does not seem to have involved more than the reducing of an officer to the ranks in the army. This is implied in the phrases by which deposition is designated: πεπαῦσθαι τῆς τάξεως, Conc. Ancyra. c. 10, 14; καθαίρεισθαι τῆς τάξεως, Neoc. 1; καθ. τοῦ κλήρου, Nicaen. c. 17; καθ. τῆς λειτουργίας, 1 Antioch. c. 3; καθαίρεισθαι absolutely, Ephes. c. 4, Can. Apost. passim; ἐκπίπτειν τοῦ βᾶθμου, Ephes. c. 2, Chalc. c. 27; ἀλλότριος τῆς ἀξίας εἶναι, Chalc. c. 2; ἔξω τοῦ κλήρου καθίστασθαι, Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 40 (39), 10; "amoveri," Conc. Illib. c. 30; "ab ordine cleri amoveri," 1 Arlat. c. 13; "degradari," Conc. Illib. c. 20; "ab officio degradari," Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 56; "deponi," Illib. c. 51; "a clero deponi," Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 68; "ab ecclesiastico removeri officio," Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 25; "locum amittere," 2 Conc. Carth. c. 8; "ab imposito officio repelli," 1 Araus. c. 16; "honore proprio privari," Milev. c. 19. The person so removed from office was for the future a layman: his place in church was no longer on the raised steps or seats; he had no longer a voice in the administration of discipline; and he had no longer the larger share of the offerings which fell to the several grades of officers. This is sometimes expressly stated: e.g., Justin. Novell. vi. 5, τὸ λοιπὸν ἰδιώτης ἔστω; S. Basil, Epist. i. ad Amphiloch. c. 3, εἰς τὸν λαϊκῶν ἀπωθεῖς τόπον; Conc. Trull. c. 21, ἐν τῇ τῶν λαϊκῶν ἀπωθούμενοι τόπῳ; 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 2, "laica communione contentus ab officio depopatur;" 2 Turon. A.D. 667, c. 19, "depositus ab omni officio clericali inter laicos se observare cognoscat" (but with permission to sit among the readers in the choir). There is no trace of the recognition in early canon law of the opinion which afterwards came to prevail, that a person so deposed was still in posse what he had been before; and that the repeal of the sentence of deposition would restore him at once to all the privileges and powers of his lost place. On the contrary, even so late as the seventh century, and even in cases where the deposition was found to be unjust, reordination was necessary ("non potest esse quod fuerat nisi gradus amissos recipiat coram altario," 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28). One of the earliest instances of the later opinion is in the Capit. Vernense of Pippin, A.D. 753, Pertz, vol. i. p. 23, which allows a degraded presbyter to baptize in cases of extreme emergency. The addition of excommunication to deposition was in early times a separate and cumulative punishment; the Apostolical Canons, c. 24, maintain that the former is sufficient without the latter, even in cases of theft or perjury, on the ground that a man must not be punished twice for the same offence. They allow them to be combined only in the case of simony (c. 28; the interpretation of c. 64, which apparently visits with the same double punishment those who associate with Jews and heretics, is not certain: cf. Balsamon and Zonaras ad loc.).

(4) Other Punishments.—(a) In the sixth century, when the practice of appointing very young persons to minor orders began to prevail, it was sometimes enacted that "juniores clerici" who transgressed the canons should be whipped (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 15; 1 Matic. A.D. 581, c. 8; Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 13; 11 Tolet. A.D. 675, c. 8). The fourth Council of Braga, which is of the same date as the last-mentioned council, goes so far as to allow presbyters to be scourged for grave offences, but discourages the practice which some bishops seem to have had of beating their clergy themselves. So also in the following century a presbyter who commits a sin of the flesh is to be scourged, "flagellatus et scorticatus," before being imprisoned (Karloman. Capit. A.D. 742, c. 6; Pertz, vol. i. p. 17). The civil law recognises the same mode of punishment for clerks below the grade of deacons (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 20; cf. Cod. i. 3, 8). (b) When the monastic system began to prevail, clerks were sometimes punished by being secluded in a monastery: e.g., Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 22; 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7; 4 Tol. A.D. 633, c. 29, 45; 8 Tol. A.D. 653, c. 7. So also in the civil law: Justin. Novell. c. 11, substitutes this punishment for that of banishment, which had been imposed nearly a century and a half earlier by a law of Arcadius and Honorius (Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 35). It was sometimes further enacted that clerks who were thus secluded should be confined in solitary cells and fed on bread and water (2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19; 1 Matic. A.D. 581, c. 8), and that they should be subject to the abbat (Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 6). [E. H.]

ORDERS (MONASTIC). [MONASTERY, p. 1229.]

ORDINAL. It is proposed in the present article to give a brief account of the books which contain the early forms of ordination in both East and West. There is no ancient term for such books. The most usual Western term is Pontificale; but on the one hand, the word does not appear until the close of the middle ages, and on the other hand, it is too wide for the present purpose, inasmuch as the books so designated contain not only forms of ordination, but also forms for all offices, e.g. the consecration of churches, in which the presence of a bishop had come to be required. For Pontificale Sicard of Cremona in the 12th century (Mai, Spic. Rom. vol. vi. p. 583, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. ccxv.) substitutes Mitrale, but this latter word does not seem to have obtained general currency. Ordinale was in earlier use, but with a different meaning. Ralph Higden (Polychronicon, lib. 7, c. 3) speaks of a "librum ordinalem ecclesiastici officii quem consuetudinarium vocant," as belonging to Osmund of Salisbury circ. A.D. 1077; but in the Gesta Abbatum S. Albani, ed. Riley, p. 58, "ordinalibus, consuetudinariis, missalibus" are enumerated separately among the books given to the abbey by abbat Paul, A.D. 1077–1093; an ordinarius liber or ordinarium is mentioned in a charter of St. Wulfran's church at Abbeville in A.D. 1208; it was a book of directions, specifying "quid et quando et quomodo cantandum sit vel legendum, chorus regendus, campanae pulsandae, luminare accendendum," &c. But it has been supposed that there were different ordinaria for the several classes of ministers, and that the ordinarium episcopale was the same as the pontificale. In the absence, therefore, of any precise ancient term, the information in question has been placed under the present heading, as being more expressive than any other to modern English readers.

I. Western Ordinals.—It is not possible in the present state of knowledge to lay down many general propositions in respect to early Western ordinals. The earlier MSS. of those which are known to exist do not appear to have been carefully examined by any scholar of eminence since the time of Muratori, and some of those which have been published, and which are mentioned below as belonging to a certain date, are found on examination to be composite MSS., i.e. MSS. of clearly distinguishable and sometimes widely separated dates, which have accidentally been bound up together. Consequently, almost all facts in relation to ordination which are assigned to certain dates on the authority of printed editions of the several MSS. are liable to correction. It is, moreover, probable that many MSS. remain still unexamined, and that much light may be thrown upon early ecclesiastical usages by fresh discoveries. The following accounts will be confined to those which have been printed: nor even in the case of those which have been specially examined for the purposes of this work will there be any discussion, which must necessarily be elaborate and lengthy, of their origin or approximate date. But even with this limitation it is clear that the printed ordinals belong to several distinct types, and that the type which ultimately survived, and which, being retained in the mediaeval service-books, has come down to modern times in the Roman and Anglican ordinals, was not the earliest even of those which still remain.

1. Among the earliest of the remaining types is that which is printed by Mabillon (Museum Italicum, vol. ii. 85) as Ordo Romanus viii. It contains short forms for the ordination of acolytes, subdeacons, deacons and presbyters, and a longer form for the ordination of a bishop.

2. Another type of great antiquity, but whether earlier or later than the preceding is not at present clear, is that which was first printed by Hittorp, de Divinis Catholicae Ecclesiae Officiis, Cologne, 1568, p. 88, col. 1 and part of col. 2. This is distinctively Roman, as is shewn by the direction that the pope and clergy are to go in procession from the church of St. Adrian to that of St. Maria in Praesepe. It is important, as separating election from admission to office (i.e. ordination in its later sense) by an interval of two days. It gives no form of either prayer or benediction, and it is confined to presbyters and deacons. It was printed again by Mabillon from a St. Gall MS. (Mus. Ital. vol. ii.) as Ordo Romanus ix. and by Martene (de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vol. ii.) from a MS. of the Benedictine Abbey of the Trinity at Vendome, also as Ordo ix.; both these editors add to what Hittorp had published an order for the benediction of a bishop; and Mabillon, not Martene, gives an order respecting the four seasons, which is not in accordance with the preceding part of the MS., and is probably a remnant of a distinct rite; this last part is also printed from MSS. at Zurich and Einsiedeln by Gerbert (Monum. Liturg. Alemann. vol. ii. 38; cf. id. Liturg. Alemann. disquis. V. c. 4, vol. ii. 494).

3. Another type of great antiquity, and one which is possibly earlier than either of the two preceding, is that which occurs as a preface or preliminary rubric to the ritual of the ordination of deacons and presbyters in some of the later ordinals (for which see below), viz. Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 20, Missale Francorum, Cod. Maff. ap. Muratori, Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Rodrad, Catalani, Ord. ii. It is remarkable as giving no forms of benediction, nor any mention of vestments, and for the retention of the primitive custom of making the oblations to the bishop himself at the Eucharist, and receiving them back from him when consecrated.

4. The older MSS. of the sacramentaries contain prayers which might have been combined with any of the rituals hitherto mentioned.

(a) That which is known as the Leonine Sacramentary contains prayers without rubrical directions, to be used in (1) the consecration of a bishop, (2) the benediction of a deacon, (3) the consecration of a presbyter. The Veronese MS. which contains the sacramentary is assigned to the 10th century. The authorship of the sacramentary is absolutely uncertain; various conjectures will be found (1) in the preface to the original edition of the work by Bianchini in his edition of Anastasius, vol. iv. Rome, 1735 (whose ascription of it to Leo the Great was withdrawn later in life according to Gerbert, Vet. Liturg. Alem. vol. i. p. 80); (2) in Muratori's Dissertatio de Rebus Liturgicis, c. iii. prefixed to his edition of it in his Liturgia Romana Vetus, vol. i. The text will be found not only in the above-mentioned volumes of Bianchini and Muratori, but also in the Ballerini edition of St. Leo M. vol. ii. p. 110 sqq. (reprinted in Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lx. p. 113 sqq.).

(b) The older MSS. of that which is known as the Gregorian Sacramentary also contain prayers, without a ritual, to be used at the ordination of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. The chief of these older MSS. are (1) one in the Imperial Library at Vienna (No. 1815. 5; formerly Theol. 149), which is described by Lambecius (Bibl. Caesar. t. ii. c. 5, p. 299) (who supposed, but wrongly, that it was the copy which Hadrian I. presented to Charles the Great), and by Denis (Codd. MSS. Theol. B. P. t. i. pars iii. p. 3032); (2) a Vatican codex, which, with a collation of (3) a codex in the Ottoboni Library, was printed by Muratori (Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. ii.), in which edition the several prayers will be found on pp. 882, 918, 1064.

(c) The MS. which was published by Cardinal Tomasi in 1680 from a MS. of Queen Christina of Sweden, and which since, though its ascription to Gelasius is generally repudiated, has been known as the Gelasian Sacramentary, contains two sets of directions and prayers for ordinations: the one (lib. i. c. 20-23) corresponds to some extent with the Leonine Sacramentary, the other (lib. i. c. 95-99) with the ordinals mentioned below. The text will be found in Tomasi (reprinted in Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, vol. i. p. 208), in Muratori (Liturg. Rom. Vet. vol. ii.), and in Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxiv.

5. The type which ultimately prevailed and which, after the analogy of the sacramentary to which it is usually appended, may be called the Gregorian, is more elaborate, and therefore probably later than the types mentioned above. The most important of the MSS. which have been published, and which can therefore be compared together without great difficulty, are the following: (1) Missale Francorum: a MS. found by Morin in the library of A. Petau at Paris, afterwards bought by queen Christina of Sweden, and now in the Vatican. It is supposed by Morin, on internal evidence, to have been written for the use of the church of Poitiers, and is ascribed by him to the 6th century, between A.D. 511 and 560. Mabillon, who first gave it the name by which it is now known, thinks that it represents the prevalent Frankish ritual, but ascribes it to the 7th century; either date places it earlier than the MS. of any existing Western ordinal, although the type which it embodies is probably later than several of those which have been mentioned above. It contains the ritual for the ordination of door-keeper, acolyte, reader, exorcist, subdeacon, deacon, presbyter, bishop, virgin and widow. The text is given in Morin, de Sacris Ecclesiae Ordinationibus, p. 261; Mabillon, Liturg. Gall. lib. iii. p. 301; Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus, vol. iii. p. 439. (2) Codex Remensis: a MS. formerly belonging to the abbey of St. Remigius at Reims, printed by Morin, p. 290. (3) Codex S. Eligii: a MS. probably of the 9th century, once in the abbey of Corbey; in Morin's time in the library of St. Germain-aux-Prés, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (No. 12,051). This MS. forms the basis of Ménard's text (Paris, 1642), and also of the Benedictine text (S. Greg. M. Op. vol. iv.), of the Gregorian Sacramentary; the portion which contains the ordinal is printed by Morin, p. 270; for an account of its date see Ménard's preface, and Muratori de Rebus Liturg. c. v. in his Liturg. Rom. Vet. vol. i. p. 110. (4) Pontificale Eegberti: which represents the English use, probably of the 8th century, and was published from a Paris MS. of the 10th century by the Surtees Society in 1853 (edited by Mr. Greenwell). (5) Codex Rodradi: a MS. formerly belonging to the abbey of Corbey, dated A.D. 853, and now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (No. 12,050); it is compiled with great care, and its compiler gives evidence in his preface of having possessed a critical spirit, which was in advance of his time, and which gives the MS. a high value; it is printed by Morin, p. 278. (6) Codices Vaticani: many MSS. are mentioned in the catalogues, but only three are known to have been published, (a) one of no specified date by Rocca in S. Greg. M. Op. vol. vii. Rome, 1593, and again by Morin, p. 275; (b) one of the 10th century by Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 26; (c) one of much later date by Catalani, Pontificale Romanum, append. ad p. 1, tit. 12, Ord. iii. (7) Pontificale S. Dunstani: an English MS. of the 10th century, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, published by Martene, Ord. iii. (8) Codex Coloniensis: of the 9th century, now in the Cathedral Library at Cologne (No. cxxxvii.), which formed the basis of the edition of Pamelius, Missale SS. Patrum Latinorum, sive Liturgicon Latinum, Cologne, 1571. (9) Codex Gemmatensis or Lanaletensis: a MS. ascribed by Montfaucon to the 7th or 8th century, apparently of English origin, afterwards belonging to the Monasterium Lanaletense (i.e. Llan Alet, near St. Malo, in Brittany); cf. Mabilon, Ann. Benedict. tom. iv. p. 461, afterwards belonging to the abbey of Jumièges, but now in the public library at Rouen (No. A 27); published by Martene together with the Pontif. S. Dunst., with which it agrees almost entirely; see Gage, Archæologia, vol. xxv. p. 235, who gives an account of it, and ascribes it at the earliest to the end of the 10th century. (10) Codex Rotomagensis: commonly known as archbishop Robert's pontifical; now at Rouen, but of English origin; sometimes ascribed to the 8th century, but supposed by Gage, Archæologia, vol. xxiv., to have been written for Aethelgar, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 989; see Frere, Bibliothèque de la Ville de Rouen, p. 50; published by Morin, p. 282. (11) Codex Gellonensis: ascribed to the 8th century; formerly belonging to the Benedictine abbey of St. Guillem du Désert, afterwards to St. Germain-aux-Prés at Paris, but now in the Bibliothèque Nationale (No. 12,048); published by Martene, Ord. iv. (12) Codex Ratoldi: so called because of its mention of the abbat Ratold, †986; formerly at Corbey, but now in the Bibliothèque Nationale (No. 12,052); published by Morin, p. 298. (13) Codices Noviodunenses: i.e. of Noyon in Picardy; (a) three MSS. ascribed to the 8th century and published by Martene, Ord. iv.; (b) a MS. sometimes known as Codex Radbodi, ascribed to the 9th century and published by Martene, Ord. vi.; (c) a MS. of the 13th century, published by Martene, Ord. xv. (14) Codex Suessionensis: a Soissons MS. of the 11th century, published by Martene, Ord. vii.

(15) Codex Caturicensis, i.e. of Cahors: ascribed to the 8th century, and published by Martene, Ord. v. (16) Codex Bisuntinus: formerly at Besançon, but now at Tours (Montfaucon, vol. ii. p. 1274); it is ascribed to the 11th century, and is published by Martene, Ord. x. (17) Codices Beccenses: two MSS. formerly belonging to the abbey of Le Bec, in Normandy; both of the 12th century; published by Martene, Ord. xi. xii. (18) Codex Senonensis: a Sens MS. of the time of Louis the Pious; published by Morin, p. 294. (19) Codex Bellovacensis: a Beauvais MS., written about A.D. 1000 and published by Morin, p. 327. (20) Codex S. Victoris: a MS. of the 12th century, formerly belonging to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris; published by Morin, p. 329. (21) Codices Moguntini: (a) a Mainz MS. of the 13th century, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris; published by Martene, Ord. xvi.; (b) a Mainz MS. ascribed by Morin to the same period, but differing from the former in important particulars; partly published by Morin, p. 336. (22) Codex Salisburgensis: a Salzburg MS. ascribed to the 11th century, published by Martene, Ord. viii. (23) Codex Maffieianus: an early and important MS., the history of which is not known; published by Muratori, vol. iii. p. 45. (24) Codex Caietanus: a MS. which agrees in many points with the preceding; supposed by Morin to be an Italian, not Roman, ordinal of about the 10th century, and published by him, p. 313. (25) Codex Landolfi: so called from its having belonged to a bishop of Capua of that name in the 9th century; published by Catalani, Pontificale Romanum, append. ad p. i. tit. 12, Ord. i. (26) Codex Barensis: a MS. probably of the 13th century, giving the use of the joint diocese of Bari and Canusium; published by Catalani, ibid. Ord. ii. (27) English Ordinals: Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia, vol. iii. contains an edition of the ordinal according to the use of Sarum from a Cambridge MS. of the 15th century (according to Maskell, ibid. vol. i. p. 1, but of the 13th century according to the Cambridge catalogue, No. 1347) with a collation of the Winchester Pontifical (also at Camb. Univ. Library, No. 921) of the 12th century, the Bangor Pontifical (at Bangor) of the 14th century, and bishop Lacey's Exeter Pontifical of the 14th century (since published separately by Mr. Barnes, Exeter, 1847). The only other English ordinals which are known to the present writer to have been published are (1) Cardinal Bainbridge's York Pontifical, in the Cambridge University Library, which was edited by Dr. Henderson for the Surtees Society in 1875; (2) a Sarum Pontifical of the 11th century in the British Museum (Tiberius, c. i.), published by Mr. Chambers, Divine Worship in England in the XIII. XIV. and XIX. Centuries, London, 1878.

Of unpublished and uncollated Pontificals there are many; some are mentioned in the list given by Zaccaria, Bibliotheca Ritualis, vol. i. p. 164; but the catalogues of most great libraries supply instances of others. The most important of unpublished English Pontificals is probably that which is contained in Leofric's Exeter Missal in the Bodleian Library, a MS. of various dates, one part of it containing the date A.D. 969.

II. Eastern Ordinals: i. Greek.—The earliest

Greek ordinal, the date of which is extremely obscure, but which probably represents a primitive type, is that which is contained in the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions, and which prescribes the ritual for the ordination of bishops, presbyters, deacons, deaconesses, subdeacons, and readers. (The best modern texts are those of Lagarde, Const. Apost. Leipzig, 1862, and of Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Graecorum Hist. et Mon. vol. i. pp. 45-75.)

ii. Next in importance is the ritual which is given, interwoven with a mystical explanation, by St. Dionysius Areopagita de ecclesiastica Hierarchia, c. v., which should be compared with the scholia of St. Maximus, and the paraphrase of George Pachymeres, both of which are usually printed with it. (The text will be found in Migne, Patr. Graec. vol. ii.; and Morin, de Sac. Ordin. p. 52.)

iii. The later ordinals seem to have taken their final shape in the course of the 8th and 9th centuries; they have not yet been thoroughly investigated, but the differences between the MSS. which have hitherto been collated are considerably less than those which are found between the Pontificals of the Gregorian type in the Western church. The chief MSS. are the following: (1) Codex Barberini, of the 9th century, formerly in St. Mark's Library at Florence; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 64; J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. Eccles. Univ. vol. xi. p. 103. (2) Codex Bessarion: of the 10th century, given by a Cretan presbyter to cardinal Julian at the council of Florence; afterwards in possession of cardinal Bessarion, who gave it to the monastery of Crypta Ferrata, near Rome, of which he was abbat; printed by Morin, i. p. 74, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 125. (3) Codex Paris: not earlier than the 14th century; in the Bibliothèque Nationale; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 83; J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 147. (4) Codex S. Andr. Vall.: of uncertain date, in the library of the church of St. Andrea Valensis at Rome; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 91, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 166. (5) Codices Vat.: one of the 12th century, containing the offices for the ordination of reader, singer, subdeacon, deacon, deaconess, the other containing those for presbyter, bishop, abbat; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 97, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 179. (6) Codex Leo Allat.: of much more recent date, and possibly more Syrian than Greek; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 104, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 196. The other editions of the ordinals are less precise in stating the MSS. authorities upon which they are based; the chief of them are Habert's Ἀρχιερατικόν, Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Graecae, Paris, 1643, and Goar's Ἐξολόγιον, sive Rituale Graecorum, Paris, 1647 (the notes to which are valuable). A convenient edition for general reference, but useless for scientific inquiry, is that which is contained in Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, vol. iv. fasc. ii. Leipzig, 1853.

iv. Coptic.—The Coptic ordinal, which may be presumed to retain the chief traditions of the later church of Alexandria, was first published in its present form by Gabriel, son of Tarik, patriarch of Alexandria, in 1141. It has been printed in the West from several different MSS. which do not materially differ: (1) The greater part of it was first translated into Latin by father Kircher, from a MS. which was sent to the Propaganda, and published by Bartold Nihulius at Cologne in 1653, in the Συμμετρία of Leo Allatius; this was reprinted by Morin, de Sac. Ordin. (2) The offices for the ordination of a bishop, metropolitan, and patriarch, which had been omitted by Kircher, were printed by Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental. vol. i. from a Paris MS. and the office for a patriarch also from Ebnassal, Epitome Canonum, A.D. 1239, and from Abulbireat Lampas tenebrarum, saec. xiv. (3) A later version from other Paris MSS. is given by Vansleb, Histoire de l'Église d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1677, p. 4, sect. 2. (4) J. S. Asseman translated the offices for a reader, subdeacon, deacon, presbyter, and bishop from a Vatican MS., and published them in his Dissertatione dell'azione dei Copti, &c. 1733, which was reprinted by Mai, Script. Vet. vol. v. pars ii. § 5. An orthodox Copt, Raphael Tuki, published in 1761, under the auspices of the Propaganda, an edition of both the euchologion and the pontifical from MSS. which he found at Rome; a Latin version of this is published, with a collation of other editions, in Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii. Würzburg, 1864.

iii. Jacobite.—The ordinal of the Jacobite Syrians, which probably retains the main features of that of the church of Antioch, is said to have been arranged by Michael the Great about A.D. 1190. It has been published in three forms, between which there are considerable differences. (1) By Morin in Syriac and Latin; (2) by Renaudot, Perpetuité de la Foi de l'Église Catholique from a MS. in the Grand Ducal Library at Florence. (3) It is also found as a collation with the Nestorian ordinal in J. S. Asseman, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. p. 2. Probably older than any of these ordinals in their present form are the canonical directions which are given by Gregory Abulfaradsch (Bar-Hebraeus), who in the 13th century formed a collection of canons, a Latin version of which by J. A. Asseman is published in Mai, Script. Vett. Nov. Coll. vol. x. pars ii.

iv. Maronite.—The Maronite ordinal so nearly resembles the Jacobite ordinal as to have been sometimes identified with it. It was first printed by Morin, but imperfectly, inasmuch as the MS. which he used was a Diaconicon and not a full Pontifical. It has since been fully printed (1) by J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. vol. ix. x. from a collation of ancient MSS. supplied by a Maronite patriarch; (2) by Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii., who has reprinted Asseman's text, with the addition of a collation of some important materials which had been left in MS. by Renaudot.

v. Nestorian.—The Nestorian ordinal ascribes to itself a higher antiquity than any of the other Oriental ordinals. It bears the names of the patriarchs Marabas I. †552, and Jesubab †660 of Cyprian, bishop of Nisibis, fl. 767, and of Gabriel, metropolitan of Bussorah, circ. 884. It has been printed (1) by Morin from a Vatican MS. in both Syriac and Latin, the Latin version being however to some extent untrustworthy; (2) by J. S. Asseman, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. p. 2, from the same and other Vatican MSS., but with an amended Latin version; (3) by J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. vol. xiii.; (4) by G. P. Badger, The Nestorians and their Rituals, London, 1852, from MSS. which differ in many, but comparatively unimportant, points from those which were used by the two Assemanians; (5) by Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii., who has reprinted both the text of the Assemanians and that of Badger. [E. H.]

ORDINARY OF THE MASS. The definition of ordinarium (-ius) is liber continens ordinem divini officii. In reference to the Mass this would imply the fixed framework of the service into which the variable parts, proper to the day or season, are fitted, and by popular usage is taken to mean the whole of the service, except the canon. I. Names for Ordination.

The Greek and Latin words which were used to express either the whole or part of the series of processes which in English are commonly grouped together under the word ordination, are so numerous and so significant as to throw considerable light upon the conception which was entertained as to the nature of the processes themselves. It is therefore necessary to treat of them with some minuteness of detail.

i. Some of them are words which were in ordinary use to denote civil elections or appointments; ii. Others are ordinary words for promotion to dignity; iii. Others express only the fact that a person was ranked in the κληρος or ordo; iv. Others connote a special sacredness in the office itself, and the performance of sacred rites in admission to it.

i. Words denoting appointment or election :

(1) χειροτονεῖν (χειροτονία): this word is used (a) in the New Testament, Acts xiv. 23, χειροτονήσαντες δὲ αὐτοῖς κατ' ἐκκλησίαν πρεσβυτέρους; 2 Cor. viii. 19 (of Titus), χειροτονηθῆς ὑπὸ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν; (b) in sub-apostolic Greek, St. Ignat. ad Philad. c. 10; (c) in the Clementines, Clement. Epist. ad Jacob. c. 2; (d) in the Apostolical Constitutions, e.g. 2, 2, 27; 7, 46; and the Apostolical Canons, e.g. 2, 36; (e) in the Canon Law, e.g. Conc. Ancyra. A.D. 314, c. 13: Neocaes. A.D. 315, c. 3: Nicaen. A.D. 325, c. 16, 19: Antioch, A.D. 341, c. 2; (f) in the Civil Law, e.g. Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 42 (41), § 9; Novell. Justin. 6, c. 4. Its meaning was originally "to elect," but it came afterwards to mean, even in classical Greek, simply "to appoint to office," without itself indicating the particular mode of appointment (cf. Schömann, de Comitibus, p. 122). That the latter was its ordinary meaning in Hellenistic Greek, and consequently in the first ages of church history, is clear from a large number of instances: e.g. in Josephus, Ant. 6, 13, 9, it is used of the appointment of David as king by God, id. 13, 2, 2, of the appointment of Jonathan as high priest by Alexander: in Philo, 2, 76, it is used of the appointment of Joseph as governor by Pharaoh: in Lucian, de morte Peregrini, c. 41, of the appointment of ambassadors: in inscriptions, e.g. Le Bas et Waddington, No. 42, of the appointment of municipal officers; and so also of civil appointments in ecclesiastical writers, e.g. in Sozomen, H. E. 7, 24, of the appointment of Arcadius as Augustus by Theodosius; in Isidore of Pelusium, Epist. 2, 264, of the appointment of military officers. In later times a new connotation appears, of which there is no early trace; it was used of the stretching out of the bishop's hands in the rite of imposition of hands. But the 12th century canonist who affirms this to be the contemporary meaning, admits also that the word was used in earlier times in reference to election (Zonaras, ad Can. Apost. 1). About a century later the earlier meaning so completely passed away, that Balsamon in his commentary on the same passage of the Apostolical Canons, contradicts Zonaras by denying its existence. (For the ultimate identification of χειροτονεῖν and χειροθετεῖν, see below.) (2) καθιστάνειν (κατάστασις): this is the most common word. It is first found in Clem. R. 1, 42 (of the Apostles), καθίστανον τὰς ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν . . . εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ δ., and it is afterwards found in all classes of ecclesiastical literature: e.g. Clement. Hom. 3, 64: Διατ. Κλήμ., 17; St. Iren. adv. Haer. 3, 2, 3: Conc. Ancyra. c. 10, 18, Nicaen. c. 4, Sardic. c. 11, 15, Laod. c. 11, Chalch. c. 2: Const. Apost. 2, 1: Euseb. H. E. 2, 1: Soerat. H. E. 1, 9: S. Athanas. Hist. Arian. c. 75, p. 308. It is the ordinary classical and Hellenistic word for appointment, without any religious or ecclesiastical connotation. (3) προχειρίσθαι (προχειρίσις): e.g. Const. Apost. 6, 23, εἰς ἱερῶσύνην: id. 7, 31, ἐπισκόπων καὶ πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διακόνους: Conc. Nicaen.

c. 10; Socrat. H. E. 1, 9; 2, 6; 7, 2; Euseb. H. E. 2, 1: Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 48 (47). The word is common in later classical Greek in the sense of "to elect," e.g. Polyb. 3, 97, 2; 6, 58, 4. Lucian, Toxar. c. 10; and this is sometimes its meaning in ecclesiastical Greek: but its more usual meaning in ecclesiastical Greek is "to propose a name for election," as is clearly shewn, e.g. by Socrat. H. E. 1, 9: προχειρίζεσθαι ἢ υποβάλλειν ὀνόματα (in the synodical letter of the council of Nicaea), id. 2, 6, where it is co-ordinated with σπεύδειν = "hasten": in later Greek this became its ordinary meaning, e.g. Nicetas Paphlag. Vit. S. Ignat. Constant. ap. Migne, P. G. vol. cv. 501, says "many having been proposed for election (προχειριζομένων), but some having failed of their object for one reason, some for another": cf. the notes of H. Valois to Euseb. Vit. Constant. iii. c. 62, and of Hase to Leo Diaconus, Hist. vi. 6. An instance of its use in this sense in secular Greek occurs in an inscription at Corycus in Cilicia, ap. Le Bas et Waddington, No. 1421. (4) προβδύλλεσθαι: e.g. Conc. Chalc. c. 2; Socrat. H. E. 2, 37, 42; 5, 8, 21; 6, 11: in its classical sense of "to propose a name for election," and hence almost identical with προχειρίζεσθαι. (5) ἐρίξεσθαι: 1 Conc. Antioch. c. 17: probably from its use in the New Testament, e.g. Acts, 17, 31. (6) constituere: e.g. St. Cyp. Epist. 24: 49: 65, 3: in clerico ministerio constitui, id. 66; probably, as in classical Latin, e.g. Cic. pro Deiot. c. 9, Suet. Tib. c. 65, equivalent to καθιστάνειν, and equally colourless in its meaning: but co-ordinated with eligere in S. Hieron. Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9.

ii. Words implying promotion to dignity: (1) προελθεῖν: Const. Apost. 6, 17; Conc. Trull. c. 6. (2) προάγεσθαι: Conc. Ancy. c. 12, Nicaen. c. 1, Laod. c. 26, Trull. c. 6. (3) ἀναβαλεῖν: Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 53 (52): cf. Socrat. H. E. 1, 9, προσαναβαλεῖν εἰς τὴν τιμὴν. (4) promoveri: ad eorum, Conc. Illib. A.D. 305, c. 80: ad ordines, 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6. (5) consecndere: ad gradum presbyterii, Cod. Lugd. 269, ap. Haenel Corp. Legum ante Justin. lat. p. 238. (6) praesumi, procehi, praeferr: 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 4; Cassian, Collat. 4 1, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xlix. 585.

iii. Words implying place in the κλήρος, or ordo: (1) κληροῦσθαι: S. Iren. 3, 2, 3; Euseb. H. E. 5, 28; Socrat. H. E. 1, 8. (2) ἐν κλήρῳ πάττεσθαι, κατατάττεσθαι, Const. Apost. 8, 3; Conc. Trull. c. 38. (3) ἐναριθμεῖσθαι: τῷ τάγματι τῶν ἱερατικῶν S. Basil. Epist. 54 (181), ap. Migne, P. G. xxxii. 400. (4) καταλέγεσθαι: ἰ. e. to be assigned a place in the κατάλογος (Conc. Chalc. c. 7; cf. 1 Tim. v. 9). (5) ordinare (ordination): found in almost all writers from Tertullian onwards: e.g. Tertull. de Praescr. Haeret. c. 41; Clement. Recogn. 3, 65; 6, 15; S. Cyp. Epist. 33; 68, 3; S. Ambros. Epist. 63, 65; Conc. Illib. A.D. 305, c. 30; 1 Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 2; 1 Carth. c. 8; 1 Tolet. c. 2; and the Civil Law, passim. The earlier classical meaning of the word had already been narrowed in its civil use, from administration in general to the appointment of magistrates: e.g. Suet. Dom. c. 4; Vespas. c. 23; so, as late as Carolingian times, e.g. in the Capit. Langobard. A.D. 782, § 2, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 42. The secular use which comes nearest its ecclesiastical use is in the army, where "ordinati" = "qui ordinem adepti sunt, id est, centuriones facti" (Corpus Inscr. Lat. ed. Mommsen, vol. iii. no. 830). It was used of the appointment, not only of clergy, but also of monks and abbats; e.g. Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 3, in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., vol. iii.

iv. Words denoting admission to office, and especially to sacred office. (1) χειροθετεῖν (χειροθεσία): first found in Clem. Alex. Paed. 1, 5, p. 104, ed. Pott; and Origen in Matth. vol. iii. p. 660, ed. Delarue, of Christ putting His hands on the young children: so, also, in a general sense, in Doctrin. Orient. c. 32, ap. Clem. Alex. ed. Pott, p. 964. Its earliest uses in reference to the clergy are probably Conc. Neocaes. c. 9, Nicaen. c. 8, 19, 1 Antioch. c. 17, Const. Apost. 2, 32; frequently afterwards. But it is difficult to determine accurately the time at which χειροθετεῖσθαι came into general use in reference to ordination, because the texts of the MSS., especially of writers and councils of the 4th century, vary so much between χειροτονία and χειροθεσία as to make the determination of the reading, in the present state of criticism as applied to patristic Greek, a matter of great uncertainty. Instances of such variations will be found in the MSS. of Conc. Antioch. c. 21: St. Basil. Epist. 217 (3) ad Amphilocho. c. 51, p. 325; Conc. Chalc. c. 15. No doubt, after χειροθεσία was once introduced, χειροτονία tended to be identified with it, as is clear from a comparison of Isidore of Pelusium, Epist. 1, 26 with id. Epist. 2, 71, where the two words are used interchangeably of the same person in reference to the same thing. That the earlier meaning of χειροτονία still survived, is clear from its use a few years afterwards in Theodoret; e.g. Quaest. in 3 Reg. c. 8, int. 27, of God's appointment of Solomon; id. in Epist. ad Rom. c. 4, v. 17, of the appointment of Abraham as πατέρα πάντων; but that the original distinction between the words was afterwards completely lost, is shewn by the somewhat clumsy attempt of Symeon of Thessalonica to invent a new one (de Sac. Ordin. c. 156, p. 138). It need hardly be pointed out that the identification of the two words is of great significance in regard to the history of the conception of ordination. (2) ἐπαῖσθαι (Sozom. H. E. 1, 23), or ιεροῦσθαι, whence the designation of those who are in major orders as οἱ ἱερομένοι (sometimes written ἱερόμενοι); e.g. Justin. Nov. 3, 2, 1; Socrat. H. E. 1, 11. The use of the word in the sense "to be ordained," as well as in its classical sense, "to serve as a priest," is made certain by its use in the active in an inscription ap. Richter, Griech. u. Lat. Inschriften, ed. Francke p. 134, cf. ib. p. 138.

(3) consecrari (consecratio): S. Ambros. Epist. 63, § 59, vol. ii. p. 1037, of Aaron and Eleazar, probably as a translation of ἀγιάζειν; of Christian bishops, presbyters, and deacons, S. Leon. Magn. Epist. 6 (4), c. 6, vol. i. p. 620; of an abbes, Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 4, ed. Haddan and Stubbs; of a virgin, ib. 2, 3, 8; Can. Eccles. Afric. c. 16; Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 11. (4) benefici (benefictio): levitica, Conc. Araus. A.D. 441, c. 23; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 6; Conc. Autissiod. A.D. 578, c. 20, 2 Conc. Caesaraugust. A.D. 592, c. 1; of a widow or virgin, Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 7.

II. Nature of Ordination.

It is evident, from the foregoing enumeration of facts, that most of the phrases which were in use in the earlier period to denote appointment to office in the church, were also in use to denote appointment to office, or promotion to dignity, in the empire. It may reasonably be inferred that they had in the former case meanings analogous to those which they had in the latter; and since the evidence which exists in regard to the former is abundant, whereas that which exists in regard to the latter is scanty, the one may fairly be used to throw light upon the other. In the absence of any convenient manual to which reference could be made, it is necessary to mention here the leading facts which have been established in regard to it.

1. The most common mode of appointment to office in the earlier empire, as under the republic, was that of popular election. The form of such an election was preserved long after the substance had disappeared; and it was preserved in the provinces after it had practically ceased to exist at Rome. In the case of two provincial towns of Baetica, Salpensa and Malaca, bronze tablets containing the original regulations for election have been preserved. They are especially important in relation to the present subject, as shewing (1) the conditions which were imposed as to the eligibility of candidates, (2) the importance of the presiding officer. That officer had the function of examining the candidates in set form, before votes were recorded: he could refuse to take account of votes which were given for a candidate who did not satisfy him: he could, in default of other candidates, himself nominate candidates, and declare them to be duly elected: and, as at Rome, the election was only complete when he formally announced it (renunciavit). Hence, an officer who was really elected by popular vote was technically said to be made (creatus) by the presiding officer. (See on the whole subject, Mommsen, Die Stadt-rechte der lateinischen Gemeinden Salpensa und Malaca, Leipzig, 1855, and also in the Abhandlungen der Königl. Sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, bd. 3; Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, bd. 1, pp. 464-474, where references will be found to a large number of other authorities.)

2. Gradually free election by the people, subject only to the veto of the presiding officer in the case of legal ineligibility on the part of a candidate, was superseded by election by the senate, subject only to a formal approval on the part of the people. This became the case at Rome so early as the time of Tiberius (Tacit. Ann. i. 15), and by the 4th century had become the prevailing, though not the universal, rule throughout the empire (Ulpian. Dig. i. 1, 3, 4; Cod. Theodos. 11, 30, 53; 12, 6, 20; Cod. Just. 7, 62, 2; 10, 31, 46, make popular election invalid; but from Cod. Theod. 12, 5, 1 it may be gathered that popular election was still the rule in Africa, since the magistrates are cautioned to procure the election of suitable persons: this is also to be inferred from Renier, Inscriptions d'Algérie, no. 4070, where a municipal officer specially mentions his election by the Ordo, as though it were exceptional). The continuance of the formal appeal to the people is shewn so late as the end of the 3rd century, in the account of the election of the emperor Tacitus (Vopisc. Tacit. c. 7). Of course under the imperial régime the part which the senate played in the actual selection of candidates tended to become no more free than the part of the people; but the important fact is that the form of election by the senate remained until late times, and that even after the disintegration of the empire the greater civil appointments were made, not directly by constitutive nomination, but indirectly through the form of "commendatio" (cf. the letters of Theodoric to the senate, ap. Cassiodor. Variar. e.g. lib. 5, Epp. 22, 41).

3. From the earliest times the chief officers of state had possessed and exercised the right, which must be carefully distinguished from the right of commendatio, of nominating certain of their subordinates without the necessity of even a formal submission of the names to either the senate or the people. The right had been jealously guarded, and in some cases restricted, but it had never passed away, and the emperors were able to make, especially in the provinces, a large number of direct appointments without violating any constitutional forms. It is recorded among the many virtues of Alexander Severus that he voluntarily limited his own privilege in this respect by consulting the people before making any important provincial appointment, "hortans populum ut si quis quid haberet criminis probaret manifestis rebus;" and it is interesting to note that, although himself a heathen, he adduces as a reason for the course which he pursued the example of appointments in the Christian church (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. c. 45). On the general question of appointment by superior officers, see Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, bd. i. pp. 181-192, bd. ii. pp. 860-873).

The facts which exist in reference to early ecclesiastical appointments corroborate in a striking manner the general presumption that, since the same words were used for them as for civil appointments, the same modes of appointment prevailed.

1. Of the existence of appointment by popular election some proofs have been given elsewhere. [BISHOP, Vol. I. p. 213; ELECTION, p. 599.] But as in the Roman municipalities, so also in the Christian churches, popular election, though a condition of appointment, did not of itself constitute appointment. Just as a civil appointment was not valid until the officer who presided at the election had accepted and declared it, so it was also in the case of ecclesiastical appointments. "The seven" were chosen by the church, but they were appointed by the apostles; the word used of the former is ἐξελέξαντο, of the latter, καταστήσωμεν (Acts vi. 3, 5). This distinction, which has been often ignored, is of great significance. Nor is it the only point of analogy between civil and ecclesiastical elections. Just as, on the one hand, popular elections were not constitutive, so, on the other hand, they were not absolutely free. Checks of two kinds existed—(1) conditions were imposed on the eligibility of candidates, and means were taken to ascertain that these conditions were complied with; (2) the approval of other persons or bodies was required to make the election valid. The operation of the former of these checks resulted in the gradual establishment of a complicated series of qualifications, and of a system of examination, with a view to test qualifications. [ORDERS, HOLY: iv. Qualifications for: Examination for.] The operation of the second check was shewn in the gradual narrowing of the function of the laity from election to express or tacit approval. Just as in the empire, the senate at Rome, or the curia in a municipality, came to interfere in popular elections, and ultimately to render them nugatory; so pari passu in the church, appointment by election passed into appointment by co-optation, and ultimately into appointment by nomination of either the bishop or the civil power.

2. The second mode of appointment which existed in the empire thus tended to become the prevailing mode in the church. It had no doubt existed in the earliest times, for Clement of Rome speaks of the successors of the apostles as having been appointed by other distinguished men with the consent of the whole church (ὅφ' ἐτέρων ἐλλογίμων ἀνδρῶν συνευδοκασίας τῆς ἐκκλησίας πάσης, Epist. 1 ad Cor. c. 44); but its employment seems to have been local and limited. The function which Cyprian assigns to the African and Spanish clergy in ecclesiastical appointments, is that of consenting or giving testimony, not that of nominating or appointing (cf. especially Epist. 68, 3, i. p. 1026, which is important because it expressly applies to the appointment of deacons as well as of bishops); and it is clear from the case of Cornelius that this was the case also at Rome (id. Epist. 10, i. p. 770). But in the 4th century it is clear from the synodical letter of the council of Nicaea to the church of Alexandria, that in that church the right of the people to elect was limited by the right of the clergy to propose names (προχειρίζεσθαι ἢ υποβάλλειν ὀνόματα). The council punishes the Melitian clergy (who had supported Arius) by depriving them of that right, but allows them to succeed to the vacancies caused by death among the orthodox clergy, provided that they are found worthy, that the people elect them, and that the bishop of Alexandria votes for them and confirms the election (Socrat. H. E. 1, 9; Sozom. H. E. 1, 24). It was probably this right of proposing names for election which in the case of the clergy of the Christian churches, as beyond question in the case of the Roman municipalities, resulted in the virtual election by the clergy, subject only to approval, by acclamation or by silence, on the part of the people. The fourth canon of the same council has sometimes been interpreted as being a formal substitution of co-optation for popular election in the case of bishops (cf. Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. i. p. 384; Van Espen, Jus Eccles. p. 1 tit. 13, n. 10); and in the course of the next quarter of a century the council of Laodicea (c. 13) expressly enacted that the elections of those who are to be appointed to the priesthood (by which Zonaras and Balsamon understand the presbyterate, Aristenus the episcopate) are not to be entrusted to popular assemblies (τοῖς ὄχλοις). At the beginning of the following century, Theophilus of Alexandria gives the election to the clergy (πᾶν τὸ ἱερατεῖον), the approval of the candidates (δοκιμάζειν) and their formal appointment (χειροτονεῖν) to the bishop. The part of the people consists, as in later times, only in their bearing public testimony at the time of appointment (S. Theophil. Alexandr. can. 6; Migne, P. G. vol. lxx. 40). The existence of this mode of election at the time, probably somewhat later, when the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions was written, is clear from the mention of a presbyter as having been advanced to his rank "by the vote and decision (ψῆφος καὶ κρίσει) of the whole clerus" (Const. Apost. viii. 15; cf. the expression in the same book, c. 4, "nominated and approved," ὀνομασθέντος καὶ ἀρέσσαντος).

3. The third mode of appointment which existed in the empire existed also in the church, but to a more limited extent. Some officers were appointed by the mere nomination of a superior officer. An archdeacon was appointed by bishop, a singer by a presbyter. But the number of such officers was small; the original democratical constitution of the church shewed itself in the jealous limitation of such appointments. In all but a few cases the nominations were in the form of a "commendatio;" they were subject to the approval of either the clergy or the people, or both. And just as under the empire, this form of nomination was frequently in the form of a letter or a speech, setting forth the virtues of the person to be appointed, so it was also in the church. An interesting example of such a speech is that which Sidonius Apollinaris made at the election of a bishop of Bourges, and which he has himself recorded. It concludes by giving the form of nomination: "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti Simplicius est quem provinciae nostrae metropolitanum civitatis vestrae summum sacerdotem fieri debere pronuntio," and by asking the people to signify their assent. (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. 7. 9, p. 190.)

As the organisation of the Roman empire became gradually weaker, while that of the church grew stronger and more centralized; as the power and importance of the episcopate increased and that of the presbyterate diminished; and as, moreover, a new group of ideas clustered round the primitive conception of the clerical office, the whole system of appointments to office underwent significant modifications. But in the altered types which tended to prevail in the East and West respectively, the old elements were still present, though in varying degrees, and these elements have been so far ignored and overlaid in subsequent times, that it is important to shew in detail the extent to which they once existed.

i. There was always, in the case at least of those which had been from the beginning the chief grades of ecclesiastical office, viz. those of bishop, presbyter, deacon, and reader, either the reality or the semblance of an election. To a few offices, e.g. those of archpresbyter, archdeacon, acolyte, and doorkeeper, the bishop could probably appoint proprio motu. But in the other cases he was only the executive officer of the community. He was in the position of the returning officer at an election to civil office in the empire. He had the right of rejecting unworthy candidates, in certain cases the right of proposing candidates, and in all cases the right of renunciatio or declaration of election. But the church, i.e. either the clergy and laity acting together, or the clergy alone, or the laity alone, has always exercised on the one hand the right of presenting persons for appointment, on the other the right of veto. Both these rights are survivals of the older right of election by direct vote. That older right was gradually limited and nullified by the operation of a regulation which had been introduced as a safeguard. In the course of the 4th century it had become the rule that no ecclesiastical election was valid unless the bishop or bishops had voted with the majority.* In the election of a bishop the votes of at least three neighbouring bishops were required; in the election of a presbyter the vote of the bishop of the church in which the election took place was sufficient. (That this is the true interpretation of the second apostolical canon is admitted by both Zonaras and Aristenus, who explain χειροτονεῖν by ψηφίζειν. Balsamon's view, which is based on the later practice, is contradicted not only by historical facts, but by his own interpretation of Conc. Laod. c. 13, which he makes to refer to presbyters as well as to bishops.) It is easy to see how this regulation operated in course of time to throw the election practically into the hands of the bishops; the bishops came thus to fulfil a double function, they both elected, subject, as will be shewn below, to testimony and to veto, and admitted to office. But it is important to note that between these two functions there was a recognised difference. In two of the oldest Western ordinals the election, as represented by the summons to objectors to come forward, and the "advocatio" or call to office, take place on Wednesday and Friday, the imposition of hands and the benediction take place on the following Saturday. (Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i. p. 88; Mabillon, Ord. Rom. ix. p. 90.) In later ordinals the separate elements are combined in a single service; but even in them there is a clear distinction between the declaration of election ("eligimus" &c., see below) and the subsequent "benedictio" or "consecratio."

But since election, except in the case of bishops (for which see BISHOP, Vol. I. pp. 213, sqq.), became in later times a mere form, it will be advisable here to shew briefly the extent to which it existed. For this purpose we shall take the unimpeachable testimony of the ordinals of both the Eastern and Western churches, in preference to collecting historical examples, or citing more or less rhetorical passages from ecclesiastical writers.

(a) Election of Presbyters.—In almost all Western ordinals the bishop begins the office for the ordination of presbyters by announcing the fact of their election to the people: "By the help of our Lord God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, we elect N. to the order of the presbyterate. . . ." (Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 31; Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. S. Elig. Becc. Corb. i.; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. Vet. ii. p. 91; Catalani, Ord. ii.)^b That this formula was regarded, even until comparatively recent times, as the declaration of an actual election, is shewn by the fact, that when a presbyter was appointed by the pope's mandate it was omitted. (Cæremoniale Ambrosianum, published by order of S. Carlo Borromeo, p. 69, ed. Milan, 1619.) The later English ordinals are more explicit than other Western ordinals in recognising the two factors of the electoral body, "electi sunt a nobis et clericis huic sanctae sedis famulantibus" (Sarum, Exeter, and Winchester ordinals in Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. iii. pp. 155, 160); and this explicit recognition is preserved in the modern Roman pontifical, where the bishop addresses the presbyters-elect as "quos ad nostrum adiutorium fratrum nostrorum arbitrium consecrandos elegit" (Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 12, § 5). No doubt election became a fiction; how or when it began to become so is uncertain. Historical references to it occasionally appear in comparatively late writers, e.g. Venantius Fortunatus (?) in the Life of Medard of Noyon (c. 3, Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxviii. p. 536) says "presbyterii officium electus excepit, probatus obtinuit," and it is clear that it was the rule at the time when the Liber Diurnus was compiled, inasmuch as that book contains a formula for a papal precept requiring a bishop to proceed to the ordination of a presbyter without election ("sine suffragatione;" Lib. Diurn. Rom. Pontif. c. 5, tit. 1, ed. Garnier, p. 91). In the subsequent address to the people, asking for their prayers, the election is attributed to the grace of God, the assumption being made, as e.g. in Acts i. 24, 26, that election is an indication not so much of human choice as of the divine will; so Sacram. Leon. Pontif. Ecgb.; Catalani, Ord. i. In the later Eastern ordinals this is almost the only trace of election which has survived; e.g. in the Maronite ordinal, according to Asseman and Renaudot, ap. Denzinger ii. p. 151; in the Nestorian, according to both Asseman and Badger, ap. Denzinger, ii. p. 236, 267; in the Coptic, according to Kircher and Vansleb (but not according to Asseman) ap. Denzinger ii. p. 12. But that this is only part of the earlier Eastern practice is shewn by the fact that the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions (c. 15), which is peculiarly Eastern in its character, speaks of a presbyter, in the formula for his ordination, as having been elected by the vote of the whole clergy.

(b) Election of Deacons. In the earliest ordinal of the Gregorian type, the Missale Francorum, the deacons are expressly stated to be elected by the clergy, and the assent of the people is requested. The election is claimed as a special privilege of the "sacerdotes," but the bishop desires to know whether the people judge the ordinance to be worthy: "et si vestra apud meam concordat electio, testimonium quod vultis vocibus adprobate." After the prayer which follows, the bishop adds "commune votum [the word in its mediaeval sense is equivalent to the Greek ψῆφος, the English 'vote'; see Ducange, s.v.] communis prosequatur oratio." In almost all the later western ordinals, the bishop begins the office for the ordination of deacons with the same formula, mutatis mutandis, as in the case of presbyters, declaring their election; so e.g. Cod. Vat. ap. Muratori, Pontif. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Becc. S. Elig. Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 91; so also in the modern Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. ii. § 3.

* The principle which this involves was known to the civil law, which may possibly have borrowed it from the Christian practice: Julian enacted that no one should become a public teacher or a physician without a "decretum curialium, optimorum conspirante consilio." Cod. Theodos. 13. 3. 5 = Cod. Justin. 10. 52, 7.

^b For an account of the ordinals and other authorities which are thus designated here and throughout the present article, see ORDINAL.

And although in that declaration of election the co-operation of the church is not expressly mentioned, it is clearly implied in the formula which follows it, as it follows the corresponding declaration in the Missale Francorum, "commune votum communis oratio prosequatur" (so Cod. Maff., Pont. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Becc. Mogunt. Corb. i., Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii.; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii. and in the modern Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. ii. § 5).

(c) Election of Subdeacons. It is not certain whether during the first nine centuries subdeacons were elected in the same way as presbyters and deacons, or whether they were, as subordinate officers of the church, appointed by the bishop. The doubt is chiefly caused by the variety of reading in the earliest Western ordinals in the general formula of declaration of election which has been already mentioned. Some of them insert the word "subdiaconii," others omit it. The insertion of the word can be easily accounted for, at the period to which most of the ordinals belong, by the struggle of the subdiaconate to be ranked among major orders; the omission is difficult to explain if subdeacons, like deacons and presbyters, had been elected from the beginning. It may be added that the modern Roman Pontifical speaks of them in the litany which precedes this ordination as "electos" (p. i. tit. 10, § 7).

(d) Election of Readers. The most remarkable example of the conservation of the primitive practice of election is in the case of readers. All the ancient Western ordinals mention it, and almost all refer the election, not to the bishop, but to the "fratres," i.e. probably to the body of the clergy, "eligunt te fratres tui ut sis lector in domo Dei tui," so Miss. Francorum, Sacram. Gelas. c. 96, Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. Cod. Maff. Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Bisunt. Becc. Mogunt.; English ordinals ap. Maskell; Catalani, Ordo, i. (corrupted to "diligunt" in id. Ord. ii. iii.) Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 89 (so also the Cambray Pontifical and one Noyon Pontifical) has "elegerrunt," which is important as making it clear that the bishop's office was rather ministerial than co-operative.

ii. There was always the testimony of the church to the fitness of the candidate. It was necessary to have, not merely "suffragia," but "testimonia." This had been insisted upon from the earliest times. The pastoral Epistles require a bishop to have "a good report of them which are without" (1 Tim. iii. 7; see S. Chrysost. ad loc.) Cyprian speaks of Cornelius as having been made bishop "de clericorum paene omnium testimonio," as well as "de plebe quae tunc adfuit suffragio" (S. Cyp. Epist. 10. i. p. 770); and he apologises for having ordained Aurelius as a reader in his retirement on the ground of exceptional merit, "expectanda non sunt testimonia humana cum praecedunt divina suffragia" (id. Epist. 33. ii. p. 320). The eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions enacts, that after a person has been elected bishop, and presented for ordination, and formally identified as being the person elected, the further question must be put "whether he is attested by all as being worthy" (Const. Apost. 8, 4). So also Leo the Great lays down the rule, "expectarentur certe vota civium, testimonia populorum; quaereretur honoratorum arbitrium, electio clericorum" (S. Leon. Magn.

Epist. 10. aa Episc. per prov. Vienn. i. p. 637, cf. ibid. p. 639). And it was one of the accusations against Chrysostom at the synod of the Oak, that he had ordained persons "without testimony" (ἀμαρτύρας Phot. Bibl. cod. 59, p. 17). The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua, c. 22, require the "civium conviventia et testimonium," and 3 Conc. Brac. A.D. 572, c. 3, requires "multorum testimonium."

The ordinals continued the primitive requirement, and through them it has descended to modern times. It is almost always twofold, being a requirement of the separate testimony of the clergy and of the people; and since each of these requirements had its own form, it will be convenient to describe them separately.

(a) Testimony of the Clergy.—The Greek ordinal is apparently the only one which has preserved the primitive custom of asking for the viva voce testimony of the assembled clergy. The Western ordinals were framed in their present form after the archdeacon had become the officer who stood at the head of the clergy and next to the bishop. Consequently the voice of the clergy is expressed through the archdeacon. When he comes forward in the name of the church ("postulat sancta mater ecclesia Catholica ut hunc praesentem [subdiaconum] ad onus [diaconii] ordinetis"), the bishop asks "scisne illum dignum esse?" to which the archdeacon replies, "quantum humana fragilitas nosse sinit, et scio et testificor ipsum dignum esse ad hujus onus officii." This is the formula (1) in the case of presbyters and deacons (Cod. Maff. ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 62; Pontif. S. Dunst. Corb. i. Mogunt.; English ordinals ap. Maskell; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii. and in the modern Roman Pontifical, p. 1. tit. 12, § 3); but in Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 93, the enquiry is made of the presbyters who present the candidate. (2) In the case of subdeacons the corresponding formula does not appear in the existing ordinals (unless it be implied in the general formula which is given in Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 88), and its disappearance tends to confirm the doubt which has been expressed above, whether subdeacons were elected by the church and not rather appointed by the bishop. (3) In the case of readers and other minor orders, Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, ii. p. 88, preserves a formula which resembles that of the modern English ordinal: the bishop says, "vide ut natura, scientia, et moribus tales per te introducantur, immo per nos tales in domo Domini ordinentur personae per quas diabolus pellatur et clerus Domino nostro multiplicetur."

In later times the testimony of the clergy, signified through the archdeacon, had to be supplemented by the testimony of the parish priest and the schoolmaster of the candidate. The former was sufficient as long as the persons to be appointed were members of the church of the city in which the ordination took place, or had been trained under the eye of the archdeacon in the diaconium. But after the area of dioceses had become extended, and youths were entrusted to the care of parish priests (2 Conc. Vasens. A.D. 529, c. 1), the testimony of the latter was required, perhaps originally in place of, but afterwards in addition to, that of the archdeacon. A still later regulation required the further testimony of the master of the school at which the candidate had

(b) Testimony of the Laity.—The Western ordinals agree in requiring the testimony of the laity to the fitness of anyone who is appointed presbyter or deacon. The primitive rule seems to have been to consult the laity three days before the appointment was consummated by admission to office; so Mabillon, Ordo ix. ap. Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 90; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i. p. 88. But the later, and perhaps also occasionally the earlier, practice was to require the testimony to be given at the time of admission. The testimony was sometimes positive and sometimes negative. In the earliest of the later ordinals, the Missale Francorum (so Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii.) the bishop charges the people not to be silent, but to say openly what they think about the actions, character, and merits of those who are to be ordained presbyters, and requires them "electionem vestram publica voce profiteri." (It is remarkable that the same formula, with but slight changes of phrase, is preserved in the modern Roman pontifical, p. 1, tit. 12, § 4.) Nor does he proceed with the ordination until the testimony has been given: (it may be inferred from the analogous form at the ordination of bishops that the answer was expressed by "Dignus"). But the majority of ordinals require only negative testimony: they prescribe that an appeal shall be made to the people at the time of the declaration of election, and in continuation of the formula "By the help of our Lord God. . . ." (see above, under "Election of Presbyters.") "If anyone has anything against these men, let him in God's name, and for God's sake, come forth with boldness and say it." This is the prescribed form in the case of presbyters and deacons, in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; Pontif. Egb. St. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Becc. Mogunt.; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii., English ordinals ap. Maskell. In the case of readers, whose office, as being in primitive times the first step above the laity, had to be guarded with special care, the ordinals enact that the bishop is to address the people, "setting forth their faith and life;" so Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Cod. Maff., Pontif. Egb. Rem. Rodrad., Catalani, Ord. ii.

In later times it became a rule of the Western church that this testimony of the people should be asked for, not only at the time, and in the church of ordination, but also in the church in which the ordained resided, and that the parish priest should testify to having so asked for it. But the rule was not embodied in a canon earlier than the council of Trent, sess. 23, c. 5, and the fourth (provincial) council of Milan under St. Carlo Borromeo.

iii. There was also a declaration of appointment, corresponding to the civil renunciatio. In the Western church this was almost the only relic of the primitive election, and the form of declaration has been given above as an indication of the existence of election. But all the Eastern churches agree in giving considerable prominence to this element in ordination. 1. They all have a formula corresponding to the western formula, "By the help of our Lord God . . ." but different in its form, inasmuch as what in the one is regarded as the act of the church, is in the other regarded as the act of divine grace: ἡ θεία χάρις ἡ πάντοτε τὰ ἀσθενῆ θεραπεύουσα καὶ τὰ ἐλλείποντα ἀναπληροῦσα προχειρίζεται τὸν δεῖνα τὸν θεοφιλέστατον [διάκονον] εἰς πρεσβύτερον. The primitive character of this formula is proved by its being found, with unimportant variations, not only in all MSS. of the Greek ordinals, but also in all Oriental ordinals, for both presbyters and deacons. 2. All except the Greek ordinals have a much more elaborate formula, by which not only the appointment but also the admission of the newly ordained person is said to be complete. The Coptic formula in the ordination of a presbyter may be taken as typical. The bishop says, "We call thee into the holy church of God;" the archdeacon thereupon makes proclamation, "N. presbyter at the holy altar of the holy catholic and apostolic church of God of the Christian city M.;" the bishop confirms the archdeacon's words: "We call thee, N., presbyter of the aforesaid holy altar, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This is, with unimportant variations, the formula for both presbyters and deacons, among Copts, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians, (for the rituals in detail, see Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 9, 13, 67, 71, 73, 86, 91, 127, 232). It is remarkable that the Greek ordinals preserve no trace of it; but it is important to note, that a trace of it exists in Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i., Mabillon, Ord. Rom. ix., where, after describing the consultation of the laity three days before final admission to office, it is said that the ordinands are called up, from the lower level of the laity to the raised floor of the sanctuary ("advocantur sursum et statuuntur in sinistra parte altaris, usque dum pontifex missam compleat").

What, if any thing, besides this public declaration of appointment, was necessary in the earliest period to constitute the person appointed a church officer, is not always clear. Under the civil regime, which was reflected in so many ways upon the ecclesiastical organization, renunciatio was followed, either immediately or after a defined interval, by performance of the duties of the office. A Roman consul designatus dressed himself in his official dress, went in state to the Capitol, took his seat on the curule chair, and held a formal meeting of the senate; by doing this he became consul de facto; the whole process was a usurpatio juris; the ceremonies and forms with which it was accompanied were no more of the essence of the process than were its accompanying festivities of the essence of a Roman consensual marriage (Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, Bd. i. p. 503). In a similar way in the early church the declaration of appointment to office was followed by the public performance of the duties of that office. Even to the present day, in the chief Western rituals the newly-ordained deacon performs the deacon's function of reading the Gospel; in the Roman ritual the presbyter not only takes his place in the presbytery, but is "concelebrant" with the bishop, i.e., he is associated with him in the celebration of the eucharist: in the Greek ritual, the reader performs his proper function of reading, and the subdeacon, who in early times was a kind of under-servant, washes the bishop's hands. But between the renunciatio and this first public performance of duties, certain ceremonies came to intervene. To these ceremonies the canonists and theologians of the middle ages attached great importance, and the canonists and theologians of later times have for the most part assumed them to be essential. But in the period with which the present work mainly deals, they held a very different place from that which has since been assigned to them.

III. Rites of Ordination.

The ceremonies which were interposed between appointment to office and the usurpatio juris, or public entrance upon office, were mainly of two kinds—(a) prayer, accompanied in most cases by imposition of hands; (b), the formal delivery of the insignia and instruments of office. (a) It was both natural and fitting that any appointment should be accompanied by prayer, and prayer accordingly is found to accompany almost all appointments from the earliest beginning of ecclesiastical records. The significance of the rite is clearly expressed by St. Augustine: “quid aliud est manuum impositio quam oratio super hominem” (de bapt. c. Donat. 3, 16); and even the ultra-mysticism of Dionysius Areopagita finds no other meaning in it than that of fatherly sheltering and subjection to God (De Eccles. Hier. 5, 3, 3). But there had been from the first a connexion between the imposition of hands and the χαρίσματα, or “spiritual gifts;” and under the influence of the sacerdotal ideas of the 4th century this connexion became so strong that Basil, speaking of some schismatics, says: παρὰ τῶν πατέρων ἔσχον τὰς χειροτονίας καὶ διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν αὐτῶν εἶχον τὸ χάρισμα τὸ πνευματικόν (S. Basil, Epist. ad Amphiloch. 188 (canonica i.) vol. iv. p. 270). This led to a restriction of the rite of imposition of hands to the higher orders of clergy. It ceased to be part of the ceremony of admitting deaconesses (hence the great variety of interpretations of Conc. Nicaen. c. 19; cf. Van Espen and Hefele, ad loc.), or subdeacons (except among the Armenians, or readers (except among the Nestorians). And at last, in the 12th century, the theory of the connexion of the rite with the gift of the Holy Ghost was so firmly impressed upon Western Christendom, that some ordinals put into the bishop’s mouth at the time of imposition the words which have been retained in the English ordinal, “Receive the Holy Ghost;” (see below in the account of the ritual of the ordination of a presbyter; for a long series of patristic references see Morin, pars iii. p. 141).

(b) The history of the rites of delivering to the persons ordained the insignia and instruments of their office is less clear, but their origin is obvious. 1. The ceremony of admission to office was followed by the performance of the duties of the office. It was natural that the presiding officer should formally deliver to the newly ordained person the INSTRUMENTA [p. 862] of such a performance. A reader had to read: the book was delivered to him, and he read. A sub-deacon had to wash the bishop’s hands: a pitcher and towel were delivered to him. A deacon had, in southern countries, to drive away insects from the oblations upon the altar: a fan was delivered to him. [FLABELLUM.] The delivery of the eucharistic vessels to a presbyter is probably of late date; it is not found in the oldest Western ordinals (see below, Ordination of Presbyters, § 12); and it was probably limited in the first instance to the cases in which a presbyter was ordained, not to presbyterial rank in the cathedral, but to take charge of an outlying church; it was thus part of the ceremonies not so much of ordination as of institution or induction. But it must be noted, that almost all writers on the subject call attention to the much smaller stress which was laid upon these rites in the East than in the West. In the latter the opinion came to prevail in the schools, that the physical contact of the instruments by the ordinand was of the essence of the sacrament (S. Thom. Aq. Summa, pars iii. qu. 34, art. 5); whereas in the former (a) the instruments were delivered after the ordination was finished, (b) no formula of delivery was prescribed (see Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. 5, § 3; Morin, de Sac. Ordin. pars iii. exerc. ii.). 2. The delivery of vestments is sometimes traced back historically to the time of Gregory Nazianzen, who says that when ordained bishop he was vested by his ordainers in a long tunic or alb (τὸν ποδήρη) and a mitre (τὴν κίδαρι, S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. x. in seipsum, vol. i. p. 241). But the extreme scantiness of subsequent allusions to such a rite, and the absence of any mention of it, not only in the Apostolical Constitutions, but also in Dionysius Areopagita, tend to shew that, even if it existed, little stress was laid upon it. Its significance was originally the same as that of the vesting of one who was newly baptized. Nor was it the only point of close analogy between the ceremonies of baptism and those of ordination. The vesting in vestments, which became so important a part of the ordination ceremony in both East and West, and of which the details will be found below, is apparently of much later origin. The first certain mention of it is in 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, and it is absent from several of the most ancient Western ordinals. It grew up with the growth of a distinction between clerical and lay dress; its use can be traced in several instances to the influence of the regular upon the secular clergy; and its significance was determined by the mystical ideas which gradually attached themselves to the vestments which were worn at the celebration of the eucharist.

We now proceed to give an outline of the ritual which was observed in both the election on appointment and the admission of the several orders below the order of bishop [for which see vol. i. p. 221]. It has been necessary to append in the case of the Western rituals, the precise evidence which exists for the antiquity of the several rites: for in no department of Christian antiquities has there been a stronger tendency to assume that rites which prevailed in the 13th century prevailed also in the 8th, and that rites which prevailed in the 8th century are part of primitive Christianity. In the case of the Eastern rituals, references only are given to the authorities in which they will be found, because in the present state of knowledge on the subject it is impossible to determine with even approximate accuracy which of the several rites are ancient, and which are of later growth.

1. OSTIARIUS. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 9; Sacram. Gelas. i. 95; Amalarius, de

Eccl. Off. lib. i. 7; all Western ordinals of the Gregorian type; but not Mabillon, Ord. viii. ix. The majority of ordinals direct that the candidate shall be instructed by the archdeacon in his duties (so Sacram. Gelas., but not Anglo-Norman ordinals, except the Rouen Pontifical, nor Catalani, Ord. i., nor the Cambrai and Mainz Pontificals). At the suggestion of the archdeacon (not mentioned in Catalani, Ord. i.) the bishop is to give to the candidate the keys of the church (Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suesion. Bisunt. Rem. add "from the altar") saying, "So act as one who is to give account to God for the things which are opened by these keys." The deacon (Pontif. Corb. Rem. Radbod. Bisunt., St. Elig. Becc.), or the archdeacon (Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Bisunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell) delivers to him the door of the church (this is not mentioned by Sacram. Gelas., nor in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; but the Soissons Pontifical, the Cod. Radbod., and a Tours Pontifical mentioned by Martene, vol. ii. p. 18, not only mention it, but add a formula, apparently borrowed from the description of the office of the ostiarius in Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. ii. 14, Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 12, to the effect that the power is thereby delivered of admitting the good and rejecting the bad). A preface and form of benediction usually follow, without any rubric as to the point of the service at which they are to be used. In Cod. Radbod. they are placed before the delivery of the keys, which is probably their proper place. Some of the later ordinals, e.g. those of Mainz and Cambrai (see also the Pontif. Roman.) add, that after touching the keys the ostiarius is to go and ring the bell. When bells came into general use in churches, it naturally became the duty of the ostiarius to attend to them, for the preface, which probably belongs to an earlier time, implies that it was his duty to mark the "distinctionem certarum horarum, ad invocandum nomen Domini," i.e. the canonical hours of prayer.

2. READER. I. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 8; Sacram. Gelas. i. 96. Isid. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. ii. 11; Hrab. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 11; and all ordinals of the Gregorian type.) The bishop is to make an address to the people, setting forth the faith, and life, and ability of the person ordained; he is then to deliver him the book out of which he will have to read (so Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Codd. Maff. Rem. Rodrad. et al.: "codicem apicum divinarum;" Isid. Hisp., Albin. Flacc., Hrab. Maur.: "codicem Esaiæ prophetæ;" Cod. Ratold.: "lectionarium;" Pont. Mogunt., English ordinals: "lectionarium prophetiarum;" Cod. Colbert.=Martene, Ord. xvii.), saying, "Take, and be a reader of the Word of God, destined, if thou fulfil thine office faithfully and usefully, to have part with those who have ministered the Word of God" (so all Codd., omitted in Missale Franc. only). The bishop then makes the declaration of election ("pronuntiatio," Cod. Maff., "electio fratrum," Pontif. Bisunt.): "Thy brethren elect thee" ("have elected" Pontif. Camerac. Noviom., Hittorp, Ord. Rom. ii.) to be a reader in the house of thy God; and recognize thy office and fulfil it, for God is able to give thee abundant grace" (so almost all Codd., omitted in Pontif.

Radbod., Suession., Salisb., Bangor., Sarum.). Then follows in all ordinals a prayer for God's blessing on the newly-ordained reader.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. The Apostolical Constitutions (viii. c. 21) direct that a reader shall be ordained (προχέρισται) by imposition of hands, with a prayer that God will give him the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Prophecy. The later Greek rituals will be found in the Eucharologium ed. Goar, p. 233, ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 547; Codd. Bessar. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 71 sqq., ed. J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 120 sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Div. Ordin. c. 158, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. p. 366.

2. The Coptic are found in the Apostolical Constitutions in Coptic, ed. Tattam, c. 35; Morin, p. 505; Mai, Script. Vet. vol. v. pars ii. p. 209; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 2); the Jacobite in Greg. Barhebraeus, Nomocan. viii. 8; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 66; the Maronite in Morin, p. 388; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 20; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 115; the Nestorian in Morin, p. 442; J. S. Asseman, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 793; J. A. Asseman, vol. xiii. p. 1; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 227, with a collation of the rituals given by Badger, p. 262.

3. SINGER. I. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 10; Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom.; Catalani, Ord. ii.; Hittorp. Ord. Rom.; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. 2, 12; Hraban. Maur. de Inst. Cler. 1, 11; but omitted from many ordinals.) "A psalmist—i. e. a singer—after having been instructed by the archdeacon, can undertake the office of singing without the cognizance of the bishop, at the sole bidding of a presbyter, the presbyter saying to him, 'See that what thou singest with thy mouth thou believest with thine heart, and that what thou believest in thine heart thou approvest in deed.'" (In addition to this form, the pontificals of Ecgbert and St. Dunstan insert the words "sive psalmistarium" in the preface to the benediction of a reader, from which it may, perhaps, be inferred that when a singer was ordained by a bishop, the same form was used as for a reader, as was the case in the Greek church.)

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. (In most MSS. of the later Greek ordinals there is no distinction between the ordination of a singer and that of a reader; but there is a separate ritual in Cod. Leo Allat. ap. Morin, p. 104; J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 196.)

2. The Coptic is found in Vansleb, Hist. de l'Eglise d'Alexandrie, p. 4, sect. 2, c. 7, Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 63: not in Kircher, Morin, or Asseman; the Jacobite in Renaudot, ap. Denzinger, vol. ii. 66, not in Morin; the Maronite in Morin, p. 384; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 231; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 108. The Nestorians have no special ritual for the ordination of a singer.

4. EXORCIST. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 7; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 96, and all ordinals of the Gregorian type; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. 2, 13; Hraban. Maur. de Inst. Cler. i. 10; Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. 1, 9.) Some ordinals direct that the bishop, sitting with his mitre on his head, shall declare the duties of an exorcist (so Cod. Maff.; Pontif. Mogunt. Winton. Sarum. Exon.). All ordinals direct that the person ordained shall receive from the bishop a book of exorcisms, the bishop saying, "Take and commit to memory, and have power of imposition of hands upon one possessed, whether catechumen or baptized." A preface and prayer for God's blessing on the exorcist follow. (The Soissons pontifical makes this precede the delivery of the book, which is probably the right order.)

5. ACOLYTE. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 6; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 95, and all ordinals of the Gregorian type; Mabillon, Ord. Rom. viii. in Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 85, reprinted in Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 999.) The ancient ritual which is given by Mabillon directs only (1) that the clerk shall be vested in a chasuble and stole; (2) that the bishop shall put a bag over the chasuble (i. e. a bag for receiving and carrying the eucharistic offerings); (3) and that the bishop shall pray, "By the intercession of the blessed, and glorious, and ever-virgin Mary, and the blessed apostle Peter, may God save, and guard, and protect thee. Amen." The ritual of all other ordinals is as follows:—1. The bishop, sitting mitred in his chair, is to mention the duties of an acolyte (so Cod. Maff., Pont. Mogunt., and English ordinals ap. Maskell, except Pont. Bangor.; but the majority of ordinals merely direct that the bishop (or archdeacon, Missal. Franc.) shall previously instruct the person ordained in his duties. 2. The archdeacon (Sacram. Gelas., Statt. Eccl. Ant., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missale Franc., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Corb. i. Rodrad. Rotom. Rem.; see also Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. 2, 10) or the bishop (Cod. Maff., Cod. Turon. ap. Martene, vol. ii. p. 19, Pontif. Bisunt. Camerac., Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell, Catalan. Ord. i.) is to deliver to him a candlestick and candle. Some ordinals give no form of words (so Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missale Franc., Pontif. Rotom. Rem. Rodrad. Ecgb. S. Dunst.). Others give the form, "Take the candlestick and candle, and know that thou art charged with lighting the lights of the church" (so Cod. Maff., Pont. Bisunt. Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell). Others give the form, "Take this bearer (gestatorium) of light that by it ye may have power to chase away the darkness of the adversaries, and faithfully to find the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into this world" (so Pontif. Corb. i. Ratold. Suesion.). A further direction is sometimes given that the bishop is to say the words, the archdeacon to deliver the candlestick (so Pontif. Salisb. Camerac.). 3. The acolyte is then to receive an empty pitcher from the bishop (so Pontif. Bisunt. Camerac. Mogunt. Exon. Winton.), or from the archdeacon (Pontif. Sarum.: other ordinals do not say from whom—e. g. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Becc., Catal. Ord. i.) with the words, "Receive this pitcher to pour out wine at the Eucharist of the Blood of Christ" (so Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missal. Franc., Pontif. Ecgb. Corb. i. Rem. S. Dunst. Ratold. Noviom.; "and water" is added in Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisb. English ordinals ap. Mask., and sometimes in the following prayer, though not in this address, e. g. Catalan. Ord. i.). 4. A preface follows in many ordinals (not in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., nor in Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Ratold. Noviom. Salisb. Bisunt.), and a prayer for blessing in all (except Sacram. Gelas.); but the forms of prayer vary, some ordinals giving one prayer (so Missale Franc.), some two (so e. g. Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Ratold. Noviom.), some three

6. SUBDEACON. I. Western Rites.—Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 5; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 96, and all ordinals of the Gregorian type; Isidor. Hisp. de Div. Off. 2, 10; Amalarius, 1, 11; Hrab. Maur. 1, 8; Mabillon, Ordo Rom. viii. in Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 85, reprinted in Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 1001). The ancient ritual given by Mabillon directs that the person to be ordained shall be brought forward (apparently vested in a chasuble) and that he shall swear on the Holy Gospels that he is not guilty of any of the four classes of carnal sins (i. e. sodomy, adultery, deuterogamy, sin with a consecrated virgin); when he has done so the archdeacon or the bishop shall give him the holy cup, and say over him the same prayer as over an acolyte (see above). The ritual of the later ordinals is as follows: 1. The bishop, sitting mitred in his chair, declares the duties of subdeacons (Cod. Maff. and English ordinals ap. Maskell, except Pontif. Winton., which directs that the candidate shall previously have been instructed in his duties by the bishop; not in the majority of ordinals). 2. The bishop shall deliver to the person to be ordained an empty paten and chalice. 3. The archdeacon shall deliver to him an empty (Pontif. Sarum says "full") pitcher, a basin, and a towel. 4. The bishop shall say, "See of what the ministry is delivered to thee: if hitherto thou hast been tardy at church, henceforth thou must be busy; if hitherto sleepy, henceforth thou must be wakeful; if hitherto drunken, henceforth thou must be sober; if hitherto immodest, henceforth thou must be chaste. . . ." (This address is not found in Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; in Catalan. Ord. i. it is in later writing; it is placed before the delivery of the chalice and paten in Missal. Franc., Pontif. Rodrad. Rem. Senon. Ratold. Ecgb. Noviom.; it is placed after the delivery, but without any express rubric as to the point at which it should be spoken, in Cod. Maff., Pontif. S. Elig. Rotom. S. Dunst. Radbod. Salisb. Bisunt. Becc. Camerac.; it is expressly placed after the delivery in Pontif. Mogunt.) 5. Then follows a preface and prayer of benediction (so all ordinals, except Pontif. Radbod., which places these before the delivery of the paten and chalice). Three other rites are sometimes found; (a) the bishop gives the subdeacon a maniple; so Cod. Maff., which gives the formula of delivery, "Take the maniple, by which is designated the fruit of good works;" so, with a different formula, Pontif. Suesion.; so also, without a formula, Pont. Ecgb. and the later English ordinals, but not the intermediate English ordinals, viz. the Rouen, St. Dunstan's, and Winchester Pontificals; (b) the bishop vests the subdeacon in a tunic (Pontif. Camerac. Mogunt.; Catalan. Ord. ii.; English ordinals ap. Maskell, except the Winchester Pontifical); in the Exeter Pontifical only the subdeacon who is to read the epistle is vested in a tunic; (c) the bishop delivers to the subdeacon the book of the Epistles; the earliest mention of this is in an Arles Pontifical of the 13th century (Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vol. ii. p. 20), nor is it found in any of the sacramentaries or ordinals to which reference has been made in this article.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. The Apostolical

Constitutions (viii. c. 20) direct that in ordaining a subdeacon the bishop shall lay his hands upon him, and pray that God will give him grace worthily to handle the eucharistic vessels. The directions of the later Greek rituals are to be found in the Euchologium (ed. Goar, p. 244, ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 550; Codd. Bessa. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 71 sqq., ed. J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 118 sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Sac. Ord. c. 162, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. p. 367).

2. The Coptic in Morin, p. 505, J. A. Asseman ap. Mai, vol. v. pars ii. p. 210; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 4; the Jacobite in Greg. Barhebraeus, vii. 8, ap. Mai, vol. x. pars ii. p. 52; Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 67, 79; the Maronite in Morin, p. 392; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 34; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 121; the Nestorian in Morin, p. 444; J. S. Asseman, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 801; J. A. Asseman, vol. xiii. p. 9; Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 229, 263.

7. DEACON. I. Western Rites—(Sacram. Leon. ed. Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. i. p. 686, ed. Ballerin. p. 112; Sacram. Gregor., Codd. Vat. i. Othobon. ap. Muratori, vol. ii. p. 1066; these two sacramentaries contain preface and prayers only, without rubrical directions, and both agree; Sacram. Gelas. l. c. 20, 22, has a short ritual and prayers, which correspond with those of the other two sacramentaries; Sacram. Gelas. l. c. 95, has a short canon, = Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 3; the full ritual is found in the other ordinals of the Gregorian type, e.g. Cod. Rem. ed. Morin, de Sac. Ord. pars ii. p. 290; Cod. Vat. ii. ed. Murat. vol. iii. p. 33; Cod. Maff. ibid. p. 55; and in the editions of Menard, p. 235, Benedict. p. 223 = Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 221; another ritual is given in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 85.) i. The oldest ritual is probably that which occurs as a preliminary rubric in Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 20, Missale Franc., Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Rodrad., Catalani Ord. ii. Hittorp, Ord. i.; it is in entire harmony with primitive customs, and the ceremonies and prayers which follow it must be regarded as later expansions of it. (This is rendered almost certain by the form of the rubric in the Rouen Pontifical.) The bishop declares the election in the form given below; then follows a litany; when it is concluded, all rise from their knees, and the persons elected go up to the bishop's chair; the bishop gives a blessing upon their office; they then go down, and stand in the proper place of their order ("hac, sc. litaniam, expleta ascendunt ad sedem pontificis et benedicit eos ad quod vocati sunt, et descendunt et stant in ordine suo"). Afterwards the newly ordained deacons are to give their offerings (sc. of bread and wine) into the hand of the bishop, and to receive them back from him consecrated. (This important relic of the primitive communion is given in Pontif. S. Dunst., Cod. Maff., and Catalani Ord. ii. in the case of deacons; see below for its place in the ordination of presbyters.) ii. A probably less ancient ritual is that of Mabillon's Ordo viii. The subdeacon who is to be promoted to the diaconate stands, vested in a chasuble, a white tunic, sc. dalmatic, and holding a stole in his hand, before the steps of the altar; after the epistle (which is taken from 1 Tim. iii. 8) and the gradual he is divested of the chasuble, and the bishop having said a preface, a litany is said, all being prostrate. After the litany the bishop says the prayer of consecration; the new deacon kisses the bishop and priests, and vested in his dalmatic stands at the bishop's right hand.

iii. The later ordinals, with the exceptions of Mabillon, Ord. ix., Hittorp, Ord. i., as noted above, combine in one service the declaration of election and the admission to office, but at the same time preserve a clear distinction between them. (a.) Declaration of Election.—Several ordinals preserve the form of presentation by the archdeacon: "Our holy mother the Catholic church demands that thou shouldest ordain this present subdeacon to the burden of the diaconate;" the bishop asks, "Dost thou know him to be worthy?" the archdeacon replies, "As far as human frailty allows, I both know and testify that he is worthy of the burden of this office;" then the bishop says, "By the help of our Lord God and our Saviour Jesus Christ we elect this person to the order of the diaconate." This is the form in Codd. Maff. S. Dunst. Suess. Corb. Ratold, and in the modern Pontif. Rom.; Pontif. Vat. ap. Murat. Ecgb. Noviom. Catur. Becc. Rodrad. Rotom. Rem. Senon. omit the form of presentation, but give that of election; the Mainz and later English pontificals (except Pontif. Bangor.) give this form at the beginning of the ritual of a general ordination, and apparently for all orders; the words are slightly different. The Winchester Pontifical introduces an address to the ordinands between the presentation and the election. (b.) Admission to Office.—(The order of the several ceremonies is not certain; that of Cod. Maff., which is almost identical with that of the modern Pontif. Rom., will be followed here.) 1. The bishop, standing, addresses the people, "Let the common vote be followed by a common prayer . . .;" this address is said in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missale Franc., Pontif. Petav. Rotom. Rem. Ratold. S. Dunst. Noviom. Becc. to be "ad consummandum diaconum" (or "diaconatus officium"); it is more commonly placed, but without any rubrical directions, after the prayer of benediction; but the Cambrai Pontifical and the modern Roman Pontifical agree with the Cod. Maff.; the Mainz Pontifical places it after the first imposition of hands; the later English pontificals, except Pontif. Winton. omit it. 2. The preface follows, i. e. a short "bidding prayer" which is nearly the same in all ordinals, but which in Sacram. Leon. Gelas., Codd. Vat. et al., is broken up into a preface and a prayer. 3. Then follows the prayer of benediction: "Adesto quaesumus omnipotens Deus, honorum dator, ordinum distributor, officiorumque dispositor . . . super hos famulos tuos quaesumus, Domine, placatus intende; quos tuis sacris servituros in officium diaconi suppliciter dedicamus . . . emitte in eos, quaesumus, Domine, Spiritum Sanctum quo in opus ministerii fideliter exequendi munere septiformis tuae gratiae roborantur . . ." This prayer is found with slight variations in Sacram. Leon. Gelas. and all Codd. of Sacram. Gregor. including Codd. Othobon. Vindob. and in all the ordinals. 4. The bishop lays his hand upon the deacon's head. (a) The bishop does this alone, no mention being made of priests in Missale Francorum, Pontif. Corb. Rem. Ratold. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Radbod. Salisburg. Bisunt. (b) The bishop alone lays his hand on the deacon's head, but the other priests touch the bishop's hand, or touch the deacon's head near the bishop's hand, in Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 95, Pontif. Rotom. Catur. Becc. Noviom. i. ii.; cf. also Amalarius 2, 12, Durandus, Rational. 2, 9, 14. (γ) The bishop lays both hands on the deacon's head in Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Mogunt. (δ) The point of the service at which this is to be done is not specified in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Pontif. Rotom. Rem. Ratold. Catur. Salisburg. Bisunt. Becc. Radbod. Noviom. i. ii. (ε) It takes place at the utterance of the words "emitte in eos . . ." in the prayer of benediction, in Cod. Maff. (ζ) It takes place before the preface, and the bishop in laying on his hands says, "Spiritus Sanctus superveniet in te et virtus Altissimi sine peccato custodiat te in nomine Domine," in Cod. Mogunt. only; or he says "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum," in the later English ordinals ap. Maskell (but not the Winchester Pontifical) and some later French ordinals ap. Martene, ii. p. 21, no authority being earlier than the 13th century. (η) It takes place after the vesting in the stole and before the preface, in Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. 5. The bishop vests the deacon with a stole upon his left shoulder; this ceremony is, however, not mentioned, either expressly or by implication, in the majority of early ordinals, viz. in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Rem. Rodrad. Senon. Noviom. i. Radbod.; its place in the ritual is (α) sometimes at the beginning, Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst.; (β) sometimes after the benediction, Pontif. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. Noviom. ii. Mogunt. English ordinals ap. Mask.; (γ) sometimes not specified, Pontif. Corb. Ratold. Bisunt. The formulae with which it was accompanied vary: (α) "Receive a white stole from the hand of the Lord . . ." Codd. Maff., Pont. Mogunt. (as an alternative form); (β) "Receive the yoke of the Lord, for His yoke is easy and His burden light," Cod. Suession.; (γ) "By this sign we humbly impose on thee the office of a deacon, that thou mayest be a support of the divine table, as it were a pillar of its columns, and that thou mayest serve blamelessly as a herald of the Heavenly King," Pontif. Corb. Ratold. Bisunt. Winton.; (δ) "Receive the stole, fulfil thy ministry, for God is able to give thee an increase of grace," Pontif. Salisburg. Camerac. Noviom. ii. Mogunt.; in English ordinals ap. Maskell, "In the name of the Holy Trinity receive the stole of immortality, fulfil," &c.; (ε) a much longer form is given in Pontif. S. Dunst. Catur. Becc. and Winton. "In the name of the Holy Trinity and One God, receive the stole which the Lord has prepared for thy receiving through the service of our humility and through our hands, by which thou mayest know that the burden of the Lord God is laid on thy shoulders, and that thou art bound to humility and to the administration of the church, and by which thy brethren may learn that thou hast been ordained a minister of God . . .;" (ζ) no form is given in Pontif. Ecgb. 6. The bishop delivers a book of the Gospels to the deacon, with the words "Receive the power of reading the Gospel in the church of God, as well for the living as for the dead" (Cod. Maff., Pontif. Radbod. Suession. Becc. Catalani Ord. ii., later English ordinals ap. Mask.), or with the words "Receive this volume of the Gospels, and read and understand, and deliver to others, and do thou fulfil it in deed" (Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Becc.) This ceremony is not found in Sacram. Gelas. or in any of the early ordinals except that of Ecgbert. Martene, vol. ii. p. 21, says that it was for a long time peculiar to the English church. 7. The bishop vests the deacon in a dalmatic, saying, "The Lord clothe thee with a vestment of salvation, and wrap thee in a garment of gladness, through Jesus Christ our Lord," Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisb. Sarum. Bangor. This ceremony is not found in any early ordinal; the Besançon Pontifical limits its use to those who come to be ordained from monasteries; and Martene, vol. ii. p. 22, says that it was not used in the case of seculars until about the 12th century. The Bangor and Exeter Pontificals limit its use to the deacon who was about to read the Gospel. 8. The bishop kisses the new deacon, Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisburg. Bisunt. 9. The hands of the deacon are anointed with the holy oil and chrism, and with a benediction; this rite is only found in English or Norman ordinals, viz., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Becc. Rotom., but not in the later English ordinals, ed. Maskell. 10. The newly ordained deacon, or if there be more than one, either one appointed by the bishop (English ordinals), or the last ordained (Pontif. Mogunt.) reads the Gospel; this custom is not mentioned by any ordinals except those just specified, but its early existence is not only in accordance with the analogy of other ordination rituals, but is also indicated by its mention in Mabillon's Ordo ix.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. The Apostolical Constitutions (viii. c. 16) direct that in ordaining a deacon the bishop shall lay his hands upon him in the presence of the whole presbytery and the deacons, and shall pray that God will lift up the light of His countenance upon His servant who is ordained (προχειρίζμενον) to the diaconate, and grant that ministering acceptably in his office he may be deemed worthy of a higher degree. Another ritual is given in S. Dionys. Areop. de Eccl. Hierarch. 5, 2, p. 236. The later rituals are to be found in the Euchologium, ed. Goar, p. 249, ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 552; Codd. Bessar. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 68 sqq., ed. J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. pp. 111 sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Sacra. Ordin. c. 169, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. pp. 372 sqq.

2. The Coptic forms are found in Morin, p. 506; J. A. Asseman, ap. Mai, vol. v. pars ii. p. 212; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 7; the Jacobite in Morin, p. 479, Gregory Barhebr. ap. Mai, vol. x. pars ii. p. 48; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 82; the Maronite in Morin, p. 396; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 54; Renaudot ap. Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 128; the Nestorian in Morin, p. 445; J. S. Asseman, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 806; J. A. Asseman, vol. xiii. p. 12; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 229; Badger, vol. ii. p. 325.

8. PRESBYTER. I. Western Rites.—(Sacram. Leon. ed. Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. i. p. 687, ed. Ballerin, p. 113, and Sacram. Gregor. Codd. Vat. i. Othobon. ap. Muratori, vol. ii. p. 1064, contain prayers only, without a ritual; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 20 contains a short ritual and prayers, id. c. 95 a canon=Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 3; the full ritual is found in all other ordinals of the Gregorian type, e.g. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 36, Cod. Rem. ap. Morin, p. 290, and in the editions of Menard, p. 237, Benedict. p. 224=Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 224; other rituals are given in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. pp. 86, 90; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. pp. 88, 93.) i. The earliest ritual which has been preserved is that which, as mentioned above in the account of the ordination of a deacon, is given as a preliminary rubric in the Missale Francorum, Sacram. Gelas., and other early ordinals. The ordinands are presented to the bishop, who, after receiving the testimony of the presenter, declares the election in the form given below, "By the help of our Lord God," &c. A litany is then said; when it is finished all rise, and the persons elected go up to the bishop's chair; the bishop gives a blessing upon their office; they then go down and stand in the proper place of their order. The gospel is then read, and afterwards the newly-ordained presbyters give their offerings (sc. of bread and wine) into the hand of the bishop, and receive them back from him consecrated. (This last important rite is found in Pontif. Corb. Suession. Camerac., Cod. Maff., Catalani, Ord. ii.; see below, § 16.) ii. Mabillon's Ordo Romanus viii. gives the following directions: "The archdeacon holding him leads him to the steps of the altar, divests him of the dalmatic, and so vests him in a chasuble, and leads him again to the bishop. And there, saying over him another prayer, he consecrates him presbyter, giving a kiss to the bishop or to the other priests, and stands in the rank of presbyters, and Alleluia is said, or the tract and gospel." iii. The majority of ordinals combine in one service, as in the case of deacons, the declaration of election and the admission to office.

a. Declaration of Election: 1. Two deacons conduct the ordinand, vested as a deacon, to the presbyters; then two presbyters receive and conduct him to the bishop's chair (Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisb. Camerac.; but instead of presentation, the Mainz Pontificals require the ordinands to be summoned, "Let those who are to be ordained presbyters to the title of St. N. come forward;" the Besançon Pontifical adds the name of the priest who witnesses to and presents him).

2. A deacon (Cod. Maff.) or the archdeacon (Pontif. S. Elig. Ratold. S. Dunst. Suession. Salisburg. Noviom. Mogunt.) or the priest who presents (Cod. Bisunt.) addresses the bishop, "Our holy mother, the catholic church, demands that thou shouldst ordain this present deacon to the burden of the presbyterate." The bishop asks, "Dost thou know him to be worthy?" The presenter replies, "As far as human frailty allows, I both know and testify that he is worthy of the burden of this office" (Pontif. Mogunt. S. Dunst. S. Elig. Catalani, Ord. ii. iii.; Hittorp, Ord. ii.; cf. S. Hieron. Epist. 146 (85); but Cod. Maff. uses the plural, "Illis attestantibus").

3. The bishop then addresses the people, and asks their testimony. Sacram. Gelas., Pontif. Rodrad. Rotom. Senon. Ecgb. Caturic. simply say "data oratione;" but Pontif. Rem. Noviom. Vat. ap. Murat. add the form of address, which concludes by asking the people openly to give their testimony ("ideo electionem vestram debetis publica voce profiteri"). Apparently in the place of this address to the people, the Salzburg, Soissons, Cambrai, and Mainz pontificals have a public examination of the ordinand: "Dost thou wish to receive the degree of the presbyterate in the name of the Lord? Dost thou wish, as far as thou art able, and human frailty permits thee, to remain in that degree? Dost thou wish to be obedient to thy bishop to whose diocese thou art to be ordained, in all things lawful, according to the canonical statutes?" (Cod. Maff. is singular in having no mention of either the address or the examination.)

4. The bishop then makes the declaration of election: "By the help of our Lord God and our Saviour Jesus Christ we elect this person to the order of the presbyterate. If any one has anything against him, in God's behalf and for God's sake, let him come boldly forth and say it. But, nevertheless, let him be mindful of his condition." (The retention of this form "si quis" . . . after the request for direct testimony, is probably a relic of the earlier practice, which is found in Mabillon, Ordo ix., where the form is appended, not to the declaration of election, but to the announcement by the reader of the intention to elect four days previously to the actual admission.)

5. The bishop proceeds: "Let the common vote be followed by a common prayer" . . . whereupon a litany is said (so Cod. Maff.).

6. The bishop lays his hand (both hands, Pontif. Mogunt.) upon the head of the ordinand, and all the presbyters who are present place their hands near the hands of the bishop (so all Codd. except the Mainz Pontifical, which implies that they do it after the bishop). (a) Some ordinals direct that while this is being done the prayers following shall be said (Cod. Maff.). (b) The Mainz Pontifical directs that the bishop shall say, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and may the power of the Highest keep thee without sin." (c) The later English ordinals ap. Maskell direct that the bishop shall say nothing. (d) A Toulouse Pontifical of uncertain date, quoted by Morin, de Sac. Ordin. pars ii. p. 340 (cf. ib. pars iii. p. 135), says that in some churches the bishop said, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whose-soever sins ye remit," &c. This is added in the Exeter, Bangor, and Sarum pontificals as a separate rite immediately before the post-communion. It is found also in Catalani, Ordo ii., where it is placed after the delivery of the paten and chalice, and where the words are in the plural. It is found also in the same place, written by a later hand, in the margin of the Cod. Maff., where the words are first given in the singular, and then in the plural ("quo singulis facto ad ultimum dicat in generali, Accipite," &c.). But no mention of the rite is found in the earlier English ordinals, or in any ordinal earlier than the 12th century, or in any of the great liturgical writers of the middle age, Amalarius, Hrabanus of Mainz, Ivo of Chartres, or Hugo of St. Victor. Nor was there any canonical authority for its use until the council of Trent. 7. The prayers which follow are alike, with only verbal variations, in all ordinals (including the Leonine and Gelasian sacramentaries). 8. The bishop then says the preface (or "consummatio presbyteri"). "Let us make a common prayer, brethren, that these who are elected for the help and advantage of your salvation may receive the benediction of the presbyterate. . . ." The prayer of benediction follows, "Sanctificationum omnium Auctor eujus vera consecratio, cujus plena benedictio est: tu, Domine, super hos famulos tuos quos presbyterii honore dedicamus manum tuae benedictionis infunde..." (Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Ecgb. Rem. Noviom. S. Dunst. Catur. Rotom. Ratold. Winton. Mogunt.; the benediction is found without the preface in Cod. Maff. and in the Besançon, Sarum, and Exeter Pontificals.) Both forms are placed (1) as here, immediately after the prayer of consecration; in the earliest ordinals, i.e. Missale Franc., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Ecgb. Rem. Noviom.; (2) after the vesting in the chasuble and before the anointing of the hands, Pontif. Camerac. Noviom. ii. Mogunt.; and without the preface, Cod. Maff.; (3) after both the vesting and the anointing, Pontif. S. Dunst. Catur. Becc. Some ordinals omit the mention of either form, so Pontif. S. Elig. Radbod. Rodrad. Thuan. and Sacram. Leon.

9. The bishop then turns the stole, which has hitherto been worn over the left shoulder only, over the right shoulder, saying, "Receive the yoke of the Lord, for His yoke is easy, and His burden light" (Pontif. Maff. Salisb. Camerac. Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Mask.). in Pontif. Ecgb. this rite takes place apparently at the beginning of the ritual, or as in Pontif. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom. before the prayer of consecration. The formula in Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. is, "The Lord put the stole of justice round thy neck, and the Lord keep thy mind from all taint of sin." In Mabillon, Ord. ix., after the benediction, the archdeacon takes the stoles from the tomb of St. Peter, where they had been placed the day before, and vests the new presbyters in them. Many of the earliest ordinals omit the mention of this rite; so Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Codd. Vat. ap. Murat. S. Elig. Rodrad. Rem.; Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. iii. p. 208, thinks that it was a remnant of the primitive use of the British church, and that it was thence introduced into France and other countries.

10. The bishop then vests the presbyter in the chasuble; this rite is omitted in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Pontif. Rodrad. Radbod., but the mention of it in both Mabillon's ancient ordinals (Ord. viii, ix.) as well as in the ordinals mentioned below, leaves little doubt as to its antiquity. Some ordinals, as has been just mentioned, place it before the "consummatio presbyteri;" and its place in relation to the anointing of the hands also varies, most ordinals placing it in the order which is followed here; but Pontif. S. Dunst. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. place it before the anointing. The formulæ with which the rite was accompanied vary: a. Pontif. Bisunt. "The Lord clothe thee with the garment of innocence;" b. Pontif. Suess. Salisb. Mogunt. Sarum. "Receive the priestly vestment by which is betokened charity; God is able to give thee an increase of grace;" c. Cod. Maff., Pontif. Exon., combine the two preceding formulæ, Pontif. Camerac. gives them as alternatives; d. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. S. Elig. Rem. Rotom. S. Dunst. Noviom. Becc. Thuan. "The benediction of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, descend upon thee, and mayest thou be blessed in the order of the priesthood, and mayest thou offer pleasing victims to Almighty God for the sins and offences of the people." (This form of benediction is elsewhere placed at the end of the ritual, before the kiss of peace; so Cod. Maff., Pontif. Camerac. Suess.

11. The bishop then anoints the presbyter's hands with the chrism, or oil and chrism, or oil of the catechumens, with a prayer that "whatsoever they blessed might be blessed, whatsoever they sanctified might remain sanctified." (a.) This rite is found in almost all ordinals; but not in Sacram. Leon. or in Codd. Vat. Othob. of Sacram. Gregor. or in Pontif. Rodrad.: it is mentioned by two French liturgical writers of the 9th century, Amalarius of Metz, †837, de Eccl. Off. 2, 13, and Theodulphus of Orleans †821, Capit. ad Presb. i., Migne, P. L. vol. cv. p. 193; the earliest canonist who speaks of it is Burchard of Worms (†1025), Decret. xx. c. 55, Migne, P. L. vol. xli. p. 629, but the recognised body of canon law distinctly disallows it, quoting a response of pope Nicholas I. to the archbishop of Bourges in 864, who says that it is not a custom of the Roman church and that he has never heard of its being practised in the Christian church (Gratian, Decret. 23. c. 12, Migne, P. L. vol. clxxvii. p. 134, Ivo. Carnot. Decret. 6. 121); this must be held conclusive, at any rate as to its not being a general practice in the 9th century; but afterwards it no doubt became general, for Innocent III. insists upon it, and objects to the Greeks for their omission of it (Innocent III. Epist. lib. 7. 121; Migne, P. L. vol. ccv. 407). It is important to note that even the Pseudo-Isidorian authorities for the rite (Epist. Anacleti, c. 18, ap. Hinschius Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianæ, p. 75; Epist. Clement. iii. c. 58, ibid. p. 53, to which may be added the spurious Comment. in lib. I. Regum, ascribed to Gregory the Great, lib. 4. c. 5; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxix. 278) refer only to bishops; at the same time they clearly shew that the origin of the rite was the growing tendency to institute an analogy of ceremonies between the Old and the New Testament. (b.) Several ordinals direct that the hands shall be blessed before being anointed, and give a form of benediction for the purpose; Pontif. Ratold. S. Elig. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. (c.) The Mainz Pontifical directs that while the rite of anointing is going on the hymn "Veni Sancte Spiritus" shall be sung, and also, if the number of persons ordained require it, the hymn "Veni Creator;" in the Soissons Pontifical the hymn "Veni Creator" is apparently sung immediately after the anointing; and in the English ordinals ap. Maskell, except the Winchester Pontifical, immediately before it. There is no mention of either hymn in other ordinals. (d.) In addition to the anointing of the hands, a group of English and Norman pontificals direct the anointing of the head; so Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom. Becc., but not elsewhere.

12. The anointing is followed by the delivery of the "patenam cum oblati et calicem cum vino" (Pontif. Mogunt. has "calicem pro sacramento praeeparatum, superposita hostia") with the words "Receive power to offer sacrifice to God and to celebrate mass, as well for the living as for the dead;" so Cod. Maff., Pontif. Radbod. Salisb. Bisunt. Camerac. Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell, Catalani Ord. ii.; but there is no mention of the rite in the oldest ordinals e.g. in Missale Franc., Pontif. Rem. Ecgb., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; nor in Isidore or Amalarius; nor is it implied in 4 Conc. Tol. c. 27. It probably arose from the practice of which a record is preserved in the directions which are given in Mabillon's Ordo ix. for the ordination of a parish priest at Rome. After the conclusion of the whole service ("expletis omnibus, missa rite completa"), the pope is to give to the new presbyter the priestly vestments, and the instruments of the mass, gold or silver, wine, corn, and oil, with which a procession is made to his parish, both the pope and the people accompanying him.

13. One ordinal, Cod. Maff., directs that if the presbyter is a "presbyter cardinalis," i.e. a parish priest, the pope shall give him a ring, saying, "To the honour of our Lord Jesus Christ and the Apostles Peter and Paul, we commit to you the church N., with its clergy and people;" this is probably the earliest form of institution.

14. The benediction follows in Codd. Maff. &c.; see above, § 10; the Sarum, Exeter, and Bangor Pontificals place it at the end of the whole office, after the communion; the Winchester Pontifical places it here.

15. The newly-ordained presbyter then gives the kiss of peace to the bishop, and to all the clergy who are present, Codd. Maff. Sussion. Camerac.; the Mainz Pontif. places this rite before the benediction, and directs that the bishop shall go round to each of the newly-ordained presbyters, saying, "Pax tibi, frater, ora pro me;" the English ordinals, except Pontif. Winton., also place it immediately before the benediction, but transfer both rites to the post-communion office.

16. The communion office then proceeds: a deacon reads the Gospel: the newly-ordained presbyters make their offerings to the bishop, and receive them back from him consecrated: so Pontif. Sussion. Camerac., Cod. Maff. ap. Muratori, vol. iii. p. 56, directs this generally in the case of both presbyter and deacon, but ibid. p. 68, where the ritual is of cardinal presbyters, in the later Roman sense, it directs specially that they shall offer two lighted tapers, two loaves, and two bottles (amphorae) of wine, and omits the clause which follows in the earlier rubric, "et ab eo consecratas accipiant." Mabillon's Ordo ix. directs that from these oblations the "novitii presbyteri" shall communicate for eight ensuing days. The rite is an important relic of the primitive communion, in which the bread and wine were offered to the bishop, then blessed by him, and then distributed. The rite itself fell into disuse, but one of its effects survived in the rule which is mentioned in the Soissons Pontifical, and which prevailed in some dioceses, that a presbyter should keep the bread which was consecrated at the time of his ordination for forty days, taking a portion of it every day. The rite probably survived also in the rubric of the later ordinals, that the newly consecrated presbyters should receive the host from the hands of the consecrating bishop.

17. A still more important relic of the primitive communion survived, and possibly survives still, in the theory that in this celebration the newly-ordained presbyters were "concelebrant" with the bishop. The only other instance of the survival of the same rite is that which is mentioned by Innocent III., de Sacramentis, c. 25, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxvii. 873, of the cardinal presbyters at Rome being celebrant with the pope; and it is to be noted that the significance of the rite was appreciated by mediaeval canonists, e.g., Durandus in iv. Sent. dist. 13, qu. 3, who, in spite of the statement of Innocent III., denied its existence. The elements of the historical consideration of the question will be found in Morin de Sacr. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. 8, p. 158; Catalani in Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 12, § 17.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. i. The rite which is described in the Apostolical Constitutions is simply this: "In ordaining a presbyter, O bishop, put thy hand upon his head, the presbytery and the deacons standing by thee, and in praying say, . . ." (then follows a prayer that he who "by the vote and election of all the clergy has been advanced to the presbyterate" may be filled with the spirit of grace and counsel; with this prayer the ritual ends). ii. Dionysius Areopagita says that the ordinand "bends both knees before the holy altar, and has the hand of the hierarch upon his head, and in this way is consecrated by the hierarch with the invocations which make him a priest (ταῖς ἱερωτικαῖς ἐπικλήσεσι ἀγιάζεται)." Then, as in the case of deacons, follows the sign of the cross, the sacred proclamation of election (ἀνάβησις), and the consummating salutation. iii. The later rituals will be found in the Euchologium, ed. Goar, p. 292; ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 556; Codd. Bessar. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 66, sqq.; ed. J. A. Asseman. vol. xi. p. 108, sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Sacr. Ordin. c. 179, ed. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. 386).

IV. Time and place of Ordination.

I. TIME OF ORDINATION.—(1) Season of Ordination: There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any fixed rule as to the season of the year at which appointments to ecclesiastical office might take place, and there is strong reason to believe that entrance upon office followed immediately upon appointment. The non-existence of any such rule is rendered almost certain (a) by the fact that when in the Western church in later times a rule was laid down it became necessary to invent an early authority (the decretal of Gelasius) in order to support it; (b) by the fact that in the Greek church, even to the present day, ordinations may take place at any time (except that in Lent they are limited to Saturdays and Sundays).

Several limitations of the season of ordination gradually arose in the Western church, and the rule which ultimately became established by the canon law was neither the earliest nor the only one.

1. Zeno of Verona († 380) speaks of Easter (i.e. probably Easter Day and Easter Eve) as being a special time for the promotion of clerks (ministri), and the reconciliation of penitents (S. Zenon. Veron. lib. 2, tract 50, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xi. p. 506).

2. Leo the Great (Epist. ix. (xi.) ad Diosc. Alexand. vol. i. p. 628) has a passage which has given rise to some controversy. He says that ordinations to the priesthood or the diaconate ought not to take place on any chance day, but "post diem sabbati ejus noctis quae in prima sabbatis lucescit:" (a) According to one view, these words are to be understood as allowing ordinations only at Easter (i.e. on Easter Eve and Easter Day). In support of this view is the fact, that Leo only allowed baptisms to be celebrated at Easter and Pentecost (Epist. xvi. c. 3, i. p. 719). (b) According to another view, the words allow ordinations on Saturday night, or on the morning of any Lord's Day. This view is rendered almost certain by another passage, in which Leo, writing to Anastasius of Thessalonica, objects to the practice of limiting the restriction to the Lord's Day to the ordination of bishops, and of ordaining presbyters and deacons on any day (Epist. vi. (iv.) i. p. 610). A further corroboration of this view is the complaint which, in writing to the emperor Marcian, he makes against Anatolius; it is, that the latter had ordained a presbyter on a Friday; but nothing whatever is said about the limitation of ordinations to a particular season. (Epist. iii. ad Marcian. Imp. i. p. 1185. On the whole question see the notes of Quesnel, and the Ballerini to the passage of Leo first quoted above; and also Quesnel, Dissert. vi. de jejuniis sabbati, reprinted by the Ballerini in their edition of Leo, vol. ii. p. 1069, and by Migne, P. L. vol. lv. p. 627.)

3. The ordinary practice of the bishops of Rome, which however does not appear to have been erected into a rule, and which probably grew up in the period intervening between Leo the Great and the establishment of the four seasons, was to hold ordinations in December (see Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Liber Pontificalis, passim, but especially Bianchini's ed. vol. iii. § 72; Amalarius de Div. Off. 2, 1; but Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. ciii, Catalani, Com. in Pontif. Rom. pars i. tit. ii. § 12, mention various exceptions to the practice).

4. Out of the rule or usage that both ordainers and ordained must fast at the time of ordination, arose the usage which appears to have become a rule in the course of the 8th century, that ordinations must take place at the Ember seasons, i.e. at the fasts in the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months. The rule is given in the majority of ordinals in the form "mensis primi, quarti, septimi, decimi, sabbatum die in xii. lectionibus;" so Sacram. Gelas., Pontif. Rem. S. Dunst. Rodrad. Vat. ap. Murat. Elsewhere the particular weeks are specified, as being the first week of the first month, the second of the fourth, the third of the seventh, the fourth of the tenth; so Pontif. Egb., Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. ii. 24; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 34, quoted as an authority by Gratian, Dist. 76, c. 2; Mabillon's Ordo ix. agrees with the preceding, except that it specifies the Saturday before Christmas; so Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. 2, 1. But although it became customary to speak of four seasons only, it is clear that ordinations in Lent were not limited to a single Saturday. In probably the oldest existing MS. which contains the rule (Fragm. Cod. Vat. ap. Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 17) any time "a quinquagesima incipiente usque quinto decimo die ante pascha," appears to be allowed; and the Pseudo-Isidorian decretal, upon which subsequent usage made the rule to rest, specifies the Saturdays at the beginning and in the middle of Lent (S. Gelas. i. Epist. ix. ad Episc. per Lucan. c. 13 = Decret. General. ap. Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isid. p. 652; cf. Gratian, Dist. 75, 7; D. Ivon. Carnot, Decret. 6, 74). It is, however, clear, that even after the general reception of this decretal there was some variety of usage; and the rule which ultimately prevailed, and which is recognised in the modern Roman Pontifical, appears to combine the rule of the four seasons with the earlier rule of holding ordinations at Easter.

The earliest certain instance of the observance of the four seasons as times of ordination, is in Paul the Deacon's account of Chrodegang of Metz (circ. 766) as having ordained presbyters, "as is the custom of the Roman church, on the Saturdays at the four seasons" (Paul. Diacon. de Ordine Episc. Metens. ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xcv. p. 710); but they had been previously recognised by the Roman Council of 743, c. 11, under pope Zachary; and not long afterwards the Frankish capitularies gave them a civil sanction (Statt. Rhispac. et Frising. A.D. 799, c. 7, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 78).

It may be convenient to add, that the modern Roman rule allows (a) the tonsure to be conferred at any time, (b) minor orders on any Sunday or double festival, (c) major orders at the times stated in the above-mentioned decretal of Alexander III.

(2) Day of Ordination.—It may be gathered from what has been said above, that even before ordination came to be restricted to certain seasons of the year they were limited in the Western church to a certain day of the week. It is antecedently probable that the more important appointments and admissions to church offices would take place on Sundays, and there is therefore reason to suppose that the Greek practice, to which Leo the Great (see above) bears witness, of ordaining bishops on Sundays, is primitive. It is difficult to trace the origin of a similar limitation in the case of presbyters and deacons. But it is in entire harmony with the general view of the nature of ordination which has been given above, that the evening of Saturday rather than Sunday should have been the customary time. The performance of the sacred functions to which they were called immediately succeeded their appointment and recognition. If the functions themselves were performed early on Sunday morning, the appointment and recognition of the officers would naturally take place on Saturday evening. Hence the Western rule, which is embodied in the Gelasian expression "die Sabbati circa vesperam."

(3) Place of Ordinations in Divine Service.—Inasmuch as admissions to ecclesiastical office in primitive times consisted in a public recognition of the officer who had been elected or appointed, followed by a performance of the duties of his office, it was natural that such admissions should take place under circumstances which admitted of such performance.

In the Western church it seems to have been customary that admissions to major orders should take place during divine service; but not even the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals give any authority for the custom, and according to Hallier, de Sac. Elect. p. 969, later canonists sometimes inserted the words "intra missam" into a letter of the Pseudo-Anacletus in order to obtain the appearance of such authority. The custom is, however, assumed by the ordinals, all of which (but not the Missal. Franc.) direct that the declaration of election to major orders shall be made immediately after the introit ("postquam Antiphonam ad Introitum dixerint"); so Sacram. Gelas. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Rem. Ratold. S. Dunst. S. Elig. Senon. Noviom. Caturic.

Salisb. Rotom. The place of the ceremonies of admission is less precisely defined: (1) The oldest rubric (see above, Ordination of Deacons, i.) appears to make the benediction follow immediately upon the litany which follows the declaration of election. (2) Mabillon's Ordo, viii. and almost all ordinals place the ceremonies of ordination between the epistle and gospel, before the Alleluia or Tract. (3) The Sarum Pontifical expressly places the ordination of subdeacons before the epistle, which the new subdeacon reads. (4) The Pontif. Ratold. Casanat. are apparently alone in placing all ordinations before the epistle. The majority of ordinals give no directions as to the time of admission to minor orders. The Pontif. S. Elig. places them "post communionem," the Sarum Pontifical during the lessons, before the mass proper begins.

In the Greek church there are early indications that the celebration of the Eucharist immediately followed admission to major orders, c. g. Clement. Recogn. 6, 15; Dionys. Areop. de Eccl. Hier. 6, 3, 5; although even so late as the beginning of the 9th century it is not spoken of as though it were a universal rule; c. g. by S. Theodor. Stud. Epist. lib. 2, 101. But all MSS. of the ordinals agree in making ordinations to the lectorate and subdiaconate take place outside the liturgy, and in making ordinations to major orders take place at a definite point in the liturgy. The ordination of deacons is placed after the oblation and the opening of the doors; that of presbyters after the cherubic hymn.

In the other Eastern churches there is less uniformity of usage. The Nestorian Ordinal expressly provides for the case of ordinations (except those of bishops) which are not accompanied by a celebration of the Liturgy. The Coptic ordinal places all ordinations, except to the episcopate, immediately before the preface of the anaphora. The Jacobite and Maronite ordinals place ordinations after the consecration of the elements. (For a more precise account see Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. i. p. 144.)

II. PLACE OF ORDINATION.—There does not appear to have been in the earliest times any rule as to the place in which ordination, in the sense of appointment, might be made. From the nature of the case, when appointments were made by popular suffrage, they were made in a popular assembly; hence Origen (Hom. in Levit. 6, c. 3, vol. ii. p. 216) argues from the public appointments of priests by Moses. But when they were made by the bishop or the Ordo, they were necessarily, in some cases, made under circumstances which did not admit of the gathering of an assembly in a definite place. As, for example, when, with the tacit consent of the people and the other members of the Ordo, Cyprian, and those who were with him, appointed Aurelius and Celerinus (S. Cypr. Epist. 33, 34, vol. ii. p. 320, 324). The stress which Cyprian elsewhere lays on the necessity of ordinations being made in public (id. Epist. 68, 3, vol. i. p. 1026 = Synodal letter of the council of Carthage to the clergy and people in Spain), shews that the freedom which existed as to the place of appointment was in danger of being abused, but it shews also that such freedom existed. The only conciliar regulation on the subject, which is found in the first five centuries, is that of the Conc. Laod. c. 5, which enacts that χειροτονία (i.e. appointments, according to both Balsamon and Zonaras) should not take place in the presence of ἀκροώμενοι (prob. = catechumens, but according to Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. ii. p. 301 = the class of penitents so named. See vol. i. p. 151, AUDIENTES). The reason for this rule was, that the faults of persons were freely canvassed on such occasions; and that it was inexpedient that any, except full members of the church, should take part in the election. When special buildings came to be set apart for assembly and worship, ordination naturally took place in them; and Gregory Nazianzen is indignant because the ordination of Maximus the Cynic, which was begun in a church, was finished in a private house (S. Greg. Nazianz. Poem. de vit. sua v. 909; cf. Greg. Presb. Vit. S. Greg. Nazianz. Migne, P. G. vol. xxxv. p. 282). But the point was not the sacredness of a church, but its publicity; even Theophilus of Alexandria does not do more than insist that ordinations shall not be made in secret (λαθραίως), and that when the church is at peace they shall consequently be made in church (S. Theophil. Alex. can. 7, ap. Pitra, i. 648).

The earliest regulation as to ordinations in the sense of admission to office, and the earliest positive enactment as to ordinations in any sense, is that of the civil law. Justinian (Novell. 6, c. i. 9, and c. 4, A.D. 535) enacts that admissions to ecclesiastical office must take place in the presence of all the people as a guarantee of the purity of the election. The absence of an earlier regulation, whether ecclesiastical or civil, is shewn by the fact that the later canonists were compelled to invent one; i.e. they inserted the word manifeste in Conc. Chalch. c. 6 (Gratian, Decret. 1, Dist. 70; D. Ivon. Carnot. Panorm. 3, 27). Of the very doubtful Syrian council, which is sometimes assigned to A.D. 405, and of which the canons are printed by Mansi, vol. vii. 1181, no account need be taken. When ordinations came to take place in a church, it was natural that they should, as a rule, take place in the cathedral church. At the same time there has never been any rule limiting them to the cathedral church.

In later times, when the ceremonies of admission to holy orders were interwoven with the liturgy, it was enacted that they should take place, not merely in a church, but before the altar. There is a probability that this had come to be the rule in the early part of the 7th century, inasmuch as 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, in providing for the readmission to office of a clerk who had been unjustly deposed, provides that the ceremonial of his original ordination shall be repeated, and this is to take place "coram altario." But the first direct enactment to this effect is that of the ordinals, which are probably at least a century later.

The rule of the modern Roman Pontifical is, that the tonsure and minor orders may be conferred in any place whatever ("quocunque loco," "ubicumque," Pontif. Rom. pars 1, tit. 2, §§ 13, 14); but the ritual assumes throughout that the place will be a church. Ordinations to holy orders must take place either in the cathedral, or, if any other place in the diocese, in the "ecclesia dignior" of the place (ib. § 22).

V. Minister of Ordination.

In the earliest period of church history when, as has been shewn above, the important element in ordination was not the act of admission to office but the act of appointment to it, the question as to who could ordain is practically identical with the question which has been already answered, as to who could take part in an appointment. The presumption is that, at least in the three primitive offices of presbyter, deacon, and reader, the whole church acted together. There was always a nomination, an election, an approval, and a declaration of election. The two latter of these functions, in the church as in the empire, devolved on the presiding officer, who, in the church, as also in the empire, frequently added to them the further function of nomination or "commendatio." But when, in course of time, a church ceased to be a complete, self-contained and organic unity, and had outlying churches dependent upon it, or was itself merged in a larger organization, and when greater importance came to be attached to the recognition by a church of its newly-appointed officer, and to the prayer for blessing upon his office, there grew up an abundant crop of questions, partly as to the limits of the rights of dependent churches to make appointments without reference to the mother church, and partly as to the limits of the rights of independent churches to act without reference to the general confederation of churches, and partly as to the unity or the plurality of the channels through which divine grace flowed, some of which questions are still unsolved, and many of which have, at various times, been the cause not only of theological controversy but of political disturbance. It is, of course, impossible here to do more than indicate the chief facts which must be taken into consideration in any general view of the subject; and, for the sake of clearness, the word ordainer will be used in its narrower sense of one who can admit to ecclesiastical office, whether the person admitted be appointed by himself or by others.

1. Ordainers of Presbyters.—i. The earliest evidence is presumably that of 1 Tim. iv. 14, where the giving of the "gift" (χάρισμα) to Timothy, is said to have been accompanied with (μετά) the "laying on of hands of the presbytery." But the evidence is ambiguous, inasmuch as it is uncertain (1) what was the precise office which Timothy filled; (2) whether the presbytery acted alone, or whether the presence of an apostle or other president is assumed, though it is not mentioned. ii. Early patristic evidence is for the most part ambiguous, on account of the ambiguity of the terms employed; e.g. in Firmilian's letter to Cyprian (S. Cyprian. Epist. 75, 7, vol. i. p. 1161), "maiores natu qui et baptizandi et manum imponendi et ordinandi possident potestatem," where manum imponendi may possibly refer only to confirmation after baptism, and ordinandi only to election. iii. That the bishop and presbyters acted together is rendered probable, partly by the general character of the relations between bishops and presbyters [PRIEST], and partly by the fact that the Western church, which in many similar respects has been more conservative of ancient usages than the Eastern, has to this day retained the co-operation of bishops and presbyters in the ceremony of imposition of hands (see above: Ordination of Presbyters). iv. That the bishop could in certain cases act alone, is a probable but not a proved hypothesis. Its probability chiefly arises from the fact that in the Apostolical Constitutions, and in all eastern ordinals, though the clergy, and especially the archdeacon, as the representative of the clergy, have a place in the ritual, the bishop alone imposes his hands. v. Whether presbyters could act alone is a keenly disputed, but as yet unsolved question: (a) The case of Ischyra, who was ordained presbyter by the presbyter Colluthus of Alexandria, and whose ordination was subsequently disallowed, would hardly have been possible if the point had previously been ruled in the negative by competent authority. (For the detail of the controversy, see the letter of the Mareotic clergy to the synod of Tyre, ap. S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 75, vol. i. p. 152): (b) The early canon (Conc. Ancyra. c. 14) which forbids chorepiscopi to ordain (χειροτονεῖν) presbyters or deacons, also forbids city presbyters to do so, except by commission from the bishop; assuming that ordination is here used in its later sense, the canon is a clear admission that presbyters are disqualified from ordaining presbyters, not by any defect inherent in their office, but on the ground which is assigned by the Apostolical Constitutions, of church order (αὐτὴ γὰρ ἐστὶ τὰς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς καὶ ἁρμονίας. C. A. 3, 11). It is interesting to compare with this the statement of the great antiquarian and canonist of the West in the seventh century: "sola propter auctoritatem summo sacerdoti ordinatio et consecratio reservata est, ne a multis ecclesiae disciplina vindicata concordiam solveret, scandala generaret" (Isidor. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. 2, 7): (c) In later times presbyters were no doubt disqualified, and so far did the notion of their disqualification go, that 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 5, disallows the ordination of certain presbyters upon whom a bishop had laid his hands, but to whom, at the same time, a presbyter and not the bishop had given the benediction. In this respect even the dispensing power of the pope was regarded as being limited: he could commission a presbyter to confer minor but not major orders, "qui habent immediatam relationem ad corpus Christi" (St. Thom. Aquin. in IV. Sent. dist. 25, qu. 1, art. 1 = Summa Theol. suppl. in p. iii. qu. 38, art. 1). vi. The question of the right of chorepiscopi to ordain presbyters is also one of great difficulty: (a) In the fourth century chorepiscopi are found only in the East, and were probably no more than the parish priests of rural parishes; they were the first attempt at ecclesiastical organization in the direction which afterwards resulted in the parochial system; their rights in respect of ordination, which may, however, in this case mean only appointment, are strictly defined by Conc. Ancyra. A.D. 314, c. 8, 1 Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 10, which give them an original right of ordaining readers, subdeacons, and exorcists, but only a deputed right of ordaining presbyters and deacons. (b) The origin and status of the French chorepiscopi of the 8th and 9th centuries is much more obscure; and the question of their right to ordain was probably the chief cause of the forgery of the Pseudo Isidorian decretals. The genuine writings of Isidore (de Eccl. Off. lib. 2, 6) repeat the rule of the council of Ancyra, and allow chorepiscopi to ordain presbyters with the consent of the city bishop on whom they depend. But in the 9th century there appears to have been on the one hand a claim on the part of certain chorepiscopi to dispense with the necessity of such consent, and on the other hand a contention that not even with such consent could they ordain either presbyters or deacons. The controversy is one of great interest, because it involves the whole question of the validity of non-episcopal ordination; but the points involved are too intricate, and the literature too extensive, to be more than mentioned here. (The elements of the controversy will be found in the spurious letters of Damasus, de vana corepiscoporum superestione vitanda, ap. Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isidor. p. 509, of Leo the Great, ibid. p. 628 (printed also among St. Leo's works as Epist. 88, ad Germanias et Gallias Episc., on which see Quessel's dissertation, which is reprinted by both the Ballerini and Migne), and of John III. ibid. p. 715; in the letter of Leo III. in answer to Charles the Great's mission of Arno of Salzburg, ap. Caroli Magn. Capit. tit. iv. ed. Mansi, xiii. p. 1059; in the treatise of Hrabanus Maurus, Opusc. ii. ed. Migne, P. L. vol. cx. p. 1195, Labbe, Concil. Append. ad vol. viii.; in the letter of Nicholas I. to the archbishop of Bourges (S. Nicol. Epist. append. i. ep. 19, 1, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. 390, Migne, vol. cxix. p. 884); and in a number of synodical decrees or capitularies, the most important of which is that of the council of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 44 (Mansi, vol. xiv. p. 829). The controversy has been reviewed by most writers on the clerical office, e.g. by Morin, de Sac. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. 4, and by Natalis Alexander, Append. ad diss. de Episcop. super Presb. Eminentia. The best account of its history is in Weizsäcker, Der Kampf gegen den Chorepiscopat des fränkischen Reichs, Tübingen, 1859. The ultimate result of the controversy was, that in the Western church chorepiscopi ceased to exist except in name, and that the city bishops finally established their claim to be the sole channel through which the spiritual status of presbyters could be conferred.

2. Ordniners of Deacons.—What has been said above as to the competency of others than bishops to ordain presbyters, applies also, for the most part, to the case of deacons. The special closeness of the connexion between the episcopate and the diaconate gave an especially strong claim to the former to admit the latter to office. The case of Felicissimus, who was made ("constituit") deacon by Novatus (S. Cyprian, Epist. 49, vol. i. p. 728), shows that the appointment, which, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, may be held to include the admission, of a deacon by a presbyter, though viewed with great disfavour, was not regarded as invalid; but the whole tendency of ecclesiastical discipline was opposed to such ordinations, and mediaeval canonists held that not even a papal dispensation could authorise them.

3. Ordniners of Minor Orders.—i. The right of city or diocesan bishops to admit to minor orders is undisputed. ii. That chorepiscopi could admit as well as appoint to minor orders, is a probable inference from Conc. Ancy. c. 14, and Conc. Antioch. c. 10. It was allowed in the later controversies to which reference has been made above. iii. That presbyters can admit to minor orders of their own mere motion is uniformly denied; but that they can do so by commission is as uniformly asserted; e. g. by Gelasius, Epist. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 8 = Decret. General. ap. Hinschius, p. 651; see S. Thom. Aquin. Summa, suppl. in p. iii. qu. 38, art. 1, and Hallier, de Sac. Elect. et Ordin. p. 568. iv. Abbots, provided (a) that they are presbyters; (b) that they have received episcopal benediction as abbats, can ordain readers in their own abbey according to 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 14—a regulation which was adopted in Western canon law. (Gratian, Decret. p. i. dist. 69, c. 1; Ivo, Decret. p. 5, c. 376, 1; see also Innocent III. Epist. ann. xiii. 127, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxvi. 314.)

4. Ordainers of Clerks.—The Apostolical Constitutions, dealing probably with the period in which each church was complete in itself, do not allow presbyters to ordain even clerks (C. A. 3, 20). But in the West, when the parochial system established itself, and the rectors of rural parishes came to have a sphere of work and authority which was in many respects independent of the bishop, presbyters stood in a very different relation to the lower orders of clergy. In the 7th century they were not only allowed to admit clerks, but encouraged to do so (Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 18); and almost all the ordinals of the Gregorian type agree with Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 10 in enacting that a singer may enter upon his office “absque scientia episcopi, sola jussione presbyteri.”

VI. Re-ordination.

It is probable that in the earliest period each church defined for itself, in individual cases, the conditions upon which a person who had forfeited his office should be restored to it, or upon which the officer of another church should have his status recognised. It is also probable that, although the honorary rank which was frequently given sometimes became substantive, the state of things which is forbidden by Can. Apost. c. 68, once actually existed, and that an officer of one church who sought office in another had to undergo a second election and a second admission to office. When the age of councils began, the rules which were laid down, either for a group of churches or for the catholic church throughout the world, ordinarily specified the penalty which was incurred by a violation of them. The chief of these penalties were, a declaration of invalidity (ἄκυρος ἔστω ἡ χειροτονία), and a requirement to cease from office (πεπαύσθω ὁ τοιοῦτος τοῦ κλήρου, καθαιρεῖσθω). The offences to which they were affixed were chiefly, (a) violation of rules of ecclesiastical organisation, by having been ordained out of the proper church, or by other than the proper bishop; (b) simoniacal ordination; (c) ordination while in a state of lapse or heresy. [For a detailed account of the several offences, see ORDERS, HOLY: Qualifications for: Discipline of.] A person who was so deposed, or whose ordination was so declared to be null, could not become a church officer again without again going through the processes which he had gone through incompletely in the first instance: for example, Conc. Nicaen. c. 8 enacts that returning Cathari shall receive imposition of hands; id. c. 19 enacts that returning Paulianists must be both re-baptized and re-elected (ἀναβαπτισθέντες χειροτονησάσθαι). This continued to be the practice of the church. For example, when some of the Arian clergy wished to return to the catholic faith, it was enacted that they might be admitted to office by the bishop “cum impositae manus benedictione” (1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 10; Conc. Caesaraug. A.D. 592, c. 1): so in the following century, of those who were ordained “a Scottorum vel Britonum episcopis,” who held schismatical views on the questions of tonsure and Easter (Poenit. Theodor. ii. 9, 1, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii.): and so also in the following century, of those who were ordained by “episcopi ambulantes” (Pippin, Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, § 14, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 23); and for those who had been unjustly degraded 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, prescribes the ritual of reordination.

But early in the history of the church, there had resulted from the Donatist controversy a belief in the minds of many theologians that the grace which was conferred at ordination, like that which was conferred at baptism, was inalienable; and that, in spite of lapse, the one as well as the other remained till death, and might, moreover, be communicated to others. This belief is expressed with some emphasis by St. Augustine: e.g. de Baptismo c. Donat. i. 1, vol. ix. p. 109; contra Epist. Parmen. ii. 28, vol. ix. p. 70, and is either stated or implied in Cod. Eccles. Afric. i. 27 (on which see Schelstrat ap. Van Espen, in loc.); id. c. 48; 5 Conc. Carth. c. 11; and it was again strongly asserted by Gregory the Great, Epist. ii. 46 ad Joann. Ravenn.; see also S. Leo Magn. Epist. 18 (14) ad Januar. p. 731. An isolated but important factor in the discussion is the existence of a Galatian inscription of A.D. 461, Corpus Inscr. Graec. No. 9259, which gives a record of one who was twice presbyter (δὲς γενόμενος πρεσβύτερος).

VII. Literature.

The literature of ordination is extensive, but the following will be found to be the most important references: 1. The early authorities and ordinals, for which see ORDINAL. 2. The early mediaeval antiquarians, Isidore of Seville (de Ecclesiasticis Officiis), Albinus Flaccus (Alcuin) (de Divinis Officiis), Amalarius (de Ecclesiasticis Officiis), Hrabanus Maurus (de Institutione Clericorum) (which four treatises, with others, will be found printed together in Hittorp. de Divinis Catholicas Ecclesiae Officiis, Cologne, 1568). 3. The French liturgical writers of the 17th century: Hallier (de Sacris Electionibus et Ordinationibus), Paris, 1636; Morin (de Sacris Ecclesiae Ordinationibus), Paris, 1655; Thomassin (Ancienne et Nouvelle Discipline de l'Eglise), ed. i. Paris, 1677; Martene (de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus), ed. i. Rouen, 1700 (quoted above from the Bassano edition of 1788), to which may be added Catalan's notes to his edition of the Pontificale Romanum, Rome, 1751 (reprinted at Paris in 1851).

ORDO. A directory for the due performance of any sacred rite. An ordo might (1) contain directions only, or (2) it might give the prayers also. [LITURGICAL BOOKS, p. 1008.]

For several centuries the prayers in the sacramentaries were not accompanied by sufficient directions for their proper use. The rubrics in the liturgies of St. James and St. Mark are very few and brief compared with those of the present Greek office. The same difference is observable when we compare the Gelasian Sacramentary and the earlier copies of the Gregorian with the later copies of the latter; and so again when we compare the old Gallican missals, disused from the 8th century, with the Hispano-Gothic, which was in use, and undergoing changes, down to the end of the eleventh. This paucity of directions would cause great inconvenience, especially when ceremonies were multiplied to the degree of which St. Augustine complains (Ep. 55, ad Januar. 19, § 35), and a supplementary book of instructions in ceremonial would be found equally necessary with that from which the prayers were learnt. In the West this want was met by the compilation of a book to which, before long, the conventional name of Ordo attached itself. In Gaul, in the 8th century, each priest was required to describe his own practice in writing, and to present this "libellus ordinis" to the bishop in Lent for his approbation, "rationem et ordinem ministerii sui, sive de baptismo, sive de fide catholica, sive de precibus et ordine missarum" (Capit. Karlomanii, A.D. 742, in Baluz. Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 824). In the same age, about 730, as it is supposed, appeared the "libellus ordinis Romani," or "Ordo Romanus," a directory for the use of the bishops of Rome and its suburbicarian dioceses (Ord. Rom. i. § 28; Mus. Ital. ii. 17) in the first instance, but which became, in time, so far as it could, a guide to all the priests who used the Roman offices. Mabillon has printed three libelli de Missa Pontificali (Ord. i. ii. iii. u. s. 1-60), which may be called three editions, differing little in age, of the same directory; two others, de Missa Episcopali (v. vi. 64-76), which, from the celebrant being called episcopus as frequently as pontifex and from other indications, appear to be intended for the use of any bishop; one "Ordo Scrutini ad electos, qualiter debeat celebrari" (vii. 77-84); and two concerning the ordination of the clergy (viii. ix. 85-94) [ORDINAL]; all of which were, in the judgment of the editor, "written before the 9th or 10th century" (Comment. Præv. ix.). One of the libelli de Missa Episcopali above-mentioned, speaks of the strictly Roman book from which it was derived as Romanus Ordo (O. vi. 8, p. 73); and under this name a directory authorised by Rome was adopted in Gaul towards the end of the 8th century: "Unusquisque presbyter missam ordine Romano cum sandaliis celebret" (Capitularia Reg. Franc. v. 371). Penitents were to be reconciled, "sicut in sacramentario, et in Ordine Romano, continetur" (ibid. vii. 202, and Canones Isaaci Ling. i. 35). Amalarius of Metz, about 820, wrote a commentary on parts of Ordo ii. (Mus. Ital. ii. 42-51) under the title of "Eglogæ in Ordinem Romanum," first printed by Baluze (Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1352); then by Mabillon (u. s. p. 549), in the body of which he also names the libellus absolutely "Romanus Ordo." He also frequently refers to this, and to the apparently earlier form of it, Ordo i. (u. s. 3-40) in his work De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, There it is "Libellus Romanus" (i. 17; iii. 27), "Libellus Romani Ordinis" (i. 30), or "Libellus qui continet Romanum Ordinem" (i. 21). In his treatise, De Antiphonario, he again calls it simply "Romanus Ordo" (c. 52). There also he recognizes the existence of more than one such directory: "Scripta quæ continent per diversos libellos Ordinem Romanum" (ibid.).

That the Ordo Romanus was later than the sacramentary, and ancillary to it, is evident from a reference to the latter in Ordo i. On Wednesday in holy week the bishop "dicit orationes solemnes, sicut in sacramentorum (libro) continetur" (c. 28, p. 19). But at length many of the directions of the Ordo were incorporated with the sacramentary, and thus became "rubrics." Compare, for example, the rubrics peculiar to Codex Eligianus, from which Ménard prints (Opp. S. Greg. tom. iii. 62, 64, Wednesday in holy week; 65, Maundy Thursday, &c.) with Ord. Rom. i. § 28, 30, &c. The earliest Ordo was at least re-written after the time of Charlemagne, whom it thus mentions: "Sabbato tempore Adriani institutum est, ut flecteretur pro Carolo rege" (24, comp. § 28). Usher supposes that it was originally compiled about 730 (Cave, Hist. Lit. in v. Ordo Rom.).

(2) An office of prayer, with its rubrics, was also called Ordo. Thus in the Besançon sacramentary of the 7th century, "Incipit Ordo Baptismi" (Mus. Ital. i. 323); in a Roman sacramentary of the 9th, "Ordo vero qualiter catacizantur (sic) est ita" (Cod. Gellon. in Marten. Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. 18; Ord. 6); "Ordo ad infirmum caticuminum (sic) faciendum vel baptizandum" (ibid. Ord. 7); "Incipit Ordo ad poenitentiam dandam" (Ex eod. cod. u. s. i. vi. 7; Ord. 6), etc. Ratio was sometimes used in the same sense; as, "Incipit Ratio ad dandam poenitentiam" (ibid. i. vi. 3, Ord. 2; sim. Ord. 10), "Ratio qualiter Domus Dei consecrandum est" (Pontificale Ecgberti, 26; ed. Surtees Soc.).

Literature.—In 1561, George Cassander printed at Cologne four ancient "Libelli Ordinis Romani;" A. "Ordo Processionis ad Ecclesiam sive Missam secundum Romanos;" B. "Ordo Processionis quando Episcopus festis diebus Missam celebrare voluerit," &c.; C. "In nomine Domini incipit Liber de Romano Ordine, qualiter celebrandum sit Officium Missæ;" D. "Incipit Ordo Ecclesiasticus Romanæ Ecclesiæ, vel qualiter Missa celebratur." In 1568, Melchior Hittorp reprinted these at Cologne in his collection of tracts, De Divinis Eccl. Cath. Officiis, in the order, as compared with that of Cassander, A, B, D, C. To these he added a very long "Ordo Romanus Antiquus de reliquis Anni totius Officiis ac Ministeriis," compiled from several "libelli ordinis" of very different dates, as it appears, probably by Bernold of Constance, A.D. 1066, which was republished from another MS. with considerable variations by Martin Gerbert, Monum. Vet. Liturgicæ Alemannicæ, P. III. p. 186, typis San. Blas. 1777. The libelli of Cassander reappeared in the Mus. Ital. of Mabillon, with two others within our time, if we mistake not, and many later. His order is that of the apparent dates; D (much enlarged); A; C; iv. "Fragmentum Vet. Ord. Rom. Missa Pontificali" (complete at the end of Amalarius, Eglogae, Baluz. Cap. Reg. Fr. ii. 1366; whence Mabill. u. s. 559 and 61); v. "Ordo Rom. u. s. de Missa Episcopali (primus);" B. L. A. Muratori has transcribed the earliest of these (Mabill. i. Cass. D) into his Liturgia Romana Vetus (tom. ii. p. 973) from Mabillon. Gerbert also gives D (the first part of Mab. i.) in his Monum. u. s. p. 144, from a MS. of the 9th century. [W. E. S.]

OREMUS (δηθῶμεν). This is the signal, or invitation, to the people to join in spirit in the prayer which is to follow. In the West, except in Spain and perhaps Gaul, both the invitation and the prayer were uttered by the priest, who was said respectively orationem indicere and dare. In the East it belonged to the deacon's office to "bid" the prayers; and the earlier and full form, of which the Clementine Liturgy and that of St. James give several examples, consisted in the deacon announcing the topics of prayer to the people clause by clause, while they responded Κύριε ἐλέησον, or some corresponding ejaculation, at the close of which the priest summed up the petitions in a collect. It is possibly a trace of a similar custom that we find in the Gelasian Sacramentary for certain days (e.g. lib. i. 41, Ordo de feria vi. passione Domini) such directions as these: "Sacerdos dicit Oremus, et adnuntiatur diaconus Flectamus genua. Et post paululum dicit Levate. Et dat orationem." Similarly, Ordo Romanus I. (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 22, &c.). That in Africa the priest bade the prayers may be inferred from St. Aug. Ep. 217, ad Vitalem, § 2 (Migne, tom. ii. 978), where he says "quando audis sacerdotem Dei ad altare exhortantem populum Dei orare pro incredulis," &c. In Spain and Gaul it appears that the deacon gave the invitation, while the priest pronounced the prayer (cf. Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Off. lib. ii. cap. 8: "Ipsi (sc. diaconi) clara voce in modum praeconis admonent cunctos, sive in orando, sive in flectendo genua, sive in psallendo, sive in lectionibus audiendo"; and immediately afterwards "illi (sacerdoti) orare, huic (diacono) psallere mandatur." The sermon attributed to Caesarius of Arles, among the Sermones Supposit. of St. Augustine, tom. v. app. Serm. 286, §§ 1, 7, suggests the same conclusion. [PRAECO; PROPHONESIS.]

In the present Mozarabic Liturgy, "Oremus" is only said twice, viz. before the "Agyos," and before the Capitulum, which introduces the Lord's Prayer.

It is worth while to notice the occurrence of the word in the Roman Missal, just before the offertory, where no spoken prayer follows it. This probably marks the place of some variable prayer, answering (it may be) to the Ambrosian Oratio super sindonem, which has become disused. (See Pseudo-Alcuin de Div. Off. cap. 'de Celebratione Missae,' and Amal. de Eccles. Off. lib. iii. cap. 19.)

The ordinary use of the word in any of the offices is to mark the beginning of a set prayer, to be said by the priest aloud, in which the people only concur by the concluding "Amen," in contradistinction to some other form of prayer, e.g. by versicles and responses, or some other act of worship.

ORGAN. The name "organum" was at first not restricted to a particular instrument, but appears to have nearly become so by St. Augustine's time. Commenting on Psalm cl. he says: "Nam cum organum vocabulum graecum sit, ut dixi, generale omnibus musicis instrumentis, hoc cui folles adhibentur alio Graeci nomine appellant. Ut autem organum dicatur, magis Latina et ea vulgaris est consuetudo." And—"Quamvis jam obtinuerit consuetudo ut organa proprie dicantur ea quae inflantur folli-bus." So from his enarr. on Psalm lvi. (our 57th), "non solum illud organum dicitur quod grande est et inflatur folli-bus, sed quicquid aptatur ad cantilenam," we also learn that organs were of considerable size. In the same comment he applies the term "organum" to the cithara and the psalterium.

For a full account of the history of this instrument the reader must be referred to Dr. Rimbault's portion of Hopkins and Rimbault's excellent work on this subject. There it is conclusively proved that the first epoch which distinguishes the antique organ from the mediæval one, viz., the invention of the keyboard, is very nearly synchronous with that which distinguishes antique from mediæval music, the invention of the stave, being about the end of the 11th century. Up to this time it would appear that organs only differed in size and number of pipes, and in the appliances for supplying wind. The article "Hydraula" in Smith's Dict. Greek and Rom. Antiq. gives the earliest form of it.

Athenaeus says that it was invented by Ctesibius, of Alexandria, from a contrivance applied to a clepsydra, in order to announce the hours at night. This contrivance is attributed to Plato, but it seems very doubtful, because it is only said of him as a tradition (λέγεται), and Aristoxenus was not acquainted with the thing; he, being not far removed from Plato's date, and professedly writing on music, would be likely to have known of such an invention of Plato's (if it were so). The organ of Ctesibius is of course much later (Athen. Deipn. iv. 23).

The organ is simply a development of the Syrnix or Pandean pipe, and in its earliest form consisted of a small box, into the top of which a row of pipes was inserted; the wind was supplied from the performer's mouth by means of a tube at one end; and any pipe was made to sound by means of drawing a slide which would open the hole in which the pipe was placed; the slide being pushed in again, the hole was closed, and the communication between the pipe and the box being thus cut off, the sound immediately ceased. In modern organs, for these slides have been substituted valves or pallets.

The first object seemed to be to augment the sound, by multiplying the number of pipes which would be in unison with each other; and Ctesibius has the reputation of having invented, or rendered practicable, the perforated slide, which enabled the performer to have the pipes more under command. This will be best understood by the following figure, which represents the holes in which the pipes stand.

[This would be now technically called an organ of three stops.]

Each of the slides mentioned before would cover one of the vertical columns in the above figure, and Ctesibius's slides would cover one of the horizontal rows; the modern analogue of the latter is the "register" or "stop." If three cards be taken pierced with holes exactly as in the figure, and the one be kept whole, and the others divided into sections containing respectively a vertical column and a horizontal row, so as to be movable, and the three be placed over each other, the action will be clearly seen.

The increase in the number of pipes required also artificial methods for supplying wind; the bellows was adopted, and by the time of the emperor Julian the Apostate had become so large as to be made of a bull's hide. This appears from an epigram of his:

Ἄλλ' ὑπὸ ταυρείης προθορῶν σπῆλγυγος αἴτης
Νέρθεν εὐτρήτων καλάμων ὑπὸ ρίσαν ὀδεύει.

Thus the organ became a complicated instrument. Tertullian (de Animâ, xiv.) uses it as a similitude for the many members composing one body. "Specta portentissimam Archimedis munificentiam, organum hydrolicum dico, tot membra, tot partes, tot compagine, tot itinera vocum, tot compendia sonorum, tot commercia modorum, tot acies tibiæ, et una moles erunt omnia." It would seem from this that the organ was constructed so as to be played in the various modes, Dorian, Lydian, &c., and thus supplied with pipes all the sounds of the complete "system"; if the "modi" here be understood to include the "Genera," we should have an organ of a compass of three octaves and a tone, with some quarter-tones in it; but it might be much smaller than this. The "compendia sonorum" would appear to be slides, to cut off the wind altogether, or from some of the ranks of pipes, i.e. our modern "stops" (the horizontal rows in the figure given above); and the "itinera vocum" would probably be the row of pipes belonging to the same note (the vertical columns in the figure).

So St. Augustine (on Psalm cl.): "Quibus fortasse ideo addidit organum, non ut singulæ sonent, CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

sed ut diversitate concordissima consonent, sicut ordinantur in organo." Thus the organ would be likened to a whole combination of different musical instruments.

The wind was supplied either directly from a bellows worked by hand (in some cases worked by the weight of a man standing on it), constituting a "pneumatic" organ; or the wind from the bellows was subjected to a water pressure to steady its supply, constituting an "hydraulic" organ. The latter sort was at first considered the better, but afterwards it was superseded by the other.

Vossius (de Poematum Cantu) says that the use of hydraulic organs had ceased at the time of Cassiodorus (6th century), and this author is cited as mentioning organs as in common use. He gives the following quotation from Claudian:

"Vel qui, magna levi detrudens murmura tactu,
Innumeras voces segetis modulatur abenae,
Intonat erranti digito penitusque trabali
Vecte laborantes in carmina concitat undas."

From this it appears that the pipes were frequently made of bronze, and the sound produced by drawing the slides.

This practice was continued as late as the time of St. Dunstan; the pipes are then described as "aereae fistulae" (W. Malmesb. Vita S. Adhelmi).

Vossius tells us that the barbarians tried unsuccessfully to make hydraulic organs, and so usually they were made pneumatic, with leather bellows, but that the hydraulic ones were still considered superior. He quotes Cassiodorus's description of one: "organum est quasi turris quaedam diversis fistulis fabricata, quibus flatu folium vox copiosissima destinatur [var. lect. distinctur]; et ut eam modulatio decora componat, linguis quibusdam ligneis ab interiori parte construitur, quas disciplinabiliter magistrorum digiti reprimentes, grandisonam efficiunt et suavissimam cantilenam."

There is a very singular poem representing an organ, by Publius Porphyrius Optatianus (4th century); something in the style of the "Altars," "Easter Wings," &c. of George Herbert. One thing seems to be clear from this poem, that the longest pipe, and therefore the bass of the organ, was at the performer's right hand, precisely contrary to our present arrangement, but analogous to that of the harp, so far as the right hand of the performer is concerned. This arrangement was probably adopted as corresponding to that of the strings of the lyre. It appears from the latter part of this poem that the pipes were made of bronze, and arranged in ranks in a quadrangular form, as in the figure given above, and these appear to have been the slides worked by the performer, to open and shut the holes in which the pipes were placed; the wind being supplied by a number of youths each in charge of a bellows.

A representation preserved in Gori's Thesaurus Diptychorum (said to be from a MS. of the time of Charlemagne) seems to agree with this very well. King David on a throne, playing a lyre, is accompanied by three men on a trumpet, a sort of violin or barbiton, and a set of bells (or perhaps cymbals); and farther off is a pneumatic organ, with the performer (seated at the extreme right, in the semicircular part of the drawing) working the slides, and another blowing the bellows. It would seem most probable that the king is viewing one end of the organ, so as to see both the organist and the bellows-blower, they being on opposite sides of the instrument. This would put the longest, i.e. the bass, pipes opposite the organist's right hand. (See cut No. 1.)

At this end of the organ appear to be two other slides, and these would seem most probably to be registers or stops, running under a rank of pipes such as that shown in the drawing; there would, therefore, be another similar author, quoted in Hawkins, Hist. of Music, p. 238), and an hydraulic one was erected at Aix-la-Chapelle in 826, for Louis the Pious, by one George, or rather Gregory, a Venetian, after the Greek manner (Vossius, de Poematum Cantu); but though the writers of that age had praised Gregory's undertaking, they did not say whether it was a success. An organ was also sent to Charlemagne, by the Caliph Haroun Alraschid, and was probably placed in one of the churches of Aix-la-Chapelle.

S. Aldhelm (de Laude Virginum) is quoted in proof that the external pipes of organs in Saxon rank behind these; this organ would be of two stops, unless some more were understood. The slides worked by the performer would run transversely to the ranks of pipes, and each slide would open two (or perhaps more) pipes of the same sound. The performer seems to be pulling one slide out and pushing another in, thus passing from one note of his tune to the following note. He had, previously to his performance, it would seem, gone to the bass end of the instrument, and drawn out two stops.

The use of organs in churches is, on the authority of Platina and others, ascribed to pope Vitalian (658-672); but Lorinus gives it a higher antiquity. "Julianus, unus de auctoribus catenae in Job multo antiquior Vitaliano et Gregorio magno, ait cum pietate organa usurpari posse, et jam in templis usum illorum fuisse cum scriberet." "In Concilio Coloniensi praecipitur sic adhiberi organorum in templis melodiam, ut non lasciviam magis quam devotionem excitet, et ut praeter hymnos divinos canticaque spiritualia, quidquam resonet ac repraesentet. Pontifex in Capella, et graves quidam religiosi, eorum abstinere usu." But in England the contrary practice obtained, as the monastic churches were generally provided with organs, as appears from the account of the death of king Edgar (Sir H. Spelman, Glossary, s. v. Organ): but it does not appear that they were in use in any other churches. (Compare MUSIC, p. 1346.)

times were gilded. The quotation hitherto given consists of the last three lines of the following extract:—

"Si vero quisquam chordarum respuit odas
Et potiora cupit quam pulset pectine chordas
Quis Psalmista pius psallebat cantibus olim,
Ac mentem magno gestit modulamine pasci
Et cantu gracili refugit contentus adesse,
Maxima millenis auscultans organa flabris,
Mulceat auditum ventosis foliibus iste,
Quamlibet auratis fulgescant caetera capsis."

It appears to the writer of this article that the contrary is rather proved—that the beautiful appearance arising from gilding, &c., refers to other instruments, and that the organ had to appeal for its adoption to considerations of sound only, and had the disadvantage of an unpleasing appearance. Certainly the representations of it are not very attractive to the sight. But this passage does prove that organs in the 7th and 8th centuries were large, although "millenis" must be considered somewhat indefinite. So St. Augustine, "quod grande est" above. Not much later than our period an organ was erected at Winchester, with fourteen bellows and 400 pipes, 40 to each key. This also had the "lyric semitone," and it would seem most probable that its compass was

It was blown by 70 (?) men, and played on by two monks: "Et regit alphabetum rector uterque suum," which apparently means that one managed the slides that caused the pipes to speak, and the other managed the ranks of pipes to be used; in modern parlance, one playing on the keyboard, the other shifting the stops; only these were later improvements (see Wolstan's poem, quoted in Hopkins and Rimbault, p. 16); or it might possibly mean that the set of slides was distributed between these two men to manage, the one, perhaps, taking the lower portion, and the other the upper, making, in fact, a duet performance, which might be a in Hopkins and Rimbault's Book on the Organ, p. 18.* (See cut No. 3.)

It is there described as a pneumatic organ; but the writer cannot help thinking that the cylinders in the basement are intended to hold water, and thus make it an hydraulic organ.

The smaller of these contains eight pipes, apparently arranged in two tetrachords, to each of which is assigned an organist; which somewhat bears out the supposition of a duet performance mentioned just above; the most plausible supposition for the compass seems to be—very considerable advantage in accompanying the plain-song, when we remember that every sound produced involved the drawing of a slide and pushing it in again.

The accompanying engraving (No. 2) from the Utrecht psalter represents an organ of the 8th century; a better and larger instrument is represented in an Anglo-Saxon MS. now in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, and is engraved

* The earliest known representation of this instrument seems to be that on the south bas-relief of the pedestal of the obelisk of Thothmes, still standing in the Atmeidan or Hippodrome of Constantinople. It dates from A.D. 380. See Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, p. 18. [R. St. J. T.]

the synemmenon and diernymenon tetrachords. The other has ten pipes, which might be imagined to be—

If this be true, the bass pipes had got placed at the performer's left hand, as we have got them now. It is not at all evident how these men were conceived as playing; they are placed behind the organ, and of course the slides they had to manipulate are out of sight; possibly the artist may be representing them as about to commence, and giving directions to their four bellows-blowers to give them plenty of wind to start with. ORIENS, bishop of Auscium, commemorated May 1. (Usuard. Mart.); ORIENTIUS (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. i. 61.) [C. H.]

ORIENTATION. A term applied to the situation of churches, with the sanctuary, or part containing the altar, towards the east.

One of the earliest traces of orientation is found in the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 57), "And first let the house be oblong, turned towards the east, the pastophoria on either side towards the east." It is asserted, indeed, by Mabillon (de Liturgia Gallicana, i. 8), when speaking of the ancient churches, that "they all used to end in an apsis or bow, and used to look towards the east." This statement, however, needs some qualification. For the church of Antioch is described by Socrates (Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. 22), who says that "it had its position inverted; for its altar looks not towards the East, but towards the West." Paulinus speaks of the orientation of a church, not as the universal or obligatory usage, but only as "morem usitatiorem." On the whole, it appears that the eastern position of the altar was the rule, but that there were exceptions to it from very early times. For the origin of this usage, see EAST, p. 586.

In the attempt to form an opinion upon the subject we must not lose sight of the fact that others besides Christians have had a rule of the kind. There is an elaborate discussion of the point in the Lexicon Universale of Hofmann (s. v. Occidens). He shews, upon the authority of Josephus, that both in the tabernacle and in the temple the arrangements of the structure were such as to cause the Jewish worshippers to face, not towards the east, but towards the west, in the functions of religion. Maimonides (On Prayer, cap. xi. 1, 2) traces the usage to a still higher antiquity, finding evidence in Scripture itself that such was the position adopted by Abraham upon Mount Moriah—a position which amongst the Jews was not confined to tabernacle and temple, but extended likewise to synagogue and prayer-house. He adds a reason of the usage—that inasmuch as the gentile heathen faced toward the east, it was proper that the people of God should adopt the opposite position. Under this head the following passage from a vision of Ezekiel is relevant: "And he brought me into the inner court of the Lord's house, and, behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple of the Lord and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east" (Ezek. viii. 16). There is some difficulty in harmonizing the statements of Vitruvius and other pagan writers of authority as to the orientation of the altar, the sacred image, and the worshipper in the temples of the heathen. But the following passage of Clement of Alexandria may perhaps be taken as giving a clear and accurate account of their usage: "The most ancient temples (of the pagans) looked toward the west (i.e. had their entrance towards the west), that those who stood with their face towards the image might be taught to turn toward the east" (Strom. vii. 7, § 43). Hence the practice of orientating a church may be, in its origin, one of those many customs which Christianity found current in the pagan world, and which by a wise economy it took up and turned to its own purpose. A long discourse on the entire subject will be found by those who wish to pursue it farther in the Annals of cardinal Baronius (Ann. 58, c. 105). [H. T. A.]

ORLEANS, COUNCILS OF (AURELIANENSIS CONCILIA). (1) A.D. 511, by order of Clovis; on the tenth day of the fifth month according to some MSS. which the rest make July (shewing that the Gallican year began then in March), as the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates observe, presided over by Cyprian, metropolitan of Bordeaux, who subscribed first, with thirty-one bishops, all of whose sees are given, after him, the bishop of Orleans as low down as last but two. The Isidorian collection, however, may be thought to discredit this order. The number of canons passed was likewise thirty-one; "dont quelques uns," say the same authorities, "entreprennent sur la juridiction civile. Tel est le quatrième qui ordonne que les fils, les petits-fils, et les arrière-petits-fils de ceux qui ont vécu dans la cléricature, demeureront sous le pouvoir et la juridiction de l'évêque. Les pères de l'assemblée dans le cinquième reconnaissent que toutes les églises tiennent du Roi les fonds dont elles sont dotées; c'est là, si l'on croit un moderne, le fondement de la Régale. On ne pouvait guère la tirer de plus loin." In the earlier part of the fourth, which they inadvertently call the sixth canon, it is ordained that no secular person shall be taken for any clerical office, except by command of the king or with consent of the judge. Of the rest, the first three prescribe rules for different persons who have taken sanctuary. By the eighth, any bishop knowingly ordaining a slave unknown to his master is mulcted to his master of twice his price. By the ninth, a deacon or presbyter committing a capital crime, is to be removed from his office and from communion. By the sixteenth, bishops are bound to relieve the poor, sick, and disabled, to the utmost of their power. By the eighteenth, no brother may marry the widow of his deceased brother. By the nineteenth, monks are to obey their abbat, and abbats the bishops. The twentieth says: "cum ad celebrandas missas in Dei nomine convenitur, populus non ante discedat quam missae solennitas compleatur; et, ubi episcopus fuerit, benedictionem accipiat sacerdotis." The twenty-seventh: "rogationes, id est, litanias ante ascensionem Domini ab omnibus ecclesiis placuit celebrari; ita ut praemissum triduanum jejunium in Dominica ascensionis festivitate solvatur." . . The last: "episcopus, si infirmitate non fuerit impeditus, ecclesiae cui proximus fuerit die Dominico deesse non liceat." A short letter from these bishops to the king is preserved, begging him to confirm what they had decreed, if it met with his approval. Many more canons are given to this council by Burchard and others. (Mansi, viii. 347-72.)

(2) A.D. 533, or 536 according to Mansi, June 23; by order of the kings of France, when twenty-one canons on discipline were passed, to which Honoratus, bishop of Bourges, subscribed first, Leontius, bishop of Orleans, second, with twenty-four bishops and five representatives of absent bishops after them. As regards their matter, the seven first relate to bishops, metropolitans, and councils; the eighth and ninth to deacons and presbyters; the tenth and eleventh to marriage. By the thirteenth, abbats, guardians of shrines (martyrarii), recluses, and presbyters, are inhibited from giving letters of peace (epistolia: which is, however, the correction of Du Cange, for apostolia, which he cannot explain). "Presbyter, vel diaconus sine literis," says the sixteenth, "vel si baptizandi ordinem nesciat, nullatenus ordinetur." The seventeenth and eighteenth are directed against deaconesses, of whom no more are to be ordained. By the nineteenth, Jews and Christians may not intermarry. By the twentieth, Catholics who go back to idolatry, or partake of meats offered to idols, are to be excluded from church-assemblies. By the twenty-first, abbats refusing to obey bishops are to be excluded from communion. This council is not given in the Isidorian collection. (Mansi, viii. 835-40.)

(3) A.D. 538, May 7, the preface to which seems hardly consistent with so short an interval between this and the last council; and this, on the other hand, is given in the Isidorian collection. It was attended by nineteen bishops, of whom the metropolitan of Lyons subscribed first, and the bishop of Orleans last, and by the representatives of seven absent bishops. Thirty-three canons on discipline were passed, most of them testifying to a general neglect of the canons from the metropolitan downwards, and some of them not easy to understand. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 419.] The thirtieth forbids Jews to mix with Christians from Maundy Thursday till Easter Monday. The thirty-first threatens the civil judge with excommunication who permits heretics to rebaptize Catholics with impunity, because, say the bishops, "It is certain that we have Catholic kings." (Mansi, ix. 9-22.)

(4) A.D. 541, when the metropolitan of Bordeaux presided and subscribed first of thirty-eight bishops, the last being the bishop of Orleans, and the twelve following him the representatives of absent bishops. Thirty-eight canons were passed; but it is to be observed that neither this nor the next council is included in the Isidorian collection. The first and second canons relate to Easter. The fifteenth and sixteenth shew that paganism was not yet extinct in France; the seventeenth that there were priests and deacons who were married men, though it prohibits their living as such; the twentieth decrees: "Ut nullus saecularium personarum, praetermisso pontifice, seu praeposito ecclesiae, quemquam clericorum pro sua potestate constringere, discutere audeat, vel damnare . . ." The twenty-seventh renews the tenth canon of the preceding council of Orleans "three years before," and likewise the thirtieth of that of Epaune A.D. 517, against incestuous marriages. (Mansi, ix. 111-22.)

(5) A.D. 549, Oct. 28, convened by king Childebert, when, according to some manuscripts, the bishop of Lyons, according to others, the bishop of Arles subscribed first, and the other second; forty-eight more bishops and twenty-one representatives of absent bishops complete the list; but the bishop of Orleans was not among them, having been unjustly banished, though he was restored here. Twenty-four canons were passed, the first of which is somewhat after date, directed against the followers of Eutyches and Nestorius. The second ordains, "Ut nullus sacerdotum quemquam rectae fidei hominem pro parvis et levibus causis a communione suspendat . . ."; the ninth, "Nullus ex laicis absque anni conversione praemissa episcopus ordinetur. . .", and the twelfth, "Nulli viventi episcopo alius superponatur aut superordinetur episcopus; nisi forsitan in ejus locum, quem capitalis culpa dejecerit." The fifteenth relates to a hospice (xenodochium) founded at Lyons by the king and his consort (Mansi, ix. 127-40).

(6) A.D. 638, "ou environ," say the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates, but it is variously fixed, and the sole authority for it is a vague statement by Audoenus, archbishop of Rouen, in his Life of St. Eligius, to the effect that an un-named heretic was confuted in a meeting of bishops at Orleans, due to the exertions of that saint previously to his being made bishop. It can hardly pass, therefore, for a sixth council. (Mansi, x. 759-62.)

It is mentioned by Caesarius of Arles, among the things which he forbids to be introduced into convents, "plumaria et acupictura et omne polymitum vel stragula, sive ornaturae" (Reg. ad Virg. c. 42; Patrol. lxvii. 1116; cf. Recap. c. 11, ib. 1118). ORPHANAGE (ὀρφανοτροφεῖον, orphano-trophium). From the very first the duty of assisting the orphan, among the other classes of destitute and helpless persons, was recognised as incumbent on the Christian. St. Ignatius (Ep. ad Smyrn. cap. vi.) mentions it as one of the marks of the heterodox that "they care not for the widow, the orphan, or the distressed." Again and again in the Apostolical Constitutions exhortations are given concerning them to the bishop to protect them, to individual Christians to remember them in their charity and, if possible, to adopt them. The way in which they are enumerated in the Clementine Liturgy in the Deacon's Litany, along with "Readers, singers, virgins and widows," suggests that perhaps there may have been some sort of formal "church roll" kept of them, and it is obvious that so long as the church was a proscribed and persecuted religious body, her provision for them could not have gone beyond some such institution as this. With the time of Constantine came endowments for this and similar purposes, which he formally permitted, and himself set the example of giving. (Euseb. H. E. x. 6, and Vit. Const. iv. 28). It was looked upon as a fitting duty for a cleric to undertake the guardianship of orphans, and in managing their affairs even to mingle in secular business (Conc. Chalced. c. 3). Clerics seem commonly to have been at the head of orphanages and hospitals (Zonaras in can. 8, Conc. Chalced.). At Constantinople the orphanotrophus, who was necessarily a priest, and who was a public guardian of the orphans, was an official of high rank. [HOSPITALS.]

By a Frankish capitulary (Conc. Germ. ii. 29) immunities are granted to orphanages expressly, along with other charitable foundations; shewing that by the beginning of the 9th century such institutions were widely recognised.

Both at Rome and Constantinople orphans from the orphanage were employed as choristers; so that in some Greek rituals (see Goar, p. 359) the word ὄρφανοι is used for "choir-boys," and at Rome (see Anast. Biblioth. in Vita Sergii II.) the orphanotrophium came to be used as the Schola Cantorum. [C. E. H.]

OSTIANUS, presbyter and confessor in Vivarois; commemorated June 30. (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 578.) [C. H.]

OSTIARIUS (ὄθαρως, πυλῶρως, ὄστιάριος). It is argued by Bingham (Antiq. iii. 6) that the order of ostiarii was introduced at Rome in a time of persecution, the earliest mention of them being in a letter of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, in the 3rd century (Euseb. Hist. vi. 43). The order has been laid aside in the Greek church from the time of the Trullan council (A.D. 692). But whatever may have been the date of the introduction of the ostiarius as a functionary of the church, the word was certainly used in a very similar sense in pagan times. For not only was there an ostiarius (the modern concierge) at the entrance of a private house under the Roman empire; but while the basilica was still a court of justice it had an officer (ostiarius) whose duty it was to regulate the approach of the litigants to the judge, and whose name still survives in the French term huissier, and the English usher, applied to officials who are charged with similar duties. (See Hofmann, Lex Univ. s. v.) [Compare DOORKEEPER.]

The definition of his duties given by Charlemagne (Fragm. de Ritib. Vet. Eccl.) is as follows: "Ostiarius ab ostio ecclesiae dicitur, quod ita debet praevidere, ne ullo modo paganus ingrediatur ecclesiam, quia suo introitu polluit eam. Debet etiam custodire ea quae intra ecclesiam sunt, ut salva sint." The first duty then of the ostiarius was to keep the door of the church, but only that one through which the men entered. The door through which the women passed was kept by a deaconess (Constit. Apost. ii. 61, quoted by Mede, Opp. p. 327). The object of this guardianship was to prevent the entry of improper persons. Martene observes from St. Augustine that the ostiarii of the Donatists would admit no one to their churches till they had enquired of him to which communion (sc. orthodox or Donatist) he belonged (de Eccl. Rit. i. viii. 8, 10). In the ancient Roman church a custom prevailed of the ostiarius asking every one for a certificate of faith (libellum fidei) before admitting him into St. Peter's. To the great church of Constantinople there were attached no fewer than seventy-five ostiarii (Suicer, Thesaurus, 1417).

In the fragment of the letter of pope Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, the Ostiarii are spoken of with exorcists and lectors as amounting to fifty-two. (Migne, p. 743.)

The ostiarii were termed an ordo, the word used of their appointment was ordinare; and this "ordination" was solemnly performed by the bishop, with a service which appears to have been substantially the same in all the ancient Rituals and Pontificals. See ORDINATION, III. ii. 1, p. 1510.

By the synod of Laodicea (cent. 4) the ostiarii were forbidden, in common with all other clerics, to enter a public house (can. 24). From another canon (22) of the same council, it might be inferred that the duties of the ostiarius were at times performed by other orders. "The minister (subdeacon: Hefele) may not leave his place at the door." [See DOORKEEPERS, p. 574.] [H. T. A.]

OSTIARIUS (MONASTIC), the porter of the monastery; sometimes called "janitor," or "portarius."

The gatekeeper or doorkeeper was an important personage in the monastery, entrusted as he was with the twofold responsibility of keeping the monks from going out, unless with the abbat's permission, and of allowing strangers to come in. Being thus the medium of communication between the monastery and the world outside, it was imperative that he should be a man of trustworthiness and discrimination. The very lowliness, in one sense, of the office made it all the more honourable among those whose professed aim and object in life was self-abasement (Rufin. Hist. Monach. c. 17).

The importance of keeping the members of the monastery within its walls was admitted generally, in accordance with the old Benedictine rule that each monastery ought, if possible, to have its garden, mill, bakery, supply of water, and necessary trades within its precincts (Bened. Reg. c. 66). Only one way of egress was permitted, or at most two. Much depended on the porter being discreet (Bened. Reg. c. 66). He was to be a man not only advanced in years but grave and sedate in character, dead to the world; with a younger and more nimble monk to carry messages for him if necessary (Ib.). By the rule of Magister there were to be two porters, both aged men, one to relieve the other (Reg. Mag. c. xciv.). In the Thebaid in such esteem was the office held that the porter was to be a presbyter (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. lxxi.). Sometimes, in earlier days, when visitors were not so numerous, the porter had also the superintendence of the guest-chamber (hospitium) and of the outer cloisters, as well as of the abbat's kitchen. (Martene, Reg. Ben. Comm. c. 66.)

Sometimes, indeed, the porter was promoted to be abbat (Martene, u. s.). Benedict gives an especial allusion to the chapter in his rule ("De Ostiario"), by ordering it to be read aloud repeatedly, that ignorance might never be pleaded for its infraction.

The porter's cell was to be close to the gateway (Ib.). He was to inspect all comers through a small barred window or grating in the door, bidding those whom he thought worthy to wait within the door, and the rest without, till he could learn the abbat's pleasure. Every night at the hour of compline he was to take his keys to the abbat or prior. When called away to chapel, to refectory, or to lecture, he was to leave the gate locked, neither ingress nor egress being allowed at those times. It was part of his duty to distribute the broken meat and other scraps of food after meals to the mendicants waiting outside the door, and to see that the horses, dogs, &c., of strangers were duly attended to. (Ib.)

Benedict speaks of visitors knocking at the door or crying out to be let in. Some commentators have imagined that he speaks severally of the rich and the poor (Ib.). His direction that the porter is to reply "Deo Gratias," or "Benedic," has been similarly explained as meant for these two classes respectively. Another reading is "Benedicat." "Benedic" or "Benedicat" is supposed to be intended for a priest-porter, "Deo Gratias" for a layman; or the latter to be used on first hearing the knock or cry, the former on accosting the applicant (Ib.; cf. Augustin. Enarrat. in Pss. cxxii.). Anyhow, this curious trait of monastic manners recalls the primitive salutation of Boaz and his reapers in the story of Ruth in the Old Testament. The words were to be spoken gently, reverently, affectionately.

It was one of the laxities of later ages that this important office was not unfrequently delegated to a lay-brother, technically styled a "conversus," or sometimes to a mere layman. Even so strict an order as the Cistercians allowed one of the two porters in their larger abbeys to be a lay-brother. (Martene, u. s.)

There was an official in nunneries whose duties corresponded very closely with those of the "ostiarius." It was specially enacted in the anonymous Rule, ascribed by some to Columba, that the "ostiaria" or porteress should be not only aged and discreet, but not given to gossiping. (Reg. Cujusdam, c. iii.) [I. G. S.]

Pachomius is briefly mentioned in Basil. Menol. May 6 as founder of the solitary life. Some Greek MSS. of Turin and Milan mention a Pachomius under May 6 with Hilarion, Mamas, and Patricius. PACIFICAE. (1) The name by which the missal LITANY [p. 1001] was anciently known in the West, as containing prayers for peace (Neale, Eastern Ch. Int. p. 360). Comp. PRECES. (2) "Letters of peace" (εἰρηνικαὶ ἐπιστολαί, epistolae pacificae). The council of Chalcedon (c. xi.) ordered that those who were poor and needed assistance should travel with certificates founded on investigation, or with letters of peace from the church (μετὰ δοκιμασίας ἐπιστολῶν εἶτουν εἰρηνικοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς μόνοις). The context seems to indicate that this canon refers to the clergy. Similarly the council of Antioch (c. vii.) desires that no one should entertain strangers without letters of peace (εἰρηνικῶν). Zonaras, commenting on the 11th canon of Chalcedon, says (p. 104) that εἰρηνικαὶ ἐπιστολαί are those which are given to bishops by their metropolitans, and to metropolitans by their patriarchs, when they have occasion to go to the court of the emperor; and also those which are given by their own bishops to clerics who wish to remove to another city and to be entered on the roll of the clergy there, in accordance with the 17th canon of the Trullan council. The term used in this canon is, however, ἀπολυτικά, dismissory. See COMMENDATORY LETTERS; DIMISSORY LETTERS. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s.v. Εἰρηνικά.) [C.]

PAENULA. 1. Etymology. — Although it would seem that this word is not used at all in ecclesiastical Latin^a as the name of a Christian vestment, still the corresponding Greek word, variously spelt, is the recognised name in the Greek church for the vestment known in the west as a chasuble [CASULA], and the same thing is denoted in the Syrian churches by a word directly formed from the Greek. Moreover, although the word paenula is not used in this way, yet apparently the paenula itself resembled in shape, even if it was not quite identical with, the casula and planeta. We shall therefore briefly discuss in our article the history of the Latin word itself.

It first, however, becomes a question whether the Latin word is derived from the Greek, or the Greek from the Latin, or whether both are to be referred for their origin to a third language, as the Phœnician. The absence of any very satisfactory derivation in either Greek or Latin would be, as far as it goes, in favour of the third view, were anything reasonable forthcoming. We do, indeed, find in Hebrew יִלְבָּשׁ, for a kind of outer garment (Talm. Jer., Kelim, c. 29; cited by Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum, col. 1742), but this is most probably merely a reproduction of Pallium; and in any case there is no evidence to justify us in including it in the list of words that passed from Phœnician into Greek and thence into Latin.

It has been very commonly asserted, with reference to St. Paul's use of the word in 2 Tim. iv. 13, a passage to which we shall refer at length presently, that it is to be taken as one of the many Latin words occurring in the New Testament. This view seems to us to be entirely untenable, from the fact that the Greek word can be traced back nearly to the time of Alexander

^a We find in Isidore of Seville (Orig. xix. 24; Patrol. lxxii. 691), "Penula est pallium [here evidently a mere general term for an outer garment, like ἱμάτιον] cum fimbriis longis;" but here the word is of course not used by him as an ecclesiastical term, but merely in its ordinary sense. Also in an old Latin version of the letter of the Patriarch Nicephorus cited below, which is given by Baronius (Annales, ad ann. 811), we find φαινόλιον rendered by penula. The translator (probably Anastasius Bibliothecarius) was doubtless influenced by the similarity of the word, but the instance cannot be supposed to afford the least support to the belief that the paenula was the name of an ecclesiastical vestment in the Western Church. Binterim (Denkw. iv. 1. 208) remarks that "the planeta was also called paenula by the ancients," but he gives no evidence for this assertion, and it does not seem very likely that any is adducible.

the Great, a period at which it cannot be fancied that Greek adopted any words from Latin. The word occurs in a fragment of the Iphigenia in Tauris of Rhinthon, a writer of comedies, or rather burlesque tragedies, in the time of Ptolemy I. As this seems the earliest admissible instance of the use of the word, we shall cite the passage with its context from the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux (vii. 60; p. 288, ed. Bekker); ἡ δὲ μανδύη ὁμοίον τι τῷ καλουμένῳ φαινόλῃ· τίνων δὲ ἐστίν, ὥς μὴ περιερχόμεθα Κρήτας ἢ Πέρσας, Αἰσχύλος ἐρεῖ·

καὶ αὐτὸς δὲ ὁ φαινόλης ἐστίν ἐν Ῥίνθωνος Ἰφιγενείᾳ τῇ ἐν Ταύροις, ἔχουσα καὶνὰν φαινόλαν κάπαρτιον.

It will be observed that the citation is in Doric Greek, Rhinthon being a native of either Tarentum or Syracuse.^b

The word φαινόλης continued to exist in Greek in its ordinary sense, quite apart from Christianity. It occurs in the digest of Epictetus given by Arrian (lib. iv. c. 8; vol. i. p. 637, ed. Schweighaeuser). Again, we find in the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus, a work written about the time of Antoninus Pius, that the ὁ λεγόμενος φανόλης is associated with the χλαμὺς or μανδύας as to its significance in dreams (lib. ii. c. 3; p. 135, ed. Reiff). About the same time, or a little later, Athenaeus uses the word:—οὐ σὺ εἰ ὁ καὶ τὸν καὶνὸν καὶ οὐδέπω ἐν χρεῖᾳ γεγόμενον φανόλην, εἰρηται γὰρ, ὦ βέλτιστε, καὶ ὁ φανόλης, εἰπὼν, "ΠΑῖ Δεῦκε, δὸς μοι τὸν ἔχρηστον φανόλην." (Deipn. lib. iii. c. 5).

We shall next cite from the Greek lexicographers. Here, it will be observed, we meet with a diversity both in form and meaning; for, besides its use for an outer garment, it is also stated to mean a roll of parchment, and a case or coffer. Whether this difference is to be explained by assuming the existence of two originally distinct words, φανόλης and φαλόνης, does not appear, nor does it matter for our present purpose.^c As far as we are concerned, there can be no doubt from the spelling consistently found in the above cited examples, and from the unvarying form of the Latin, that the original and proper spelling of our word is φαινόλης; the other spelling being either that of another word, or a mere metathesis for the former. It will be observed that the lexicographers give some support to the former hypothesis. Thus Hesychius gives φαλόνης: ἢ λητάριον [sc. εἰλητάριον] μεμβραῖνον, ἢ γλωσσόκομον; and φανόλα: τὸ ὕψασμα, οὕτως [here probably the name of Rhinthon has dropped out before the citation from him] ἔχουσα καὶνὰν φανόλαν.^d Suidas gives three forms, φαιλώνης· εἰλητὸν τομάριον μεμβραῖνον, ἢ γλωσσόκομον ἢ χιτάνιον:—φαινόλης· χιτάνισκος, οἱ δὲ παλαιοὶ ἐφέστριάς: and φενόλης· Ῥωμαϊκὴ στολή. Similarly, the Etymologicum Magnum defines φελώνης in almost the same words as the first of the above three, and φαινόλης also as Suidas had done. It is perhaps worth noting, that while spellings in which the ν precedes the λ are always defined in the sense of garment, those in which the λ precedes the ν have either no mention of garment, or have it at the end, as if a subsequent addition. It is of course quite possible to assume the existence of two originally distinct words, and yet explain each as the name of some kind of garment (so Salmasius, l.c.). In any case, however, the latter spelling, as well as the former, with various modifications of the vowels, occurs for the Greek name of the Christian vestment. Again, passing this point, it seems doubtful whether the word is ὁ φαινόλης or ἡ φαινόλη. The line of Rhinthon makes it the feminine, and the Latin, it is true, is feminine [but the termination in ης would naturally be replaced by one in α, which would be feminine, if there were no special reason for making it masculine; so, e.g. χάρτης, κοχλίας, γανσάπας, all masculine, are replaced by the feminine charta, cochlea, gausapa], but our later Greek citations make it masculine. Whether there is a misreading in Rhinthon for καῖνόν, which misreading has been reproduced in Hesychius, or whether the old termination was in η, and the later one in ης, it is impossible to say. As regards the variation in spelling of the first syllable between αι and ε, we can hardly doubt that the ε is a mere corruption, especially when the Latin spelling is considered, where, whether we write the diphthong ae or the vowel e, the first syllable is uniformly long.

^b Tertullian asserts (Apol. c. 6) that the Lacedaemonians invented the paenula, so as to be able to enjoy the public games in cold weather. This statement, though probably not worth much, is interesting as connecting with a Dorian people a word which first meets us in a Dorian poet.

^c Some have connected the former with φαίνομαι (c. g. Etym. Magn. [παρὰ τὸ φαίνεσθαι ὅλον], Salmassius [note in Spartian., infra, "translucens et perlucida tunica"], Suidas s. v.; and it may be added that we have φανολίς in Sappho [ἐσπερε πάντα φέρεις, ὅσα φανολίς ἐσκεδός' αἶώς]), deriving the latter from φελλός.

^d It may be noted here, that we find the word in another passage of Hesychius: ἀμφινοῦς· χιτῶνας ἢ φελλῶνας.

2. Use of the word in Latin.—We shall next, before considering the Christian usage of the word, examine its use in Latin. Here we find it freely used from the time of Plautus onwards, to indicate a warm, heavy outer garment, for travelling or cold weather. This covered the whole person, having merely a hole for the head to pass through; and thus it did not require sleeves, but fell over the arms. The general impression left from a considerable series of passages (see Forcellini, s. v.) is that the garment was one which would not be worn by a person in the higher ranks of life, save under the special circumstances given above, though it would be worn as an ordinary dress by slaves and the like. Our earliest instance is from Plautus (Mostellaria, iv. 2. 74), where a slave is told that it is only his paenula that saves his back from a beating. Considering the source whence Plautus's comedies were drawn, the fact that the Latin word is first traced to him is not without significance. Our next trace is found in one of the fragments of the Satires of Lucilius (lib. xv. frag. 6; cited, as also the two following instances, by Nonius Marcellus, xiv. 3). In one of the farces (fabulae Atellanæ) of Pomponius Bononiensis, one character bids another, "paenulam in caput induce, ne te noscat," referring presumably to the hood, with which the paenula, like most other similar dresses, was furnished [Hood]. Varro again is cited, "non quaerenda est homini, qui habet virtutem, paenula in imbri."

In Cicero the word is used several times. In his speech pro Milone (c. 10; cf. c. 20), he tells how Milo, when on his way from Rome in a carriage, having his wife with him, and wearing a paenula (paenulatus), on being attacked, springs from the carriage and casts aside his paenula, which would only fetter his arms. In his speech pro Sextio (c. 38), he speaks of the paenula as a garment worn by mule-drivers. Cicero also uses the phrases scindere paenulam, attingere paenulam alicujus, to indicate respectively over-urgent civility, and "taking a man by the button-hole" (Epp. ad Atticum, lib. xiii. 33). We have said that the paenula was a warm, heavy garment, and thus Horace (Epist. i. 11. 18) speaks jokingly of it as a thing which no one would dream of wearing in hot weather. It was generally made of wool (paenula gausapina: Martial, Epig. xiv. 145), but sometimes of leather (paenula scortea: ib. 130). Martial (v. 27) contrasts paenulatus with togatus, as indicating a lower rank in society. Juvenal (Sat. v. 79) makes the parasite, when on his way to dinner with his patron on a stormy night, complain of his dripping paenula. It seems also to have been used as a soldier's overcoat (Suetonius, Galba, c. 6; Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. 1). In travelling, indeed, the paenula might be made to serve the purpose of a blanket by night, as well as a cloak by day (Seneca, Epist. lxxxvii. 2).

The Historiae Augustae Scriptores furnish us with several instances of an interesting kind. Spartianus tells of Hadrian that, when tribune, he lost his paenula, which he took as an omen of his future imperial dignity, since tribunes wore a paenula to keep off the rain, but emperors never (c. 3, where see the notes of Salmasius and Casaubon). Again, Lampridius mentions that Commodus (c. 16), after the death of a certain gladiator, ordered the senators¹ to come to the spectacle, not in the toga, which was white, but in the paenula, which was, as a rule, dark-coloured. Lampridius remarks that this was "contra consuetudinem," that is, doubtless the wearing of the paenula was still not common among the better classes, except under special conditions. Indeed of this a further proof is given by Lampridius, in the life of Alexander Severus (c. 27), in that this emperor gave special permission to senators to wear the paenula in Rome, as a protection against cold, but did not extend this permission to matrons, who were only allowed to use it on a journey. This need not be assumed to contradict the remark of Spartianus given above, for we may suppose Alexander to be permitting the wearing of this dress as a warm cloak at the discretion of the wearer, whereas before it needed bad weather to justify its use, and was thought to be a kind of undress, so that emperors never used it. Lampridius, in his life of Diadumenus, the poor little son of Macrinus, who was Augustus before he was ten years old, tells (c. 2) how, on the child's assumption of the name Antoninus, the father had prepared for distribution to the people "paenulas coloris rosei" [here probably equivalent to russei; cf. Trebell. Vit. Claudii, c. 14], which were to be called Antoninianae.

Κρήτες φελλώνην λέγουσι. There is perhaps something wrong with the text, but it seems hardly safe with this to conclude that φελλώνης is a Cretan word. See Alberti's note, in loc., and Suicer s. v.

We pass over here a passage of Tertullian, till we have spoken of the use of the word by St. Paul, and shall next refer to a law in the Theodosian code, published in A.D. 382, as to the dress to be worn by senators and others. In this senators are forbidden to assume the warlike garb of the chlamys, but are ordered to wear the peaceful dress of colobium and paenula. It is added that officials "per quos statuta complentur ac necessaria peraguntur" are also to use the paenula. Penalties are provided in case of disobedience (Cod. Theodos. lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 1, where see Gothofredus's note).

3. Use of the word by St. Paul.—We must now consider the use of the word by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 13), "The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." The word here translated "cloke" by the E. V. is found variously spelt in the MSS. as φελώνης, φαιλώνης, φαιλώνης, and φελώνης, the first being undoubtedly the true reading. It will be observed that in all these cases the λ precedes the ν. The old Latin version (Sabatier, in loc.; cf. also Tertullian, de Orat. 15; de Cor. Mil. 8) and the Vulgate render the word by paenula, evidently thinking it the same word; but the Peshito translates it by ܩܠܒܐ (a case for books).^g

Again, Chrysostom (Hom. in loc.; vol. xi. p. 780, ed. Gaume) mentions this view, "by φελώνης here he means the outer garment (ἱμάτιον). But some think it means the case (γλωσσόκομον) where the books lay." Jerome, too (Epist. 36 ad Damasum, § 13, vol. i. 167), says, "volumen Hebraeum replico, quod Paulus φελώνην juxta quosdam vocat." It is impossible, however, to speak here with any great degree of certainty. The only independent evidence, apart, that is, from this passage, for the meaning of "case," is apparently that of the Greek lexicographers, but possibly these have only cited Chrysostom. Then, too, it may be said that the notion of the "case" may have been suggested merely by the context, still, it might have been thought, if the word were merely the name of a well-known garment, it would be a somewhat unlikely mistake for a translator to make. Further, the rendering of the Peshito is the more worthy of notice, seeing that in ecclesiastical Syriac the word "phaino" (ܩܠܒܐ) has been directly derived from the Greek as the name of the vestment.

If we assume that the apostle is using the word in the sense of a garment, then increased point will be given to the urgent wish (v. 21) that Timothy should come before winter, the aged apostle feeling the need of extra warm protection against the cold. Here the matter might have been allowed to rest, as one incapable of positive solution, seeing that there is much to be said for either view, were it not that some writers (Cardinal Bona [Rer. Liturg. i. 24-8] and others) have gravely argued that the apostle here desires Timothy to bring the chasuble he had left behind him. We have seen that there is a respectable amount of evidence for explaining the word as not meaning a garment at all, but, waiving this, positively the only direct evidence for the above theory is that this word in a modified spelling (φαινῶλιον, &c.) is the technical Greek word for a chasuble. Chrysostom, however, took it for an ordinary outer garment; and this is significant, when taken in connexion with the so-called Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, where the word φαινῶλιον occurs for the ecclesiastical vestment, shewing, as it does, that at the end of the 4th century the word had not been restricted into its special eucharistic meaning, otherwise St. Chrysostom would hardly have expressed himself as he does. Again, nearly two hundred years before the time of St. Chrysostom, we find Tertullian shewing very distinctly the views of his time (de Oratione, c. 15). He has been speaking of certain practices as belonging to superstition rather than to religion, and thus mentions that it was the custom of some to lay aside their paenula before engaging in prayer, as the heathen did in their idol temples. But for this there is no authority, "unless," he adds ironically, "anyone thinks that Paul, from having engaged in prayer at the house of Carpus, had thus left his paenula behind him. God, I suppose, does not hear men clad in a paenula. Who yet heard effectually the three saints in the furnace of the king of Babylon, as they prayed in their sarabarae and turbans." Tertullian here laughs at the idea of St. Paul's having taken off his paenula to pray. The notion of this garment having been one specially put on for the eucharistic service is evidently utterly foreign to the sense of the passage. The gist of Tertullian's remark is merely, "What a foolish notion it is of these people to think it unseemly to go to church in a paenula!" He could hardly have spoken in this way, had he thought, or had people generally in his time thought, that St. Paul's paenula was really a sacrificial vestment.^h It may be added here that in a commentary on the 2nd Epistle to Timothy appended to the works of Jerome, but apparently spurious, the theory is broached that this paenula was an offering from some convert, which was to be sold for the apostle's benefit (Comm. in loc. vol. xi. 429). This too is utterly foreign to any notion of a chasuble. Of course the spuriousness or genuineness of this document makes little matter to our present purpose, which is to show the general way in which the passage was anciently understood.

Again, as regards the identity of the term with the word in later Greek, this of itself will not count for much, when we consider of how many other vestments this might be said, ^g Another very important version, the Memphitic, is practically of no avail to us here, inasmuch as it merely reproduces the Greek word, and there is no independent evidence as to the sense in which it uses it.

^h It is amazing to find that Sala, the editor of Cardinal Bona, can gravely remark (vol. ii. 238, ed. Turin, 1749). "fuerunt itaque Tertulliani aevi qui Pauli penulam orationis vestem seu sacrificalem putarent." Comment on such perversity is superfluous.

where yet the use was certainly not identical, the word casula itself being a very marked instance; and further, it does not seem that there is a certain case of the use of the term in its technical sense before the time of Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople in the 8th century. In the absence of direct evidence for the early use of the word in its special sense, the testimony derivable from liturgies of uncertain date cannot, it is evident, be allowed to count for much. If, on so feeble a case as the above, some are disposed to believe that St. Paul refers to his chasuble, we must allow that their credulity has been developed at the expense of their judgment.

4. Ecclesiastical use of the word.—The name of the vestment appears in later Greek under various spellings, φανόλιον, φενόλιον, φενώλιον, φελόνιον, φελώνιον, φαιλώνιον, &c. From this has been formed, as we have already remarked, the ordinary Syriac term for the vestment, phaino. [We may take this opportunity of remarking that perhaps in Syriac too, as well as in Greek, the word was not strictly confined to its technical ecclesiastical sense. We find it in one of the poems of Ephraem Syrus, used metaphorically for the body, our 'mortal coil' wherewith we are clothed (Bickell, S. Ephraemi Carmina Nisibena, xxxv. 79). Here Hades is represented as saying of the Saviour, "as at the wedding feast He changed water into wine, so has He changed the garment of the dead (جَمَلٌ وَبَشَرٌ) into life." In Slavonic the Greek word occurs as pheloni. In the Arabic versions of the Coptic liturgies the name for this vestment is generally al-bornos, a word familiar to us from Eastern books of travels, and perhaps sometimes also tisam (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. Coll. i. 161, 162, ed. Francof. 1847), though the former word appears to be used sometimes in the sense of an alb, and the latter probably stands as a rule for something akin to an amice. In the Armenian church the eucharistic vestment now is to all intents and purposes a cope, save that it has no hood. Its native name is shoochar (Fortescue, Armenian Church, p. 134). The Armenians are attacked by Isaac, catholicos of Armenia in the 12th century, in the second of two bitter invectives, in that they do not use the φελώνιον, making no distinction of vestments in the Eucharist¹ (Orat. 2, § 25; Patrol. Gr. cxxxii. 1236).

We have previously remarked that there is no certain direct mention of the φενόλιον before the time of Germanus. We do not mean by this that there is no evidence for the use of this vestment in the Greek church before that time, for we shall presently mention some art-remains which figure it at a much earlier period, but that the literary notices are not trustworthy. Dr. Neale (l. c.) quotes in proof of its antiquity from the life of St. Marcian,¹ priest and oeconomus of the Great Church (Constantinople), who is said to have lived in the time of his namesake, emperor of Rome (ob. 457 A.D.), but he omits to state that this life is written by Symeon Metaphrastes (ob. after 975 A.D.). Again, Theophylact Simocatta, writing early in the 7th century, says (Hist. vii. 6; p. 280, ed. Bekker) that after the death of John, patriarch of Constantinople, they only found as his effects σκίμποδα ξόλινον και σισύραν εξ έριου ές τα μάλιστα εύτελή φαιλώνην τε άκαλλή. Considering the context here, it seems much more likely that the φαιλώνης was merely the patriarch's outdoor cloak.^k

We next refer to Germanus (appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 715 A.D.). He describes (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcvi. 394) the ungirdled phelonion as metaphorical of Christ bearing His cross. From a remark a few lines lower down, in which he compares it to the purple robe put on our Lord (εμφαινει την από κοκκίνου πορφύραν), we may infer that this was the colour of the vestment. A century later, Nicephorus (patriarch of Constantinople, 806–815 A.D., when he was deposed), when writing to pope Leo III., sends as a present a pectoral cross, a seamless white sticharion, and chestnut-coloured *phenolion*¹ (στιχάριον λευκόν και φανόλιον κάστανον έρραφα), and an epitrichelion and enchirion (Patrol. Gr. c. 200).

As regards early Eastern pictures of this dress (for the West is not now in question, for there the corresponding vestment appears first as planeta and then as casula), we may refer first to mosaics existing in the vault of the church of St. George at Thessalonica. These have been figured from coloured drawings taken on the spot, in Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture (reproduced in Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, plates xviii.–xxi.), who give arguments to show that the church was built by Constantine himself during his first stay at Thessalonica. In the first three of these, at any rate, the figures are clad in what seems to be a φανόλης of a reddish or purplish colour. One figure represents Philip, bishop and martyr, and another a presbyter Romanus, but there are also, with but slight differences of garb, the well-known brother physicians, SS. Cosmas and Damian, and Eucarpion, soldier and martyr. This fact has an important bearing on the question of the early use of a special eucharistic vestment in the East, if the garment afterwards specially used was in the 4th century worn by laymen. Among the surviving mosaics of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople are some believed to be of the 6th century representing 4th century bishops. These are clad in white sticharia and phenolia, with omophoria (Marriott, p. lxxv.). As an example of a different type, we may refer to an illustration figured by Assemani from a Syriac MS. of the Gospels dated 586 A.D. (Bibl. Med. plate iii., and cf. p. 2; reproduced by Marriott, plate xxviii.). This represents Eusebius of Caesarea and Ammonius of Alexandria, the former wearing a garment which may be a

The form said on the putting on of the phenolion before celebrating the Eucharist runs, in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, οἱ ἱερεῖς σου, Κύριε, ἐνδύσονται δικαιοσύνην, καὶ οἱ ὁσίοι σου ἀγαλλίσει ἀγαλλίσσονται, πάντοτε, νῦν . . . (Goar, Euchologion, p. 60). The word phenolion is also used in the Greek church as the name of the special vestment of a "reader," who, on being made a sub-deacon, has it replaced by the sticharion (ib. 236, 244.) A phenolion was also worn as a special privilege by the archdeacon of the clergy attached to the palace of Constantinople, on the Sunday of the Adoration of the Cross (see the article), but only on that one occasion (Codinus Cyropalata, c. 9).

5. Literature.—For the materials of the foregoing article, we are largely indebted to the various lexicons cited, especially Ducange, Glossarium Græcum, s. vv.; Suicer, Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus, and Forcellini. The examples in the last are given in chronological order by Marriott (Vestiarium Christianum, App. C). Reference may further be made to Hefele's learned and temperate essay, Die liturgischen Gewänder, in his Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archæologie und Liturgik, vol. ii. pp. 195, sqq. PAGANISM (IN CHRISTIAN ART). In a former article [Fresco] attention has been called to the intimate connexion between early Christian art and that of the pagan community in which the church arose, and from which its first members were gathered. It will be unnecessary to repeat what has been there said of the absence of any strict line of demarcation between the system of decoration adopted by the adherents of the new faith, and those to which they had been accustomed as members of a heathen society, and the rarity of anything in their earliest pictorial and sculptural representations distinctive of the religion they had embraced, which rendered primitive Christian art little more than the continuation of that which they found already existing, purified and elevated by the influences of their new faith.

In the same article reference has been made to the manner in which distinctly mythological personages were pressed into the service of the church, and a new spirit being breathed into old forms, objects, persons, and scenes, to which the mind was familiarised in connexion with pagan myths, were made the channels of conveying to the initiated the higher truths of which they became the symbols, and "all that was true and beautiful in the old legends found its fulfilment in Christ, and was but a symbol of His life and work."—(Farrar.)

It remains now briefly to shew how this principle was carried out in detail, and mythological types and classical forms were made the exponents of Christian doctrine.

We have at the outset to distinguish between (1) that class of subjects which contained a fundamental religious idea common to Paganism and Christianity, which, dimly shadowed forth in the one, received its full development in the other; and (2) those in which the resemblance is merely formal and external, the mythological representations supplying a vehicle for Christian ideas. To these we may add (3) the still more abundant class in which classical forms and ideas are used simply as ornamental accessories, without any symbolical reference.

I. The first class in which a subject from pagan mythology is used typically to depict some Christian truth is a very small one. The deep-seated foulness of the myths of classical antiquity, on which the early Christian writers were never weary of enlarging, caused a natural revulsion of the Christian mind from them, and rendered them, generally through their associations, quite unsuited for conveying sacred truths.

(1) The only subject borrowed from Pagan mythology which gained any general acceptance in Christian art, is that of Orpheus taming the wild animals by the notes of his lyre. Almost from the beginning, the power of Orpheus in subduing the ferocity of savage beasts and gathering them round him in mutual harmony, was regarded as typical of the all-conquering influence of Christ's Gospel in taming the fierce passions of the human heart, and uniting warring and discordant tribes in one common homage to their universally-acknowledged Master. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. p. 357, c. 14.) The myth of Orpheus was thus regarded as an adumbration of the words of Christ (John xii. 32), "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," and a parallel to the well-known prophecies of Isaiah, in which the same symbolism is adopted (Is. xi. 6–9, lxx. 25). In this reference the Orphic myth is not unfrequently alluded to by the writers of the early church (Clem. Alexandr. Cohort. ad Gentes, c. 1; Euseb. de Laud. Constant. c. xiv.; Greg. Nyss. in Hexæm. c. 7; Chrysost. Homil. xii. c. ii., Genes. Homil. xxiii. in c. vi.; Homil. xix. in c. ix.; Cassiod. in Ps. xix.; cf. Lactant. Inst. vii. 24). Orpheus is still more often alluded to by the Fathers, and the writings ascribed to him, in common with the Sibylline verses, quoted as affording testimony to the unity of God and other points of Christian truth (Theophil. Autol. iii. 2; Just. Mart. Cohort. ad Græc. c. 15, de Monarch. c. 2; Clem. Alexandr. Strom. v. 12, 14; Lactant. Instit. i. 5, 6; Aug. Contr. Faust. xiii. 15, &c.) We cannot, therefore, be surprised that he should become a favourite subject of early Christian art. The most remarkable representation of Orpheus is that from the ceiling of a cubiculum in the cemetery of St. Callistus, of which a woodcut is given, Vol. I. p. 696 (Bosio, p. 239; Bottari, ii. tav. lxiii.; Aringhi, i. 547; Garrucci, Pitture, tav. 25; Perret, i. pl. xxxiv. bis, p. 35). The subject occupies the central octagonal panel of the ceiling, the surrounding panels containing alternately landscapes and scenes from the Old and New Testaments. Orpheus displays the hieratic type of a young man in a high Phrygian bonnet, and loose frock, his legs clothed with ananyrides, embroidered with a chlumys. He sits among trees, holds his lyre in his left hand, and beats time with his right foot. A lion, tiger, horse, peacock, and other birds and beasts stand round him. An arcosolium from the same cemetery presents the same subject with very slight variations (Bosio, 255; Aringhi, i. 563; Bottari, ii. tav. lxx.; Garrucci, Pitture, tav. 30; Perret, vol. i. pl. xx. p. 30). The subject has been only once found in marble; on a sarcophagus discovered at Ostia, the corresponding panel containing Tobias, or a fisherman (Northcote, pl. xx.; Martigny, sup. voc. from Visconti). It occurs also on a lamp (Perret, vol. iv. pl. xvii. No. 1, p. 118), and on a gem given by Mamachi (Orig. iii. 81, note 2), from the Museo Vettori, and others specified by Piper (Mythologie und Symbolik. i. 123). No example of the subject is found in mosaic or in miniatures.

(2) The Sirens were introduced into Christian typology as emblems of temptations to sensual indulgence, to which the man of God, symbolised by Ulysses, was exposed as he traversed the waves of the troublesome world on his way to the shore of everlasting rest (Maxim. Turin. Homil. i. de pass. et cruce Domini; Hippolyt. Philosophum. viii. 1), and which he was enabled to overcome by the cross of Christ, as Ulysses fastened himself to the mast. One such representation only has come down to us, and that not certainly Christian. It is a fragment of a sarcophagus discovered by De Rossi in the cemetery of St. Callistus, assigned to the 3rd century, and described by him (Bulletino, 1863, p. 35; Roma Sott. i. tav. xxx. p. 5; Martigny, Dictionn. art. Ulysse; Northcote, pp. 232, 298). Ulysses sits weeping in his vessel with two companions. The three sirens stand around, in the form described by Isidore (Orig. xi. 3, 30), half woman, half bird, with wings and claws; one holding a lyre, one a flute, and the third singing from a roll of music. The cruciform arrangement of the monogram Tyranno suggests, but does not prove, the Christian origin of the sculpture.

(3) The Hermes Kriophorus of pagan art certainly supplied the original type of the Good Shepherd in its countless repetitions. [SHEPHERD, GOOD.] The syrtinx, or Pandean pipes, which is one of the most frequent accessories of the figure in Christian as in pagan art, was regarded as typifying the music of the Gospel, which recalls the wanderers and guides the sheep in the right way. (See the quotations given by Garrucci, Vetri, p. 63.) The face and form of the Good Shepherd, as of other representations of Christ, appear often to be borrowed from those of the young beardless Apollo (Piper, u. s. pp. 79, 100-105; Munter, Sinnbilder, i. 64, ii. 7; Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes, p. 161 ff.)

II. As examples of the second class of subjects where pagan mythology only supplies the form of the representation as a vehicle for Christian ideas, and the resemblance is external only, the most remarkable are Hercules carrying off the apples of the Hesperides, and the chariot of the Sun God, as respectively furnishing formal types of the Fall, and of the ascent of Elijah. The resemblance between the Hercules subject and its Christian correlative is too striking to allow any doubt that the one was borrowed from the other (Piper, i. 66 ff.). Another part of the same myth, Hercules feeding the fabled dragon with cakes of poppy-seed, appears to have furnished the motive for the representation of the apocryphal story of Daniel killing the dragon at Babylon (see woodcut, Vol. I. p. 579).

Equally marked is the resemblance between the fire-horsed chariot in which Elijah is represented ascending to heaven, and the ordinary representations of Apollo, or Phoebus, as the Sun God in his rising. In the absence of distinctive accessories it is hardly possible to determine which of the two subjects is intended. This difficulty is sometimes increased by the introduction of the Jordan as a river god, with his urn, in the Scriptural event (Piper, u. s. pp. 75-77). The correspondence of the two has also been confirmed by the accidental resemblance of the words Elias and Helios (ἥλιος). (Sedul. Carm. Pasch. lib. i. v. 184). This symbolical representation of the Jordan by a river god with his urn occurs also elsewhere. There are remarkable instances in the mosaics of the baptism of Christ in the baptisteries at Ravenna.

III. Little need be said upon the use of ornamental accessories, derived from heathen art, such as winged genii, victories, armed females, centaurs, caryatides, telamones, pegasi, hippocampi, and the like. It would be misapplied ingenuity to endeavour, as has been sometimes done, to affix an allegorical meaning to each of these objects, the introduction of which may be satisfactorily attributed to the fancy of the painter or sculptor, who being perhaps still a pagan, and certainly one who had learnt the principles and practice of his art in pagan schools, found it impossible to divest himself of its traditions, and satisfied both himself and his employers by discarding everything that was essentially profane, or which could give rise to an impure imagination. As Raoul-Rochette has remarked (Tableau, &c., p. 214), "it is no cause of surprise if in the design of these monuments, the thoughts of the early Christian artists went back to the traditions of paganism, so that in the execution of subjects drawn from Holy Scripture, their hand, by the blind force of habit, reproduced a large number of the details of profane art, especially in costume, furniture, ornament, and architecture, which were indifferent in themselves, and to which they had been so long accustomed." Thus, in the words of Kugler, "many modes of expression of an innocent nature belonging to ancient art, though closely associated with the old idolatry, long maintained their position for purposes of decoration," and that with so little individuality of character that in many cases by nothing but the occurrence in some part of the design of some decidedly Christian symbol, its non-pagan origin can be ascertained (Raoul-Rochette, Tableaux des Catacombes, pp. 120-122; Pelliccia de Christ. Eccl. Polit. tom. iii. pp. 230-234, ed. Neapol. 1779; Northcote, Rom. Sott. p. 196). There is not one of these decorative forms of such frequent occurrence in early Christian art as the vine, together with scenes connected with its cultivation, and the ingathering of the grapes. The examples are too common to particularize; but we may refer to the very lovely vine of the Callistine catacomb, "of an antique style of beauty" (Kugler) [of which there is a woodcut Fresco, Vol. I. p. 695]; and the vintage scenes from the baptistry of St. Costanza [MOSAICS, Vol. II. p. 1322]. In this we have an instance of the way in which a purely conventional mode of ornamentation was adopted by Christians, and clothed with a religious signification, full of spiritual teaching to the initiated, of Christ the "True Vine," and believers as fruitful "branches" in Him.

We have yet to speak of the cases in which direct pagan subjects occur, to which it is difficult if not impossible to assign any esoteric Christian meaning. The fact that these are found entirely on sarcophagi and gilded drinking glasses, never in mosaics or the wall-paintings of the catacombs, suggests the probable conclusion that the articles on which they occur are of heathen origin, and were used by Christians from the absence, in the early period of the church, of artists of their own faith capable of fabricating them. This must have been especially the case with sarcophagi. Those who needed them were compelled to resort to heathen sculptors' workshops, and to content themselves with selecting those which did the least violence to the new faith. In this way we may account for the occurrence of pagan sarcophagi in Christian burial-places. "We have abundant evidence," writes Professor Westwood (Parker, Archæology of Rome; Tombs, p. 39), "not only that pagan sarcophagi were used for the burial of Christians, but also that subjects of a pastoral or pagan character were adopted on the sarcophagi of the earlier Christians, to which symbolical meanings were attached, whereby in the minds of the uninitiated their Christian destination would never be suspected. In the words of Mabillon (Iter. Ital. § 10, p. 81), "Sic profanis tumulis Christiani non raro quasi propriis usi sunt." As examples, we may name one found in the cemetery of St. Agnes, bearing the epitaph of a Christian virgin named Aurelia Agapetilla, designated "ancilla Dei," which is ornamented with a figure of Bacchus, surrounded with naked Cupids, and the genii of the seasons (Boldetti, p. 466), and two given by Millin (Voyage au Midi de la France, iii. 156, 158, pl. xxvi. 4, xxxvii. 3), on one of which is carved the Forge of Vulcan. On another, given by Northcote (p. 261), Cupid and Psyche are represented side by side with a Good Shepherd, who is overturning a basket of fruit. The conversion of ancient carved marbles into articles for the use of the Christian church, such as fonts, holy water basins, alms-boxes, which at one time largely prevailed, has proved rather misleading from its having been supposed that their present use was necessarily contemporaneous with their first execution.

Some of the gilded glasses extracted from the catacombs bear scenes from pagan mythology, and the figures of heathen deities, Hercules, Minerva, Achilles, Serapis, &c. On others are depicted subjects which are incapable of a Christian interpretation, and which it is difficult to conceive could have been executed by a Christian artist. One, given by Perret (iv. pl. xxx. no. 82), represents a naked female waited on by winged genii, one of whom holds a mirror. Others have the genius of death winged, either leaning on an inverted torch (Garrucci, 201, 5; Buonarroti, xxviii. 2), or arrested in full career by the meta or goal, indicating the end of life (ibid.). The pronounced pagan character of these glasses renders it difficult to assign them a Christian origin, and though both Garrucci and Wiseman are of opinion that this art was confined to the Christians alone, they bring forward no grounds for this view, which is primâ facie improbable, such as to forbid us to regard them as the work of pagan artists for the use of their co-religionists.

The very curious wall-paintings of a decidedly pagan character, in the cemetery of Praetextatus, first published by Bottari (tom. ii. preface, p. v. pp. 192, 218) and given by Perret (vol. i. pl. lxx.-lxxiv.) and by Parker (Archæology of Rome. Catacombs), to which a Christian origin was assigned by Raoul-Rochette and other writers, are now proved to belong to one of the Gnostic sects. The sepulchral chamber they decorate is that of Vincentius, a priest of a deity named Sabasis or Sabasus, and his wife Vibia, whose death preceded his own. They embrace four scenes:—(1) Abreptio Vibies, the soul of Vibia carried off by Pluto in his quadriga, and the descensio, her descent to Hades. (2) Her judgment before the throne of Pluto (Dis pater), seated with his wife Abacura (âβὰ κοῦρη), the three Fates (Fata Divina). Vibia is introduced by Mercury, and accompanied by Alcestis. (3) Inductio Vibies, her introduction to the mystic banquet by the Angelus bonus, a youth crowned with flowers, and her taking her place with the other guests at a sigma-shaped table (Bonorum judicio judicati). (4) The funeral banquet given by Vincentius in her honour to the priests of Sebasius (septem pii sacerdotes). The pagan character of the whole is so pronounced that it is difficult to understand how these paintings could have been supposed to have a Christian origin.

PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF. Enquiry in connexion with this subject may be simplified by treating it under three heads: (I.) Paganism as a form of public worship supported, recognised, or tolerated by the civil power. (II.) As a popular belief existing in open contravention of state authority and in avowed antagonism to Christianity. (III.) As interwoven with the religion, discipline, and ceremonial of Christian communities, or discernible in their everyday life and practice. [For pagan influences on education, see SCHOOLS.]

Some of the principal facts relating to (I.) are given under IDOLATRY, but it will be of service here to pass under review, somewhat more generally, the influences that successively determined the relations of paganism to the ruling power under the empire—a part of the subject intimately connected with (II.) and (III.).

(I.) The earliest sentiments of paganism with respect to Christianity appear to have been those of indifferent tolerance. When, however, the true character of Christianity began to be better understood, as that of an avowedly aggressive and intolerant creed—aggressive, that is to say, in that all other beliefs were regarded by its followers as hostile, and intolerant in that it professedly aimed at the overthrow of all other religions—the attitude of the civil power altogether changed. [MARTYR.]

The conversion of Constantine and the edict of Milan (October 28, 313), extending state recognition to Christianity, materially modified all the pre-existing conditions of paganism, which from this time presents itself under a different aspect. A considerable difference is also now discernible in the conditions under which it continued to exist in the East and those which surrounded it in the West—a distinction of no little importance in the later history of paganism, and one to which we shall have occasion again to refer.

The edict of Milan* marks the inauguration of the principle of universal toleration; everyone was thereby permitted publicly to profess whatever religion he chose. It gave to the Christians and to all alike, "et Christianis et omnibus," full and open freedom, "potestatem liberam et apertam," "sequendi religionem quam quisque voluisset" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. x. 5). Constantine, though protecting Christianity, at the same time maintained the priests of the ancient religion in the enjoyment of their customary privileges (Cod. Theod. XII. i. 21, A.D. 335; XII. v. 2, A.D. 337; Haenel, 1204, 1278). When his palace was struck by lightning, he sent to consult the pagan augurs; he himself continued to be saluted by the title and represented in the attire of Pontifex Maximus (Mionnet, Médaill. romaines, ii. 236); and the statement of Zosimus (iv. 36), that the same honour was accepted by his successors until the time of Gratian, proves that the title still carried with it, in the eyes of many, a certain amount of prestige. Other facts point with equal force to the tenacity with which the forms and fashions of paganism continued to pervade official and ceremonial observance. A panegyric addressed to Constantine in the year 321, by Nazarius, is full of allusions to the pagan mythology. A law enacted in the same year, while condemning magical rites, nevertheless gives direct sanction to the use of charms and incantations against snow or hail (Cod. Theod. IX. xvi. 3; Haenel, p. 868). In the year 331, a date which has been assigned as marking the decisive overthrow of pagan worship (Beugnot, Hist. de la Destruction du Pag. i. 175), from the fact that it witnessed the almost complete destruction of the temples in Africa, we find Anicius Paulinus, the prefect of Rome, restoring the temple of Concord (Gruter, Insc. totius Orbis Romani, i. 100). Constantine, after his death, received the honours of apotheosis and the appellation of "Divus" (Eutropius, x. 10).

A politic regard for popular feeling, as associated with time-hallowed observances, appears to have led the civil authorities still to sanction or permit many of the traditional formalities and solemnities of paganism, but in the meantime public sentiment itself was undergoing a great change. Of this a remarkable proof is afforded in the fact that the tombs of the dead (which among purely pagan communities were always regarded with superstitious veneration and invested with a peculiar sanctity) now began to be frequently plundered and desecrated. The symbols and adornments of these structures, which reflected the ancient religious belief, appear to have excited at once the contempt and cupidity of the Christians, who converted the materials to the commonest uses, even carrying them away for building purposes. An edict of Constantius II. promulgated A.D. 340, enacts that those guilty of such sacrilege, without the cognisance of the proprietor, shall be condemned to work in the mines (Cod. Theod. IX. xvii. 1; Haenel, p. 874). A subsequent law prescribed the punishment of death; but in the year 349 (ib. IX. xvii. 2) this was mitigated to the imposition of a fine.

Legislation now appears as largely dictated by a twofold regard: (1) for the responsibilities involved in the profession of the Christian faith by the state, (2) for the feelings of the Christian majority among the people; while, on the other hand, there is ample evidence, especially in the West, that respect for the prejudices of what was still a powerful minority often caused successive enactments to remain almost a dead letter. It would accordingly appear probable that, for a lengthened period, repressive legislation was virtually inoperative. Thus, in the year 341, we find that pagan sacrifices were formally forbidden—"cesset superstitio, sacrificiorum aboleatur insania" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 2; Haenel, p. 1612). The proof, however, that such sacrifices were still publicly offered is so incontrovertible that Labastie conjectures that reference is here intended only to private sacrifices and the magical rites with which they were frequently associated. But such a hypothesis is rendered highly improbable by the language of an edict promulgated in 346, which, while directing that the temples without the city walls shall be permitted to remain uninjured, distinctly implies that those within the city precincts were marked out for destruction; and even the reservation in favour of the former is justified solely on the ground that the public games and Circenses had originated with the worship that was associated with certain temples, and that it was "not fitting that those should be overthrown from whence the Roman people derived the celebration of ancient festivities" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 2, 3; Haenel, p. 1612).

A similar difficulty attaches to two enactments, purporting to belong to the years 353 and 356, forbidding sacrifices of every kind under penalty of death; for here again Beugnot proves, from the evidence of inscriptions, that throughout the reign of Constantius II. the temples were open and sacrifices offered, not only in Rome, but throughout the Western empire. Of this contradiction, Beugnot can find no other explanation than that afforded by the supposition of Labastie, that the above laws, though probably drawn up during the reign of Constantius, remained unpromulgated, and, being subsequently found by Theodosius among the state papers, were inserted by him in the code with conjectural dates.

During the reigns of Julian (361–363), Jovian (363–364), and of Valentinian in the West (364–375), and Valens in the East (364–378), the state theory appears to have been that of general tolerance and strict impartiality with respect to religious belief (Gieseler, Kirchengeschichte, I. ii. 21, 22); but we have evidence that the imperial power still cherished a certain sympathy with many pagan practices [MAGIC, VI. 2). The coins and medals of the period bear the figures of many of the pagan deities, especially those of Egypt (Beugnot, i. 271, 272). It is stated by Anastasius Bibliothecarius that in the reign of Valentinian, an emperor whose Arian sympathies divided and weakened the Christian party, paganism assumed so aggressive a demeanour that the clergy were afraid to enter the churches or the public baths—"neque in ecclesias neque in balnea haberent introitum" (Vitae Rom. Pontif.; Migne, Patrol. cxxviii. 31). It is, however, not a little remarkable that an edict of the same emperor, of the year 368 (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 18) presents us, for the first time, with the term "pagani" as applied to the adherents of the old religion. At Rome, we have abundant evidence that this party was still powerful. Prudentius (cont. Symmach. i. v. 545) can congratulate only six families of senatorial rank on having embraced the new faith (the Anicii, the Probi, the Paulini, the Bassi, the Olybrii, and the Gracchi), and Augustine (Conf. viii. 2) distinctly implies that in the time of Simplicianus, the teacher of St. Ambrose, the majority of the Roman nobility were strongly opposed to Christianity. Even Gratian (367-383) appears to have proclaimed almost perfect liberty of conscience, except with regard to some minor sects, whose tenets were supposed to involve obligations incompatible with fidelity to the state (Soz. H. E. vii. 1; Migne, Series Graeca, lxxvii. 1418). But in the year 382 he ordered that the statue of Victory, "custos imperii virgo," should be removed from the Curia; he also forbade the offering of the "hostiae consultatoriae" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 7), and refused, for himself, the title of Pontifex Maximus. It is evident from the language of Zosimus (iv. 36) that this last act was interpreted by the pagan party itself as a formal renunciation of the ancient union between the supreme spiritual and the supreme temporal power, and as intimating the imperial repudiation of all claims of paganism on the latter.

The enactments of Theodosius (378-395) may be considered to mark the real commencement of the downfall of paganism, but their influence was still almost entirely limited to the East. The emperor had the sagacity to perceive how largely unity in religion might be made to conduce to the object towards which his whole policy was directed—the establishment of the unity of the empire. "We will," says the edict of April 27, 380, "that all the nations subject to our sway be of that religion which the divine apostle Peter (as the faith introduced by him and preserved to the present time declares) handed down to the Romans" (Cod. Theod. XVI. i. 2; Haelen, p. 1476). A law of the year 381 (ib. XVI. vii. 1) enacted that those who had relapsed into paganism should forfeit the right to dispose of their property by will; this enactment was confirmed two years later (ib. XVI. vii. 2); in the year 385 the inspection of entrails and all magical rites were forbidden under pain of death; a law of February 391, promulgated in the first instance at Milan, forbade sacrifice to idols, or even to enter the temples (ib. XVI. x. 10; Zosimus, IV. xxxiii. 8); while the same law, as promulgated at Constantinople in the November of the following year, visited such practices with the penalty of death (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 12; see also IDOLATRY). It is stated by Theodoret (Ecol. Hist. v. 20; Migne, Series Graeca, lxxii. 1055) that Theodosius also decreed the demolition of the temples, but no such law is extant, and the assertion must at least be looked upon as of doubtful authority. We have it, however, on the authority of Libanius that the prefect Cynegius was instructed to close the temples in Egypt, where both the Greek and the Egyptian worship still numbered many adherents (Orat. pro Templis, p. 194).

The distinction, above referred to, between East and West now becomes of primary importance. Generally speaking, the evidence would seem to shew that legislation which was severely enforced in the former division of the empire was practically inoperative in the latter. In the East, paganism, being unidentified with any political party, and possessing no influence over the executive power, was incapable of any organised resistance. Instances, indeed, are to be found, even so late as the 5th century, of pagans occupying posts of high office—as, for example, that of Optatus, who was prefect of Constantinople in the year 404 (Socrates, H. E. vi. 18; Migne, Series Graeca, lxxvii. 337); but these are of rare occurrence, and whatever influence the pagan party still possessed was mainly limited to the schools. Hence, even so early as the commencement of the 4th century, Lucian, the celebrated teacher of Antioch, who suffered martyrdom under Maximin, affirms that "whole cities and the greater part of the world" are already of the Christian faith (Milman, Hist. of Chr. ii. 276), a statement which, the evidence already adduced shews, could have been even approximately true only with reference to the Eastern provinces. In the West, on the other hand, and especially in Rome, where the hereditary dignities and offices, and the whole historical associations of the city, were closely interwoven with the ancient religion, paganism maintained its ground with remarkable tenacity. Theodosius himself evidently recognized this broad distinction; for though he is accused by Zosimus (v. 38) of persecuting the ancient ritual, he neither closed the temples nor proscribed the pontiffs in the West. Finlay (Greeks under the Empire, p. 160) considers that the attachment of the Roman aristocracy to paganism proved the ruin of the Latin provinces; while those of the East were saved by the unity of their religious faith.

At the commencement of the reign of Honorius (395-423), temples to Jupiter, Mercury, Saturn, the Mater Deum, Apollo, Diana, Minerva, Spes and Fortuna, and Concord, were still standing in Rome, and many of the old religious ceremonies and festivals continued to be observed. An edict of the year 399, promulgated at Ravenna, while forbidding the pagan worship, prohibited the destruction of the temples; it was the imperial pleasure, it stated, that edifices which gave so much adornment to the public thoroughfares should be preserved—"publicorum operum ornamenta servari" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 15).

It is not accordingly until the year 408 that paganism can be regarded as having been rigorously suppressed in the West. In the December of that year an edict of Honorius, addressed to Curtius, prefect of Italy, forbade all payments ("annonae") to the maintenance of the ancient worship, enjoined that all images in the temples, if any still remained, should be removed, and that the temples themselves should be converted to secular uses and the altars destroyed (ib. XVI. x. 20).

In Africa this legislation appears to have been put in force with exceptional severity, and three out of the five edicts directed in the reign of Honorius against paganism relate to that province. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xviii. 54) testifies to the actual execution, by the imperial officers, Gaudentius and Jovius, of these enactments: pagan priests who had failed to quit Carthage by a certain day, were compelled to retire to their native towns or villages, and all property devoted to the support of the pagan worship was confiscated.

The testimony of contemporary writers to the general overthrow of paganism now becomes explicit and unanimous. Zeno, bishop of Verona towards the close of the 4th century, speaks of "nearly the whole world" as already Christian (ad Cor. I. vii. 29; Migne, xi. 304); Jerome, writing a few years later (A.D. 403), says "the golden Capitol is dishonoured; all the temples of Rome stand begrimed with smoke and covered with cobwebs; the city is stirred to its foundations, and the populace stream past the half-demolished shrines on their way to the tombs of the martyrs" (Epist. cvii.). Augustine, in Africa, declares that God has willed the overthrow of Gentile superstition, and that He has already to a great extent completed His purpose. "Ye behold," he says, in one of his epistles, "the temples, some fallen into ruin, some overthrown, some closed, some converted to other uses; and the idols themselves broken, burnt, shut up from view, or actually destroyed" (Epist. ccxxxii.). The language of Theodoretus in the East is still more emphatic; he avers, with something of Oriental exaggeration, that the temples had been so utterly destroyed, that their very fashion had faded from memory, and men no longer knew how to construct an altar, while their materials had been consecrated by being used for the tombs of the martyrs (Sermo de Martyr.; Migne, Series Graeca, lxxxiii. 1034). An edict of Theodosius II. of the year 423, assumes that paganism is virtually extinct—"paganos qui supersunt, quancumque jam nullo esse credamus, promulgatarum legum jamdudum praescripta compescant" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 22); but the appearance of subsequent repressive enactments, e.g. one of the year 425 (Append. to Cod. Theod. p. 17), forbidding that pagans should practise at the bar, exercise military functions, or own Christian slaves, proves that the exceptions were still numerous.

Even after this time not a few traces of pagan practices are discernible in a form that directly challenged the attention of the state, and are perhaps to be explained as existing by sufferance, the Christian legislator deeming that concessions like these might be made to the prejudices of the vanquished party without detriment to the security of the true faith. Instances of this kind are the public festivals and rejoicings on the kalends of January, practices especially condemned by Maximus of Turin, and by Chrysoloras, bishop of Ravenna in 430. The former expressly complains, that though Christian rulers enacted salutary laws for the protection of religion, the magistrates gave themselves no trouble to see that these laws were carried out (Migne, Patrol. lvii. 610). The watching of the flight of birds, and the shaking of the lots in the urn at the election of consuls, were still practised under Valentinian III.; and even so late as the reign of Anthemius (A.D. 467–472) representations of pagan deities appear on the coinage of the empire (Vaillant, Numismata Imp. Romanorum, iii. 629).

An edict of Theodoric, of the year 500 (Lindenberg, Cod. Leg. Ant. p. 255), directing that all persons found sacrificing according to the rites of paganism shall be put to death, marks the culminating point of repressive legislation in the West; although, when taken in conjunction with undeniable evidence of the continued existence of paganism, even this enactment is regarded by Beugnot as a menace, rather than designed to be really carried into execution; and he adduces in support of this view the complete absence of any trace of judicial proceedings in Italy against the supporters of the ancient religion (Hist. de la Destruct. de Paganisme, ii. 282).

On the whole, the commencement of the 6th century must be looked upon as the period when the severance between the civil power in the empire and the pagan faith was first really carried into complete effect, and the closing of the schools of Athens by Justinian, in the year 529, marks the formal repression of the old philosophy, between which and Christian doctrine it had at one time seemed possible that a reconciliation might be effected. The destruction at nearly the same time of a temple to Apollo that had long stood on Monte Cassino, to make way for St. Benedict's celebrated monastery, typifies a corresponding revolution in the religious life.

II. The survival of paganism as a popular belief, in open contravention of state authority and in avowed antagonism to Christianity.—This, again, requires to be distinguished according as it presents itself (i) as a survival of the ancient Greek or Roman mythology; (ii) as the religion of Teutonic or other barbarous nations.

(i) Paganism being, as the word denotes, the faith of the villager, its later history is to be traced almost exclusively in districts comparatively isolated from intercourse with the great centres of civilisation. The force of the term is illustrated by the observation of Orosius, that "as aliens from the city of God, living near cross roads and villages in country districts, they are called villagers or gentiles"—"qui alieni a civitate Dei ex locorum agrestium comitis et pagis pagani vocantur sive gentiles" (Migne, xxxi. 3). Similarly Prudentius (contra Symmachum, iv. 620) speaks of the defenders of the ancient faith as "pago implicitos." Of its persistence and reappearance in such localities, long after the civil power had pronounced it extinct, we have frequent, and often startling, evidence. The triumph of Christianity was very far from being a continuously progressive overthrow of the old superstitions. Not to advert to those cases in which the new faith itself became altogether extinct, as in Africa before the advance of Mahometanism, there are not a few instances of its temporary disappearance in comparatively limited districts, through the relapse of the population into paganism. Generally speaking the following conclusions are probably sound: (1) That where a break in the recorded episcopal succession presents itself, paganism regained the ascendancy during the period represented by this vacancy. "If," says Gregory of Tours, when referring to the succession in his own diocese, "any one should inquire why only one bishop, namely, Litorius, is to be found in the period extending from the death of bishop Gatianus to St. Martin, let him know that, owing to the resistance of the pagans, the city of Tours was long deprived of all priestly benediction" (Hist. Fr. i. 43). (2) That where, in the history of a community or of a city, we find no trace of a bishopric or of a monastery, paganism probably continued to hold its ground.

The language of St. Augustine, who speaks of the faith as "toto terrarum orbe diffusa, exceptis Romanis et adhuc paucis Occidentibus," points to a distinction which may be regarded as valid during the greater part of our period. In the 6th century the pagan party in the East (the παῖδες Ἑλλήνων, as they were termed) became subject to persecutions scarcely less cruel than those which the Christians encountered under Diocletian. John Malalas [Chronographia; Migne (S. G.), xcvi. 449] states that in the year 561 there was a great persecution (διωγμός Ἑλλήνων μέγας), and that the property of many adherents of paganism was confiscated; while a decree forbade them to exercise their political rights as citizens. He also tells how certain gamblers (τινες τῶν κοπιιστῶν) who had been guilty of blasphemy (βλασφημίας δεινὰς ἑαυτοὺς περιβαλόντες) were sentenced to have their hands and feet cut off, and in this state were paraded naked on camels through the streets of Constantinople, while their books and the images of their gods were burnt at the Cynegium.

In the Italian prefecture, on the other hand, where the presence of the barbarian conqueror (still either pagan or Arian) secured for the Roman paganism a certain toleration, the ancient religion was long cherished and its rites practised. At Rome it found support in the political traditions and associations of the aristocratic party, and in the rural districts of Italy was protected by a genuine, though bigoted, devotion to the national worship. Even Christian historians admit that in these latter regions idolatry still reigned in the 4th century, and that the work of evangelization was attended with considerable peril. In the mountainous districts of the north, Saturn and Diana continued to receive the homage of the peasantry, and the first preachers of Christianity encountered a martyr's fate (Beugnot, i. 284). The inhabitants of the valleys of Piedmont stubbornly defended the faith of their ancestors; Valens and Valentinian were saluted by the Venetians as the "divini patres" (Muratori, i. 264, no. 4). At Turin and Bressello, statues were erected to Julian (Marmora Taurinen. i. 249). At Milan, where the influence of St. Ambrose was paramount paganism almost disappeared; but a tractate of Maximus of Turin (Migne, Patrol. lvii. 721), written nearly half a century later, "Contra Paganos," proves the extent to which it prevailed in the surrounding districts. Etruria, which Christian historians have represented as completely converted during the reign of Constantine, appears by the testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (b. xxvii. c. 3) and that of Zosimus (v. xli.) to have been a stronghold of the art of divination in their time, and to have supplied all Italy with diviners. At Florence, distinguished by its worship of Mars, a tradition prevailed that if the statue of that deity were dishonoured evil would befall the city (Villani, i. lx.); and, out of deference to superstitious feeling, the statue was placed on the bank of the Arno, where it long continued to receive the homage of the citizens. At Volaterra the pagan worship, protected by the powerful family of the Caecinae, maintained its ground, and was professed with impunity (Rutilius Numat. i. v. 453). In the central portion of the peninsula, the evidence of inscriptions and of pagan writers reveals the existence of the pagan element at Sestinum, Rimini, Spoleto, Alba, Ostia, Praeneste, &c. (Symmachus, Epist. i. 43; Ammian. Marc. b. xix. c. 10; Macrobius, Sat. i. 23). The south, owing in a great measure to the inaccessible nature of the country, long remained pagan. Naples was distinguished by its adherence to the national faith (Benevent. Ant. Thes. i. 118). The insularity of Sicily exercised a similar influence, and inscriptions at Drepanum and Marsala shew that these cities were still unchristianized so late as the reign of Valens and Valentinian (Siciliæ Inscript. Collect. pp. 27, 36). Beugnot (i. 289) considers that paganism continued to be dominant in the island until supplanted towards the end of the 5th century by the worship of the Virgin, which, after the third general council at Ephesus, was largely introduced (Cronologia univ. della Sicilia, p. 601).

The islands of the Western Mediterranean long remained altogether pagan. Rutilius (i. v. 375) speaks of the worship of Osiris as prevailing in Elba, while that of Hercules appears to have predominated in Sardinia (Graevius, Thesaur. xv. 58).

In the province of Africa, where the intimate relations with Rome gave rise to a similar state of religious feeling, a spirit of indifference seems long to have tolerated the ancient worship of the country. The deities to whom special reverence was paid were the Tyrian god, Melcarth (identified by some writers with the Libyan Hercules), together with Saturn and Celeste. Salvian (de Gub. Dei, Migne, liii. 178) represents even Christians of his time as uniting with pagans in ceremonies instituted in honour of this goddess. In Mauritania and Numidia, we meet with other names, probably those of the legendary heroes of the country. At Utica, Apollo; at Carthage, Ceres and Proserpine, were principally worshipped. But the most noticeable feature of these provinces, and one which long survived the open worship of pagan deities, was the devotion of the people to superstitious arts, such as magic, sortilege, augury, &c. At the same time paganism itself exhibited a bold front—a fact partly attributable to intercourse with Rome, partly to the Donatist schism, whereby the influence of the Christian party was seriously impaired. The spirit of the Donatists is illustrated by their admiration of the character and policy of Julian, who, they asserted, was the only emperor who had exhibited the impartiality that became the civil power (August. cont. Epist. Parm. i. 12; Migne, xliii. 47). But even so late as the year 408, we find the pagan party at Calama, in Numidia, celebrating the kalends of June, "contra recentissimas leges;" "tam insolenti usu," says Augustine, "ut quod nec Juliani temporibus factum est." They finally betook themselves to plundering a neighbouring church, and murdered a monk—conduct which Augustine admits appeared to have the secret sympathy of the principal inhabitants of the place (Epist. 91; Migne, xxxiii. 316-7).

In Spain the resistance to Christianity appears to have been feeble. The absence of a distinct national religion probably favoured the introduction of the new faith, the previously existing worship having included the deities of different lands, the gods of the capitol together with those of Phoenicia, Greece, and Carthage. We find, however, evidence of a strong Roman element.^b From the reign of Constantine to that of Valentinian, the list of the magistrates of the province is noticeable, as presenting us with the names of families distinguished by their adherence to paganism (Masden, v. 507). St. Pacian, bishop of Barcelona, who died towards the end of the 4th century, declares that many of the inhabitants of his diocese are still given to idolatry (Migne, xiii. 1084); and Macrobius speaks of the Occitani, a people near Cadiz, as worshipping in the same century, "cum maxima religione," a statue of Mars, whom they adored under the name of Ne-ton (i. ix.). Beugnot, who differs from Masden and Milman on this question, considers the early conversion of the province to have been little more than nominal, and calls attention to the articles of the council of Elvira as indicating the existence of many pagan usages and, at best, but a very impure form of Christianity (i. 313-4).

In the Gauls, the language of St. Jerome, "Gallia monstra non habuit," implying the absence of idolatry, must be understood as applicable only to the southern portion of Transalpine Gaul; and even in this region, where Roman institutions and Roman civilization long held their ground after they had been overthrown on the parent soil, the ancient faith was cherished with remarkable tenacity. In Brittany, the place of these traditions was supplied by Druidism, and in the north-east by Teutonic paganism. St. Martin, in the 4th century, appears to have been the first whose efforts at evangelization were crowned by any substantial success. "Before his arrival," says Sulpicius Severus, "none, or scarcely any, worshipped the true God; where he overthrew temples, he immediately erected monasteries or churches" (Migne, Patrol. xv. 167). Gregory of Tours, in his life of Simplicius, bishop of Autun, narrates how the worship of Cybele still reigned in the bishop's diocese, and that it was customary to carry her statue round the fields and vineyards in order to render them productive. In the north, his friend Wulfiliach describes the destruction of a statue of Diana, worshipped by the inhabitants of Trèves, in the last quarter of the 6th century (Hist. Franc. viii. xv.); and St. Kilian, in the year 689, found that at the court of Dagobert II., king of East Francia, the same golden image, "in summa veneratione habebatur" (Act. SS. Boll. Juill. p. 616). Mercury was an object of special veneration in Elsass (Mone, ii. 343). Temples to Jupiter, Mercury, and Apollo existed at Rouen in the 7th century, and were still visited by worshippers (Martène, Thes. Nov. iii. 1656, b.). The conversion of the Franks to Christianity was a far more gradual process than the example of Clovis may appear to suggest. The superstitions of the nation were widely spread by them in Gaul, and a kind of fusion seems to have taken place between the religion of the conqueror and that of the conquered. Beugnot considers that in no part of Europe were idolatrous rites and practices more prevalent subsequent to the introduction and partial acceptance of Christianity. Hinemar (ad Episc. de Jure Metrop. Migne, cxxvi. 200) states that in the time of Charles Martel the Christian faith had almost died out, both in Austrasia and Neustria, large numbers of the eastern Franks never having received baptism. The worship of the Teutonic gods was maintained under the names of Greek or Roman divinities; Odin became Mercury; Thor, Jupiter; Frigga, Venus. To this practice we may attribute the singular error of Gregory of Tours, who represents Clotilda, when endeavouring to convert Clovis, as referring to the objects of her husband's worship under the names of the deities of the Greek mythology. In the year 743, the council of Lestines, in condemning many pagan superstitions still rife, refers to "sacra Jovis et Mercurii" (Mansi, xii. 385); but here the design appears to have been simply to denote, under classical names, the Teutonic deities, for a form of abjuration drawn up for the people in the vernacular substitutes the names "Thunaer ende Uuoden."

In England, where Celtic Christianity was driven, with the native population, into Wales, the different kingdoms were indebted for their evangelization each to a different source; and the work of conversion to even nominal Christianity was not completed until nearly a century from the time of the landing of Augustine. Kent and Essex relapsed into paganism. Mercia, under Penda, remained pagan until 633. Bede states that up to the time of Wilfrid's mission in 681, "all in the province of the South Saxons were strangers to the name and faith of God" (Ecccl. Hist. iv. 12).

It is observed by Mone (Gesch. des Heidenthums, ii. 51) that it was the policy of the evangelizers of northern Europe to choose, as a centre of their operations, districts where the worship of the pagan gods was maintained with greatest vigour; a policy imitated by Charles the Great in relation to the Saxons. The see of Paderborn, like Boniface's monastery at Fulda, was erected among an almost entirely heathen population. The provisions of the Capitulary of Paderborn, A.D. 785 (de Partibus Saxoniae), bear witness to this fact; and it is inferred by Beugnot that the stringent character of these enactments, when compared with the milder legislation relating to similar superstitions in Gaul, proves the more stubborn adherence of the Saxons to their national faith. It may be observed that these provisions were again promulgated as late as the year 1035, by Conrad II. against the pagan practices of the Wends.

III. Paganism (i) as interwoven with the religious rites, discipline, and ceremonial of Christianity; or (ii) as discernible in the every day life and practices of professedly Christian communities.

This part of the subject belongs mainly to the period distinguished by Beugnot as the third and concluding stage of the fall of paganism in the West, commencing with the reign of Valentinian III. and terminating with that of Charles the Great. After the fall of Rome before Alaric, in 410, the attitude of the state in relation to paganism was little altered; but great concessions appear to have been made by the church with the design of facilitating the work of conversion. The policy which dictated these concessions may be referred to a threefold sentiment:—(1) the desire to mitigate the resentment of those who asserted that the fall of Rome was attributable to the neglect of the worship of her ancient gods; (2) to a sense of the common danger to Christianity and pagan civilization alike, presented in the triumph of the barbaric invader; (3) to a belief in the approaching end of the world—an event which, as we learn from Tertullian (Apol. 42) and other writers, was believed by the Christians themselves to be destined to follow on the fall of Rome, and which rendered them doubly anxious to waive such points of difference as, although of small doctrinal importance, still constituted serious obstacles to pagan conversion.

(i) The observation of Chrysostom, that the devil, "finding himself unable to win the Christians to idolatry, took a round-about way to seduce them," points to the existence of many pagan practices among Christians even in that father's time; but a large number of usages in the ritual and observances of the church cannot be traced farther back than the 5th century. The language of some of the fathers seems, it is true, often to imply a spirit of unsparing extermination; but it is certain that a much larger amount of compromise actually prevailed than theory countenanced. Among the Teutonic nations especially, there was a disposition on the part of the earliest evangelisers to be satisfied—at least in the first instance—with a series of conversions little more genuine than those effected in India and Ceylon in the 15th century by Francis Xavier and the Jesuits; and even where more real results were gained, it was often found expedient to leave many distinctly pagan usages unchallenged for a time. It is perhaps in harmony with the distinction above indicated, as observable in the Christian policy prior and subsequent to A.D. 410, that the line of conduct authorised by Gregory the Great in his instructions to Mellitus [IDOLATRY, p. 811], and that recommended by bishop Daniel to Boniface in Frankland (Epist. xiv.; Migne, lxxxix.

707–710), is in strong contrast to that already referred to as pursued by St. Martin in Gaul. Heathen temples with their surrounding precincts were often permitted to stand uninjured, the idols being removed, and the buildings consecrated to Christian uses; while minor observances were suffered, either by connivance or tacit assent, to continue, which, with the lapse of time, were regarded as having gained the direct sanction of the church.

Among the Latin races, the worship of Mithra, the Sun-god, appears to have survived that of nearly all the other gods of the Roman mythology. M. Gaston Boissier (La Religion romaine, ii. 417) considers that, at the time of the fall of the empire, paganism, as it existed in Italy, recognised scarcely any other deity. Pope Leo the Great states that many Christians in his time adored the rising sun from lofty heights, "partim vitio ignorantiae, partim paganitatis spiritu;" and that some Christians did this under so mistaken a notion of religion, that even when ascending the steps of St. Peter's at Rome they were wont to turn and make their obeisance to the sun (Migne, Patrol. liv. 94). Maximus of Turin reproaches those whom he addresses with culpable indifference to idolatry as practised by others. He says that if their attention were drawn to an idol, they would say it was no concern of theirs, "causa mea non est, non me tangit" (Migne, lvii. 610). Pope Gregory, writing to queen Brunehaut, urges her to put a stop to idolatry and the worship of trees; for he hears, he says, that Christians who go to church still worship daemons (ibid. lxxvii. 939). Agila, ambassador from the Gothic monarch Leuvichildus to king Chilperic, informed Gregory of Tours that his people held the worship of idols to be perfectly compatible with that of the God of the Christians (Hist. Franc. v. 44; Migne, lxxi. 256). Grimm indeed observes that both among the Anglo-Saxons and the Northmen the same idea prevailed (Deutsche Mythol. p. 7); and Bede (Hist. Ecol. ii. 15) states that Redwald, king of East Anglia, had in the same temple an altar on which to offer Christian sacrifice, and another, a smaller one, on which to offer victims to devils. The canon of the council of Elvira (A.D. 325) forbidding all who have received baptism, and are of years of discretion, to enter a temple in order to participate in idolatrous worship, under penalty of being refused the sacrament of communion at death, is, however, sufficient proof that the action of the church was very early directed against such gross misconceptions, which appear to have been, for the most part, confined to semi-barbarous nations.

A more interesting and instructive inquiry is that which relates to those pagan elements which became permanently interwoven with Christian belief and practice, and were even defended by many of the great teachers of the church. The controversy between Jerome and Vigilantius, and that between Augustine and the Manichaeans Faustus, offer valuable illustration of this portion of the subject. Vigilantius attacked the adoration of saints, the veneration paid to martyrs and their relics, and the custom of placing lamps before their shrines. Faustus declared that the Christians had really in no way abandoned the pagan mode of life. They had merely substituted their Agapae for the Pagan sacrifices; their martyrs for idols; they still appeared the shades of the dead with wine and meat offerings, and celebrated along with the pagans the ancient festal days—the Kalends and the Solstitiae. It appears unquestionable that both Jerome and Augustine admitted the pagan origin of these customs, but maintained their utility, and especially vindicated their retention on the ground of expediency; but both Augustine and Theodoret disclaimed the notion that it was the design of the church in any way to deify the martyrs, whom it honoured and revered solely as instruments of the divine power. (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. xi.; bk. iv. c. ii.; Neander, Church History (in Clark's series), iii. 452–3; Gieseler, Kirchen-gesch. (ed. 1845), i. ii. 333–5.)

It is the opinion of Baur (Kirchengesch. i. 526–7) that the veneration of martyrs and their relics (from whence he derives the invocation of saints) is to be traced to the hero-worship of pre-Christian times; Neander, on the other hand, claims for the celebration of the memory of the great lights of the church “a purely Christian root,” but holds that it received a different character by becoming “estranged and diverted from the original Christian spirit” (u. s. iii. 448). The earliest instance of the practice is probably the celebration of the anniversary of Polycarp's passion at Smyrna (Ruinart, Act. sinc. Martyr. pp. 35, 43). The dove which, it was said, had been seen to rise from the martyr's body is compared by Baur to the mounting eagle which proclaimed the apotheosis of the Roman emperors. Tertullian (de Cor. c. 3) speaks of “oblationes pro defunctis, pro nataliciis ‘annua die;’” and Cyprian (Ep. 34) of the “martyrum passiones” and their “anniversaria commemoratio.” See, on the whole subject, MARTYR, p. 1127; PATRON SAINT; RELICS.

The worship of Mary, as practised by the Collyridians, is looked upon by Neander (u. s. iii. 458) as directly traceable to that of Ceres. This sect, which was represented by a number of women who emigrated from Thrace and settled in Arabia, were wont, on a certain day, to carry about in cars (δῆφροι), similar to those used in pagan processions, cakes or wafers consecrated to the Virgin, which they first presented as offerings, and subsequently ate. This practice Neander derives from the customary cake-offerings at the heathen feast of the harvest, the Θεσμοφόρεια.

Direct participation in pagan festivals seems to have been not uncommon under the pretext of a semi-religious observance, though frequently condemned by the Fathers. “I have,” says St. Ambrose, “a grave complaint against you, brethren. I speak of those who, though celebrants along with us of Christ's birth, join in the festivals of the Gentiles; and, after that heavenly banquet, have prepared for themselves a feast of superstition. . . . He who seeks to share in divine things must not associate with idols.” (Serm. vii.; Migne, xvii. 399). Augustine, when reproving the Christians of Carthage for joining in like festivals, represents the pagan party as asking, “Why should we abandon our gods whom the Christians worship as well as ourselves?” (Opera, ed. 1577, x. 9 b). A discourse of Petrus Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna in the year 430, implies that participants in these festivals sometimes endeavoured to exculpate themselves by denying the affinities of such celebrations to pagan practices. They pleaded that their observance of the Kalends, for instance, was “a new mode of rejoicing, not an ancient error,” “novitatis laetitia non vetustatis error,” and that it was “anni principium, non gentilitatis offensa” (Hom. 155; Migne, lii. 611). Pope Gelasius, towards the close of the 5th century, expressly stigmatised this combination of Christian and pagan customs as “adulterous,” and, in condemning all participation in the Lupercalia, seriously remonstrates with those who imagine that such observances are of any real efficacy in securing the favour of the gods (Baronius, Annal. vi. 522). The change of the commencement of the year from January to Easter is asserted by Beugnot to have been the result of the church's desire to break with such pagan traditions. In the year 567, at the second council of Tours, it was forbidden to celebrate the Kalends, the Ferialia, or the Terminalia (Mansi, ix. 865; Hefele, iii. 27). But even so late as the 9th century, Rabanus Maurus, who speaks of Christianity as covering the whole earth, “in toto orbe dilatata” (Opera, vi. 172), asks in a homily “Contra Paganicos Errores,” how they can hope to rejoice at the eternal banquet of the saints, who do not here loathe the unlawful feasts of the pagans? How shall they sing with angels the praises of God in eternal light who here keep evil sport (“funestos ludos”) in honour of idols? (ibid. v. 606). Modern fairs and feasts (“feriae” and “festa”) bear witness to the tenacity of these traditions.

In Christian ritual itself not a few observances have been referred with considerable probability to a pagan origin. The custom of facing the east in worship, derived in the first instance from Persian notions of sun worship (see supra 1542), appears to have been borrowed from Greek and Roman practice (Aeschylus, Agamemnon, 502; Vergil, Aeneid. viii. 68; Ovid, Fasti, iv. 777; with Mr. Paley's note). The “ter injectus pulvis” has passed into the Christian burial service; while the letters D. M. on the tombs of the early Christians point to the tenacity of pagan traditions in connexion with the state of the departed (Northcote and Brownlow, Roma Sotterranea, p. 26). Lacerda, in commenting on the line, “Spargens rore levi et ramo felicis olivae” (Verg. Aeneid. vi. 230) considers that the act therein denoted represents the origin of sprinkling with holy water, a practice which Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 62; Migne (S. G.), vi. 80) declares to have been introduced, at the instigation of daemons, into the Christian ritual in imitation of the true baptism proclaimed by the prophets. “Epitaphia,” or funeral orations over the dead, such as we frequently meet with in the writings of the Fathers, are distinctly traceable to pagan precedent. [FUNERAL SERMONS.]

Among those observances which distinguish Roman Catholic ritual from Lutheran or Protestant, a large number are undoubtedly of pagan origin—a connexion which Conyers Middleton's celebrated Letter from Rome was especially designed to point out. The use of incense is condemned by Tertullian and other early writers as a pagan practice [INCENSE]. We learn from different writers (Origen, cont. Cels. viii. 17; Min. Felix, Octav. c. 10; Arnobius, bk. vi.) that the absence of images in their churches was made a reproach by paganism against the Christians, and Augustine expressly states that the introduction of these visible objects of adoration was regarded as unlawful in his day, and speaks of the adoration paid to them as a kind of insanity (ad Ps. cxiii.; Migne, xxxvii. 1183-1185). The earliest mention of pictures in churches has reference to the 4th century, and their introduction is expressly forbidden by the 38th canon of the council of Elvira, A.D. 324. Epiphanius, in the same century, tells us (ap. Jerome, Epist. 51; Migne, Patrol. xxii. 253) that he felt it to be his duty to destroy a hanging "velum tinctum atque depictum," which he found suspended in a church in Palestine, representing Christ or one of the saints. Theodoretus Cyrensis (Graec. Affect. Curatio, Migne (S. G.), lxxxiii. 922) refers with express approval to the practice, prevalent in his day, of suspending votive offerings (ἀναθήματα) in the churches over the tombs of the martyrs, on escape from danger or recovery from sickness; similarly, those who were childless presented such offerings in the hope of being blessed with offspring; those already parents, to secure the divine blessing on their children.

The little chapels with images of the Virgin that so frequently meet the eye of the tourist in Southern Germany or Italy cannot but recall to recollection the "Compitales" or deities who presided over cross-roads, and whose statues and shrines adorned the points of junction. The asylum afforded by pagan temples to fugitives from justice or from their foes offers perhaps too vague and general a resemblance to the right of sanctuary to be regarded as necessarily the origin of the latter, which may with equal or greater probability be referred to Jewish precedents.

(ii) Among the vestiges of pagan belief discernible in the everyday life and practice of Christian communities may be included many observances of a harmless character and little moral significance. The Roman custom of presenting gifts at the commencement of the new year is still observed, and the expression of good wishes on the same occasion is alike a pagan and a Christian usage (Ovid, Fasti, i. 175). The use of bridecakes at weddings (the Roman confarreatio), the palatine bay and oak on our coinage, the names of the months, which even the decree of Charles the Great could not permanently alter, all distinctly recall a like origin.

Of such customs, one, the "strenae" (modern "étrennes") degenerated into a serious abuse, which the church did its best to suppress. [NEW YEAR'S GIFTS, p. 1381.]

As proof that the great majority of the superstitions of the age were a direct inheritance from paganism, we may cite the following illustration. Amid the loss of much that the ancient astronomers had bequeathed to posterity, the discovery of the real cause of eclipses appears to have been faithfully preserved; and in his Natural History, Pliny takes occasion to extol this triumph of science over superstition, and warmly urges philosophers to like achievements. As his writings continued to be studied throughout the greater part of the middle ages, this philosophical solution of a constantly recurring phenomenon was never lost sight of by the educated few, and hence the teachers of the church are frequently to be found rebuking the vulgar superstition which led the common people to assemble and utter cries on the occasion of a lunar or solar eclipse, in order to prevent the moon or sun from being totally devoured. Discourses directly levelled against this practice are to be found in the writings of Maximus of Turin (Migne, vii. 337), and of Rabanus Maurus (Opera, ed. Colv. v. 606), with which compare Tacitus (Annal. i. 28). On the other hand, as Pliny expressly states that earthquakes portend calamity (Hist. Nat. ii. 81-86) so the Fathers shared this belief with the multitude. St. Ambrose declares that the death of Theodosius was foretold by earthquakes, by "mountains of rain and an unwonted darkening of the sky" (Migne, xvi. 1386). The pages of Gregory of Tours are in this respect as superstitious as those of Livy. Four suns portended a great defeat in Auvergne (Hist. Franc. iv. 31); blood flowed from broken bread (ibid. v. 34); it rained blood near Paris until men threw aside their stained garments in horror (ib. vi. 14); a bright body resembling a lofty beacon appeared in the heavens to foretell the death of Gondebald (vii. 11). (See also de Mirac. St. Martin, Bouquet, Script. ii. 469.) The belief in astrology [ASTROLOGERS], which Pliny (Nat. Hist. ii. 5) notices as fast gaining ground in his time, could never be entirely eradicated throughout the period here treated.

It must nevertheless be admitted that the voice of the church was generally strongly pronounced against the more childish and irrational forms of the belief in omens. "Thou seest," says St. Basil, "how wrong a thing it is to look for omens; yet many Christians deem it no harm (ἀδιόφορον) to listen for sounds and to give heed to signs" (Comment. in Isai. c. ii.; Migne, Serius Graeca, xxx. 247). He instances such trivial circumstances as striking one's foot against some object on leaving the house, or finding one's garment caught, and admonishes Christians rather to take note of the proofs of divine wisdom and goodness exhibited in the natural world. St. Chrysostom refers to the belief that to meet a cripple or a one-eyed person, when starting on a journey, was a bad omen (Hom. ad Pop. Antioch.); St. Eligius, in the 7th century, enumerates a large number of similar superstitions, such as the belief that to allow one's flocks to pass by hollow trees or near pits gave them over to the power of evil spirits. He dissuades women from wearing amber about their necks, and from invoking Minerva, and rebukes the folly of hesitating to set about new undertakings at the time of full moon (Migne, lxxxvii. 528).

Trial by the ordeal of heated iron [ORDEAL] was probably a survival of the custom adverted to in the lines—

Cultores multa premimus vestigia pruna."

(Verg. Aen. xi. 787, 788.)

The following Indiculus Superstitionum et Paganiarum, or list of superstitions and pagan observances condemned at the council of Lestines,^d in the year 743, is probably a fairly complete enumeration of the practices prevalent at that time, which the church condemned either as pagan or Christian superstitions or as abuses connected with religious worship.

(1) "De sacrilegio ad sepulchra mortuorum." (2) "De sacrilegio super defunctos, id est, dad-sisas." The first article appears to have reference to the desecration of tombs in the search for hidden treasure, and to unlawful rites over the places of interment; the second to pagan observances, such as drinking and riotous banqueting, and throwing into the fire whatever the deceased had been accustomed to hold most dear (cf. Mansi, xii. 340). (3) "De spurcalibus in Februario." It was a common practice among Teutonic nations to celebrate the lengthening of the days in February by feasts at which swine were offered. These feasts were called "Spurcalia," and in Holland and Lower Germany the month of February is still known as "Sporkelmaend" (Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 506). (4) "De casulis, id est, fanis." Probably small temples in country districts, constructed of wood, and often converted to purposes of debauchery. (5) "De sacrilegiis per ecclesias." Hefele compares a statute of St. Boniface (Mansi, xii. 385) forbidding the introduction of seculars and young women into the churches as singers and also the holding of feasts within the walls. (6) "De sacris sylvarum, quae nimidas vocant." Here Wurdtewein, in Migne (lxxxix. 810) explains "quasi Nympharum sacra." Eckhard, however, thinks that we have here a reference to sacrifices at which nine heads of horses were offered, and prefers to read "ninhedas." A capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 794, directs that "sacred" groves and trees shall be hewn down. (7) "De his quae faciunt super petras." To offer sacrifices on rocks was a frequent practice, and is forbidden by numerous synods; St. Eligius, we are told by St. Audoen (Vita, ii. 15) enjoined, "Nullus Christianus ad fana, vel ad petras, vel ad fontes, vel ad arbores . . . vota reddere praesumat." (8) "De sacris Mercurii vel Jovis." On the occurrence of the names of gods of the Roman mythology as objects of veneration among the Germans, see observations in II. ii. We may, however, compare Tacitus (Germ. c. 9), "Deorum maxime Mercurium colunt." (9) "De sacrificio quod fit alicui sanctorum." The newly-converted Germans appear to have often substituted saints and martyrs for their own gods as objects of veneration. See capitulary 5 of Germanic council of 742 (Mansi, xii. 313). (10) "De phylacteriis et ligaturis" [see LIGATURAE]. Alcuin, some fifty years later, appears to have found it necessary to remonstrate against the wearing of relics by way of charms (Epist. ed. Dümmler, pp. 719, 721). (11) "De fontibus sacrificiorum." Offerings to the supposed divinities of fountains and streams were a common practice. Mone (Gesch. d. Heidenthums, ii. 270) states that the inhabitants of the districts watered by the Elbe and the Main were accustomed to worship the genii of those rivers, and, whenever the year gave promise of a season of fertility, would cast wheat, oats, and barley into the stream in acknowledgment of the favour shewn by the river-god. (12) "De incantationibus." The formulae or mystic sentences uttered by the pretenders to magic. (13) "De auguriis vel avium vel equorum vel bovum stercora vel sternutationes." Tacitus (Germ. c. 20) says that it was peculiar to the race to observe the prognostications and warnings given by horses. (14) "De divinis vel sortilegiis." The "divini" foretold events from signs over which they had no control; the "sortilegi," from objects which they carried with them, e.g. sticks and straws [SORTILEGY]. "Auspicia sortesque, ut qui maxime, observant" (Tac. Germ. c. 10). (15) "De igne fricato de ligno, id est, nodiyr." "Nod-fyr" (Germ. "Nöthen") was fire produced by friction, and was held to possess mysterious virtues. To jump over it was thought to be a preservative against misfortune; garments placed in its smoke were supposed to secure the wearer from fever. This superstition was especially condemned by Boniface at the Germanic council of A.D. 842 (Mansi, xii. 315; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, II. ii. 564). (16) "De cerebro animalium." The council of Orleans (A.D. 541) forbade that oaths should be sworn over the head of any animal. (17) "De observatione paganorum in foco vel in incoatione rei alicujus." The embers on the hearth and the ascending smoke were supposed to give indications of future events. Artists, in representing the sacrifice of Cain and of Abel, were wont to represent the smoke from the former as blown about by different currents, while that of the latter ascended undisturbed in a spiral column (Migne, Patrol. lxxxix. 810). (18) "De incertis locis quae colunt pro sanctis." Besides places generally recognised as holy, there were supposed to be many others of a like character (Germ. "Unstätte") of which the knowledge was withheld from mortals, but by passing over which unadvisedly they would be liable to be punished by the infliction of some malady. (19) "De petendo, quod boni vocant sanctae Mariae." Eckhard (Rerum Franc. bk. xxiii.) reads "petenstro," "bedstraw," and understands by "boni homines" simple-minded people. Thyme and the yellow lady's bedstraw are still termed in Germany "Mother of God's bedstraw." Hefele considers that the superstitious use of the plant may be traced in the custom still prevalent in Catholic countries of offering bunches of herbs on the Ascension of the Virgin. (20) "De feriis, quae faciunt Jovi vel Mercurio." Seiters supposes that Boniface here intended to forbid the naming of the days of the week after the heathen gods: e.g. Thunara (Donnerstag), Thursday; Woden (Woenstag), Wednesday; Freja (Freitag), Friday. Binterim suggests a more probable explanation by quoting Tacitus: "Deorum maxime Mercurium (Woden) colunt, cui certis diebus humanis quoque hostiis litare fas habent" (Germ. c. 9). "De lunae defectione, quod dicunt vince luna." We find in Maximus of Turin (Migne, lvii. 334), in St. Eligius (ibid. lxxvii. 528), and Rabanus Maurus (Opera, v. 606), discourses designed to dissuade their hearers from the folly of uttering outcries on the occasion of a lunar eclipse. It was supposed that by these demonstrations the moon was assisted in escaping from being altogether devoured. (22) "De tempestatibus et cornibus et coeleis." Referring apparently to the belief in "weather-makers," and to superstitions practised with drinking vessels and spoons. (23) "De sulcis circa villas." Hefeles observes that a trench round a house was supposed to be a protection against witches; the annotator in Migne (lxxxix. 810) supposes that allusion is designed to superstitious rites observed on the occasion of making such trenches. (24) "De pagano cursu quem yrias nominant scissis pannis vel calceamentis." Eckhard here reads, "Scyrias," from Ecy = Scu = Schuh. There is probably allusion intended to a pagan custom of running about on the first of January with torn garments and shoes. (25) "De eo, quod sibi sanctos fingunt quoslibet mortuos." Much as the Germans ascribed at pleasure a place in their Walhalla to departed heroes, so they appear to have assumed the right to canonise departed Christians. This assumption we find again forbidden at the council of Frankfort in the year 794. (26) "De simulacro de consparsa farina." On certain days the Germans were accustomed to make honey cakes representing figures of their gods. Hefeles states that in Westphalia the cakes made at the time of Carnival are still known as "Heidenwecke." (27) "De simulacris de pannis factis." Little figures of the gods cut from mandrake and then dressed up in rags. (28) "De simulacro quod per campos portant." A ceremony probably resembling the Latin Anbarvalia. (29) "De ligneis pedibus vel manibus pagano ritu." The custom of offering in the churches wooden models of feet and hands by those who, in answer to their prayers, had been cured of any affliction of those parts. Theodoretus Cyrensis (u. s.) speaks of the custom of offering gold and silver eyes, feet, and hands, though without condemning the practice. (30) "De eo quod credunt quia feminae lunam commendunt, quod possint corda luminum tollere juxta paganos." Here some read "comedant," and consider that allusion is designed to a belief similar to that referred to in Tibullus, "Hanc ego de coelo ducentem sidera vidi." Maximus of Turin, in his 101st homily (Migne, lvii. 337), remonstrates with those "qui putarent lunam de coelo magorum carminibus posse deduci," and implores them that, putting aside this pagan error, "praetermisso errore gentili," they will accept a view more consonant with Christian enlightenment.

^d Lestines or Liftinae was the site of a royal villa in the district now represented by the province of Hennegau in Belgium. It would appear, however, that most of the above enactments had reference to Thuringia, in which Boniface's labours were chiefly carried on.

Similarly, a capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 768, requires "ut populus Dei paganas non faciat," and enumerates as "spurciciae gentilitatis" profane sacrifices to the dead, sortilege and divining, phylacteries, auguries, incantations, and offerings of victims, which last, it states, "foolish men are wont to offer close to churches, in pagan fashion, in the name of the holy martyrs and confessors of the Lord" (Pertz, Legg. i. 33).

Features of a more general character, pointing to a low conception of Christian morality, such as the settlement of disputes by duelling, authorised by the code of Gondebald, king of Burgundy in the 6th century (see ORDEAL), the avenging of murder by murder, as recorded on the part of bishop Gewilib in the 8th century, and facts of a like nature, are often more justly to be regarded as distinct traditions of paganism than merely as evidence of a corrupt or imperfect Christianity.

PALLA ALTARIS. [ALTAR CLOTH.]

PALLADIUS, anchorite in Syria, 4th century; commemorated Jan. 28. (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 841.) [C. H.]

PALLAIRE, POLAIRE, POOLIRE. When books were few in the ancient Celtic church, and required careful preservation in accompanying their owners from place to place, they appear to have been deposited in leathern satchels or wallets which could be attached to the back by thongs in travelling, and hung upon pegs on the wall (Todd, Obits Ch. Ch. Dubl. p. lxxi.) when a house was reached. For these the two distinctive names of Polaire (Pallaire, Poolire) and Tiag (tiagha) were used, apparently according to the size. The former was comparatively small, often a case for manuscripts or for only one book, like the case in which the Book of Armagh now lies, and which is very richly embossed and covered with figures and the usual Irish interlacing patterns. The latter was of coarser material (as of sealskins, Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 86, c. 93, 130, c. 9, calling it sacculus and pera) and of greater capacity, a wallet to hold not only several books, but relics also and sacred utensils. Evidently the writer of the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 123, c. 38) is in error when he says St. Patrick left, at the church he had newly founded at Kellfene, "libros, unà cum scrinio in quo SS. Petri et Pauli reliquiae asservabantur, et tabulis in quibus scribere solebat vulgo Pallaire appellatis" (Reeves, S. Adamnan. lxiii. n. v, 115–117, 359; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 332–340; O'Curry, Lect. Man. and Cust. Anc. Irish. i. pp. cclvii.–viii., iii. 113–117.) [J. G.]

PALLIUM. We find this word in a great variety of uses in ecclesiastical Latin. Before proceeding to these, however, we shall first note its classical acceptance as equivalent to ἱμάτιον, a term for an outer article of dress similar to, but not the same as, the toga.^a We may describe it as being, to all intents and purposes, a square or oblong blanket; for though it was occasionally found of linen and other materials, wool was by far the most common. These blankets were, as a rule, manufactured in their natural state, and so were usually white, or the ordinary colour of the raw material, though sometimes dyed into special tints.

Such an article of dress would, of course, be inconvenient if the wearer had to run or to engage in active work, and therefore he would throw it over his shoulders. Thus we find one of Plautus's characters, a parasite, saying (Capituli, v. 1. 12): "Conjiciam in collum pallium, primo ex me hanc rem ut audiat," that is, I will throw back my pallium to be able to run quickly with the news. Accordingly, in the next scene (l. 9), he is observed coming "conlecto pallio" (cf. also Terence, Phormio, v. 6. 4). In connexion with this, a curious mistake has been made by St. Isidore (Etymol. xix. 24. 1): "Pallium est quo ministrantium scapulae conteguntur, ut dum ministrant expediti discurrant." Plautus: "Si quid facturuses appende in humeris pallium, et purgat, quantum valet, tuorum pedum pernicitas." Dictum autem pallium a pellibus, quia prius super indumenta pellicia veteres utebantur, quasi pellis sive a palla per derivationem (leg. diminutionem). Here it will be seen that Isidore treats as the normal state of things that which was exceptional.

Besides this special sense of the word pallium, it is used by Isidore in the same chapter quite as a general term for a garment, e.g. the toga is pallium purum forma rotunda (§ 3); the paludamentum is insigne pallium and p. bellicum (§ 9); the paenula is p. cum fimbriis longis (§ 14); the lacerna is p. fimbriatum (ib.); and the praetexta p. puerile (§ 16).

A third use of the word in patristic Latin is to designate the coarse outer garment of monks and of others who affected to imitate the austerities of monastic life. Thus pope Celestinus I. (ob. 432 A.D.), speaks of such as being "amicti pallio" seemed thereby to claim a sanctity not rightly theirs (Epist. 4 ad Episc. Vien. et Narb. c. 2; Patrol. l. 431). Salvianus again says to an unworthy monk, "licet sanctitatem pallio mentiaris" (adv. Avaritium iv. 5; Patrol. liii. 232). To take a different type of example, when Fulgentius became bishop of Ruspe, he retained his former monastic habit. His biographer tells us that "subtus casulam nigello vel lactineo pallio circumdatus incessit," and that, when the weather permitted, he wore a pallium alone within the monastery (Vita, c. 37; Patrol. lxx. 136).

Again we meet with the word pallium in the phrase pallium linostimum, which we have already discussed [MANIPLE].

We come now to the most important use of the word as a special vestment of archbishops, bestowed upon them as a mark of increased dignity by the Roman see, indicative of vicarial powers (voices apostolicae sedis) thereby bestowed. The discussion on the history of this privilege in detail will be found under the article POPE; our business here is merely to describe the vestment and to give a slight general sketch of the history.

The pallium consists of a narrow band, which surrounds the neck like a ring, and hangs down before and behind. The appearance, therefore, presented, would be that of the letter Y.

This band has long been made of white wool, ornamented with dark crosses.^b It is thus kindred with the ἀποφόριον worn by Greek prelates [OMOPHORION], in reference to which we cited an allusion from Isidore of Pelusium, as early as the beginning of the 5th century. It may be noted that the wool for the pallium is, and has long been, furnished by the lambs which are reared in the convent of St. Agnes at Rome. In the Life of Gregory the Great, however, by John the Deacon, reference is made on the occasion of the translation of his body to his pallium as being "byssos candente contextum" (lib. iv. 80). Whether this is exceptional, or is to be taken as indicating a difference in Gregory's time, does not appear, probably the latter.

A little further on (c. 84), the same writer, in minutely describing the ancient picture of Gregory, says of the present vestment: "Pallio mediocri, a dextro videlicet humero sub pectore super stomachum circulatum deducto: deinde sursum per sinistrum humerum post tergum deposito, cujus pars altera super eundem humerum veniens propria rectitudine, non per medium corporis, sed ex latere pendet." This description would give a result pretty similar to the Greek omophorion. This similarity may be seen from a comparison of Plates 25 and 41 in Marriott's Vestiarius Christianum. Further, it may be inferred from John's language that between the age of the picture and his own, the pallium had undergone a slight change of shape. We may gather a notion of what the pallium was like in the 9th century from the notice by Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. ii. 23; Patrol. cv. 1098), from which we should conclude that it had then assumed, or was assuming, its later shape. Illustrations of the varying shape of the pallium at different epochs are given in Marriott's work. Thus we have the famous 6th century mosaic in the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna (Plate 28, figured in this Dictionary under DALMATIC^c); a figure of St. Peter, with a pallium in a 9th century mosaic (Plate 33); for the 10th century, we may refer to the figure of Egbert of Trèves (Plate 42); for the 11th, to a fresco representing St. Clement of Rome (Plate 43), and to a picture of Dunstan, from a MS. in the British Museum (Plate 44). De Rossi has figured in his Roma Sotterranea two eight-century frescoes from the Roman catacombs (copied by Marriott, Plates 30, 31). Here are represented early prelates (e.g. Xystus and Cornelius, bishops of Rome), wearing planetæ, over which are white oraria [SOLE], passing over the left hand which, so covered, holds the book of the gospels. It must be considered doubtful, however, how far these are to be considered instances of pallia or mere oraria.

We shall now mention very briefly a few instances of the bestowal of the papal pallium. The earliest example which is adduced is, perhaps, one recorded by Anastasius Bibliothe-

^b These are now four in number, but formerly were as a rule more numerous. Millin, however (Voyage en Italie, i. 108; cited by Martigny, Dict. des Ant. chrét. s.v. Pallium), mentions a figure of Celsus, archbishop of Milan, on his sarcophagus, in which the pallium has but a single cross. The same holds also for the pallium, if it be a pallium in the Ravenna mosaic we have referred to below.

carius of Marcus, bishop of Rome (ob. 336 A.D.), though it is possible that the reference is of a different kind—"hic constituit ut episcopus Ostiensis, qui consecrat episcopum urbis [i.e. Rome], pallio uteretur, et ab eodem episcopo [leg. episcopo] urbis Roma consecraretur" (Vitae Pontif. 49). It will be observed that we have here got the case of a bishop, not an archbishop; but the honour may at first have been given with rather more latitude, for we find Gregory the Great bestowing the pallium on Syagrius, bishop of Autun. It is to be noted that in the letter in which Gregory sets this forth, he distinctly calls attention to the permission of the emperor—"serenissimi domini imperatoris [Maurice] . . . prona voluntas est, et concedi hoc omnino desiderat" (Epist. lib. ix. 11; cf. ib. 108: vol. iii. 936, 1013).

Saving the rather doubtful case of the bishop of Ostia, the earliest instance of the bestowal of the pallium is that granted by Symmachus (ob. 514 A.D.) to Theodore, archbishop and metropolitan of Laureacus in Pannonia (Epist. 12; Patrol. lxiii. 72). In this case no mention is made of the imperial authority. On the other hand we have a letter written by pope Vigilius in 543 A.D. to Auxanius, archbishop of Arles, in which he defers granting the pallium till the pleasure of the emperor shall have been ascertained. In a subsequent letter, written two years later, the imperial sanction having been given ("pro gloriosissimi filii nostri regis Childeberti Christiani devotione mandatis"), the honour is granted (Epp. 6, 7; Patrol. lxxix. 26). Other instances are those of Caesarius, archbishop of Arles, on whom the pallium was bestowed by Symmachus (Vita Caes. lib. i. 30; Patrol. lxxvii. 1016), and Virgilius, also of Arles, to whom it was granted by Gregory the Great (Epist. lib. v. 53; Patrol. lxxvii. 782). Into the famous dispute as to the rescript of Valentinian in connexion with the pallium of the bishops of Ravenna, it is not our intention to enter.

In several of these cases the recipient had been some time in possession of his see on receiving the pallium, which thus became an exceptional distinction, conferred when the Roman see wished to bestow such. As this was one of the countless ways which went to the building up of the papal power, we need feel no surprise at the new phase of things which meets us in the 8th century. The pallium is now no longer an exceptional honour, granted to this or that archbishop, but a badge, the acceptance of which implied the acknowledgment by the wearer of the supremacy of the apostolic see. Thus we find in a letter written by St. Boniface in 745 A.D. to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, the declaration on his part of willingness to obey the see of Rome, and that "metropolitanos pallia ab illa sede quaerere" (Epist. 63; Patrol. lxxxix. 763). Indeed we find from some letters of pope Zacharias to Boniface (743 A.D.) that the latter had already made application for pallia for several of the metropolitans under him. (Epp. 5, 6; ib. 925.)

One step more alone remains. Pope Nicholas I., in his Responsa ad consulta Bulgarorum (866 A.D.), orders (c. 73; Labbe, viii. 541) that no archbishop may be enthroned or may consecrate the eucharist till he shall have received the pallium from the Roman see.

Another point may be briefly touched upon, namely, the question of the pallium Gallicanum, as distinct from the pallium Romanum. It has been seen that under whatever conditions the pallium was bestowed, it distinctly took the form of a gift vouchsafed at the will of the Roman see. This being the case, it is not easy to understand the order of the council of Macon (581 A.D.) that no archbishop shall presume to say mass sine pallio (can. 6; Labbe, v. 968). To suppose that this means that archbishops are prohibited from celebrating mass till their position is, as it were, ratified by Rome, is, considering time and place, an anachronism, and the language of the canon taken per se would never lead to such a conclusion. Hence many have held (e.g. Hefele, infra, p. 217), and it would seem with much justice, that this Gallican use is distinct from, and exists side by side with, the special papal pallium; that it was simply a mark of archiepiscopal rank, which was to be specially worn at mass, just as each other order would be required to wear its own peculiar badge. A possible illustration of this may be found in a fragment, edited by Martene and Durand, which dwells on the vestments in use in the Gallican church, including the pallium (Thes. Anecd. v. 99; cited by Marriott, p. 204).

PALM. The great beauty of the date-palm in all stages of growth, and under all circumstances of background and association, has made it, like the vine or the corn-ears, one of the natural symbols of Divine blessing. The righteous shall flourish as a palm-tree (Ps. xcii. 13) may be taken as a typically Eastern use of the tree as an emblem.

As may be supposed, the palm branch is found most frequently in sepulchral monuments and inscriptions, and is frequently added to the monogram or chrisma as an emblem of the victory of the faith (Bosio, p. 436, and Martigny's Woodcuts, p. 498). In Bottari, pl. xxii. (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 289), it is beautifully used as a pillar to divide the surface of a sarcophagus into compartments or panels. Also Aringhi, i. pp. 295, 297, 301 (where the fruit is indicated, see infra), and, perhaps, at p. 307. At p. 321 the heads of two apostles, probably St. Peter and St. Paul, are ornamented each with the whole crown or foliage of a palm. It is unquestionably the sign of martyrdom in the widest sense of the word—that of persistent testimony borne to Christ, and consummated by death. It is admitted on all hands, that, though the palm accompanies the martyr, it does not indicate that the bearer actually suffered violent death in will and deed (see Rev. vii. 9, and Gregory the Great in Ezech. bk. ii. hom. xvii., where the palm branches are spoken of generally as praemia victoriae). For inscriptions, see De Rossi, Inscript. Christ. Urbis Romae, vol. i. pars prima, p. 38, no. 39, anno 331; also p. 96, no. 176, 177, p. 204, no. 230; Parker, Phot. 2949; Epitaph of Flavia Jovina, Lateran Museum, no. 21, and 2953, no. 45; also, for France, see Le Blant's Inscript. chrét. de la Gaule, vol. i. pl. 7, 32, 62, no. 56, and 27, no. 166; ii. pl. 81, no. 491.

The palm or palm branch appears frequently in Christian mosaics and wall-paintings. The most beautiful decorative use is made of the whole tree at Ravenna, in the church of S. Apollinare Nuova, where a long procession of male and female saints is represented along the wall above the columns of the central aisle, in the richest mosaic, white figures on gold ground, shod with scarlet and bearing small crowns in their hands lined with the same colour. They are separated by palms, with scarlet bunches of dates hanging from beneath their crowns like barbaric earrings, exactly as in nature; and the purity and brilliancy of the effect may be imagined (see Ricci's series of photographs). The Augustan frescoes of the Doria Pamphili Villa (Parker, Photographs, no. 2696-2705) contain a palm tree admirably drawn from nature, with graphic and exact resemblance. It is found in mosaics in St. Cecilia's at Rome, and SS. Cosmas and Damian. It is used as an arcosolium picture in Marchi, tav. xli. The phoenix, as a symbol of the resurrection, and, perhaps, with a certain play on its name, often appears with the palm, as in the mosaic of St. Cecilia, and on the sarcophagus in Bottari, tav. xxviii. xxii. (see woodcut). Martigny says that both symbols are used with the portrait of St. Paul because he was a special preacher of the Resurrection. It seems simply as if the name phoenix conveyed ideas of both objects at once to the painter or carver, and he naturally put both into his work. For the Palm on Lamps, see Bottari, t. cviii.; on vessels supposed to contain the blood of martyrs, see Aringhi, ii. 642 (found in the confessio of St. Cecilia's church), Bottari, tav. cc. cci. ccii. PALMARE CONCILIUM. [ROME, COUNCILS OF, No. 48.]

PALMATIUS, consul, martyr with his wife and children under Alexander Severus; commemorated May 10 (Bed. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

PALM SUNDAY. [See HOLY WEEK, p. 780.] The feast of palms (Βαῖων ἑορτή) was celebrated in the East as early as the 5th century, for it is twice mentioned in the life of Euthymius, who died A.D. 472 (Vita Euth. auct. Cyrill. Scythop. 11, 103; Monum. Græc. Cotel. 210, 287), but no mention of a procession with palms occurs until we enter a much later period. In the West Isidore of Seville (610) speaks as if Palm Sunday were a great day, but he mentions no use of palm branches on it. He merely explains that "the day is celebrated" on account of the event recorded in St. Matthew xxi. 8-11, &c. (De Offic. i. 28). The next Latin writer who refers to the feast is our countryman Adhelm (A.D. 709), but he merely tells us that in his church the Osanna was sung by a double choir (De Laud. Virginit. 30). A manuscript Ordo Officii, which Mabillon, from the character, supposes to have been written about 800, speaks of a "Letania, et cum ipsa intrant ad missam majorem" (Annal. Vet. 151, ed. 2). This order was observed in a German monastery. It describes a procession, but its antiquity is probably less than Mabillon supposed. Amalarius (A.D. 812) speaks of olive branches being carried, but does not say in procession (De Eccl. Off. i. 10). If he means a procession, he probably alludes to some of the churches only of his province. For there is no reference to any such custom in the earlier forms of the Ordo Romanus (see especially Ordo i. in Mus. Ital. ii. 18, 30), nor in the early sacramentaries, some of which do not even recognise a benediction of the branches, or flowers (so Missale Gothicum, Liturq. Gall. 235; Miss. Gall. Vet. 346; Sacr. Gelas. in Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 546; Sacr. Greg. ibid. ii. 51; Opp. Greg. v. 101, ed. 1615; but one is given in the Besançon rite, Mus. Ital. i. 390; in the Codex Othobon. of the Greg. Sacr. Mur. u. s. &c.). Rabanus of Mentz, A.D. 847 (De Instit. Cleri. ii. 35) merely repeats Isidore; nor do we find any certain mention of a procession after the Ordo Officii above mentioned, until we come to Pseudo-Alcuin in the 10th century.

A similar rite is observed among the Greeks but at their matins. Codinus: "On the Feast of Palms, while the matins are yet being sung, a procession (περίπατος) takes place, and there must be a litany (λήτή), according to custom, and the emperor must walk with the procession" (De Offic. xi. 4). The lampadarius leads the way with a burning torch; a deacon bearing the gospels follows; then come the bishop and priests carrying icons; and some of the people walk after them (Codin. x. 5). During the procession an idiomeleon is sung, which is said to have been composed by the emperor Theophilus, 829-842 (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 118, ed. Nieb.), viz.

"Come forth ye nations, come forth also ye people; look upon the kingdom of heaven. The gospel comes as a figure of Christ." The procession ended, matins are resumed, but the palms (βαῖα) are retained through the service (Goar, 745). Prayers used at the distribution of the palms before the procession may be seen in the Euchologion (744). [W. E. S.]

PAMPHALO and PAMPHAMERUS, Egyptian soldiers, martyrs at Chalcedon under Maximian; commemorated May 17. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iv. 25, from the Greek Fasti.) [C. H.]

PAMPHILUS (1), martyr under Diocletian; commemorated Feb. 16 (Hieron. Mart. with Valens, deacon, and others; Wright's Syrian Mart. with Pamphilus, at Caes. Pal.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 253); June 1. (Usuard. Mart. presbyter, martyr at Caesarea, under Maximinus, his Life by Eusebius of Caesarea; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Wand.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 62.)

(2) Martyr at Rome; commemorated Sept. 21. (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 236.)

(3) Martyr under Maximinus; commemorated Nov. 5. (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

PAMPHIUS, martyr at Caesarea in Palestine, with Pamphilus; commemorated Feb. 16. (Wright, Auct. Syr. Mart.; Basil. Menol. with Valens, &c.) [C. H.]

PANAGIA (Παναγία). One of the ordinary titles of the Blessed Virgin in the Greek church. It probably came into use some time in the 7th century. In the discussions about the word Θεοτόκος, in the 5th century, she is styled ἡ ἀγία παράθεος. So too in the sermon of an uncertain author, Pseudo-Chrysost. Hom. de Legislatore, p. 416 (Migne, tom. vi. 410), which is probably assignable to the 6th century, she is still only ἡ ἀγία, as in the words ἐρχομεν τὴν δέσποιναν ἡμῶν τὴν Θεοτόκον, τὴν ἀγίαν ἀειπαρθένον Μαρίαν. But in the letter of Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem, read at the sixth general council, C. Constant. III. A.D. 680 (Hardouin, tom. iii. col. 1268), the title παναγία occurs several times. It is true that the same epithet is found repeatedly in a set of eleven prayers to the Virgin, in Greek, attributed to St. Ephrem (Op. Gr. iii. pp. 542, &c.), but the whole cast of these prayers obviously belongs to a time far later than that of St. Ephrem.

There is also a monastic ceremony called Panagia, at which a triangular shaped piece of blessed bread is elevated, and partaken of, after a meal with certain prayers, by all present; and a cup of wine is likewise distributed to all with a thanksgiving and special invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, whence the name of the ceremony is said to be derived (Du Cange, Gr. Gloss. s. v. and Symeon of Thessal. quoted by Goar, Euchol. pp. 867, 868). Although in this exact shape the ceremony belongs to a time later than our limits, it is very likely a relic of some primitive observance, some memorial of the original institution, into which a new significance has become imported. [C. E. H.]

PANCRATIUS (1), bishop of Tauromenium, said to have been a disciple of St. Peter and to have seen our Lord; commemorated Feb. 9 (Basil. Menol.); Ap. 3 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. 237); July 9 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel. Cod. Liturg. iv. 262). [C. H.]

(2) Youth, beheaded under Diocletian; commemorated at Rome on the Via Aurelia, May 12 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed., Wand., Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 17). In the Sacramentary of Gregory the natale of Pancratius is observed on May 12, and he is named in the collect. In the Sacramentary of Gelasius he is commemorated on the same day, with Nereus and Achilleus, but only these last two are named in the collects. (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 646, ii. 84.) [C. H.]

PANEGYRICON (Πανηγυρικόν). One of the Greek office-books, containing "Readings" appropriate to the various festivals, collected out of the writings of approved authors, generally recording the acts and virtues of the saints, whence its name. It is therefore not unlike the Western "Legenda." There is no authorized collection, therefore the book is not printed; but different copies are found in manuscript in different churches, varying considerably in their contents according to the diligence or piety of the collector. [C. E. H.]

PANNUTIA (PANNUCEA). This is a name for a garment covered with patches (panni), and is so used by Isidore (Etym. xix. 22; Patrol. lxxxii. 687), "quod sit diversis pannis obsita." [R. S.]

PANSOPHIUS, martyr at Alexandria under Decius; commemorated Jan. 15 (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 996); Jan. 16 (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

PANTAENUS, commemorated at Alexandria July 7. (Usuard., Wand., Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 457.) [C. H.]

PANTALEON (1), martyr under Maximian; commemorated July 28 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard., Wand., Vet. Rom. Mart.; Florus, ap. Bed. Mart.); celebrated by the Greeks under the name of Pantelemon, martyr and physician, the unmercenary, July 27 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vi. 397; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264); Oct. 10 (Cal. Armen.).

(2) One of the nine national saints of Ethiopia; commemorated Oct. 3 (Cal. Ethiop.). [C. H.]

PANTHERIUS, martyr in Thrace under Diocletian; commemorated Aug. 23. (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

PAPA. [POPE.]

PAPAS (1), martyr at Laranda in Lycaonia under Maximian; commemorated Mar. 16 in the Roman Martyrology. (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. ii. 424.)

(2) Egyptian martyr with Sabrinus under Diocletian; commemorated Mar. 16. (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 255.) [C. H.]

PAPHNUTIUS, holy martyr, commemorated by the Greeks Ap. 19. (Cal. Byzant. Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 623.) [C. H.]

PAPIAS (1), soldier, martyr under Diocletian; commemorated at Rome on the Via Nomentana, Jan. 29. (Usuard., Wand.; Bed. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 948; see also Bed. Mart. Nov. 29.)

(2) Martyr in Egypt with Victorinus and others; commemorated Jan. 31 (Basil. Menol.); Feb. 25 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 948; see also Bed. Mart. Nov. 29.) In the Hieron. Mart. a Papias with the same companions occurs on Mar. 6. In the Cal. Byzant. Ap. 5, the name occurs as Pappius.

(3) Martyr with Diodorus and Claudianus under Decius; commemorated Feb. 4 (Basil. Menol.). The Hieron. Mart. has a Papias with some of the same companions on Mar. 6, as also have the Roman Martyrology and the Bollandists (Feb. iii. 627) on Feb. 26.

(4) Bishop of Hierapolis, friend of Polycarp, the disciple of St. John; commemorated Feb. 22. (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 285.)

(5) (PAPAS, PAPPUS), martyr with Chrestus at Tomi; commemorated Ap. 5. (Wright, Syr. Mart.)

(6) Martyr with Peregrinus and others; commemorated July 7. (Basil. Menol.)

[C. H.]

PAPINIUS, bishop and martyr in Africa in the Vandalic persecution; commemorated Nov. 28. (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.)

[C. H.]

PAPIRIUS, deacon, martyr with his sister Agathonica and Carpus, bishop of Thyatira, under Antoninus; commemorated at Pergamus Ap. 13 (Usuard. Mart.); Papyrius (Vet. Rom. Mart.); Pappylus, Oct. 13 (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 271).

PAPPIUS. [PAPIAS (2).]

PARABOLANI, an inferior order of church officers who fulfilled the duty of hospital attendants and nurses to the sick poor, whom they relieved from the alms of the faithful, "deputantur ad curanda debiliū aegra corpora" (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. Tit. ii. de Episc. et Cler. leg. 43). Binterim attributes the establishment of these functionaries as a distinct order to the peace of the church under Constantine (Denkwürdigkeit, vi. 3, 26). Previous to this time the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, as we see from Dionysius's graphic account of the plague at Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vii. 22), was fulfilled by the brethren generally as a duty of Christian love, without any enrolment into a separate body. It is evident, from the laws of the Theodosian code, that the "parabolani" were ranked among the "clerici," but in a very subordinate capacity. They were to be chosen from the poorer classes, and there was an express prohibition against men of rank being admitted into the confraternity. The name was probably derived from παράβalleσθα (periclitari), from the courage with which they hazarded their lives in time of plague and contagious sickness, like the παράβολοι, or bestiarii, who exposed themselves to the risk of death in fighting with wild beasts in the amphitheatre (cf. Socr. H. E. vii. 22, and Valesius' notes; Niceph. H. E. xiv. 3; Acta SS.

Abdon. et Sennen apud Suicer). The idea that it was a satirical name (from parabolae=mere talk), given to physicians and those who undertook the care of the sick, because they promised much and performed little, if seriously proposed, needs no refutation (Du Cange, sub voc.; Bingham, iii. ix. 3). However excellent the original purpose of this order, too soon, in the words of Baronius, "ex charitate officium transivit in factionem," and the parabolani appear as a factious and turbulent body, taking a noisy and prominent part in all religious controversies, and causing so much trouble to the civil power, that special laws had to be passed to restrain and regulate them. In the quarrel between Cyril and Orestes, A.D. 416, the parabolani, zealously espousing the cause of their bishop, threw the city of Alexandria into such confusion that the inhabitants despatched an envoy to Theodosius II., begging him to issue a prohibition for the bishop to leave Alexandria, as his was the only authority by which their violence could be checked. In consequence of this petition, Theodosius issued an edict addressed to Monaxius, the prefect of the pretorium, Sept. 28, 416 A.D., removing this turbulent body from the authority of the bishop, and placing them directly under the prefect, giving him the power of dismissing them for riotous conduct, and of filling up all vacancies caused by death. The number was at the same time limited to 500, and they were to be selected from the poorer classes. The interruptions to public business caused by their obstreperous behaviour, and their intimidation of witnesses and jurors, were guarded against by an inhibition against their attending the law courts at all. Any judicial complaint or legal business they might have was to be transacted for them by their "syndic" or attorney. They were also prohibited from attending, as a body, the games and shows and appearing on any public occasions, as being disturbers of the peace of the community. This measure proved exceedingly distasteful to the clerical party at Alexandria, whose influence with the feeble emperor proved powerful enough to induce him, in seventeen months' time, to repeal the chief provisions of his former enactment by a fresh edict, dated Feb. 3, 418 A.D. In this the number was raised from 500 to 600, they were again placed under the bishop's jurisdiction, and the ranks were to be filled from those who had previously filled the office but had been disbanded by the prefect, or who were known to be skilful in their care of the sick. Their rank was at the same time somewhat raised. They might be selected from any class, excepting the "honorati" and "curiales." At the same time the clause prohibiting their appearance in the circus, the courts, and on public occasions was confirmed (Cod. Theod. u. s. leg. 42, 43, vol. vi. p. 82, with Gothofred's notes). We find the parabolani again as a body of noisy fanatics, ready for any acts of violence, at the "Latrocinium" of Ephesus, 449 A.D., where six hundred of them appeared as the tools of the brutal Barsumas to coerce malcontents to support his measures (Labbe, iv. 251). The reputation of the parabolani as a dangerous class, formidable to the civil magistrates, however useful when restricting themselves to their appropriate duties, is evidenced by the legislation of Justinian, which confirms the prohibition to their appearing as a body on public occasions. (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. iii. de Episc. et Cleric. leg. 18; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. 3, 26 ff.; Bingham, Origines, bk. iii. ch. ix. § 1-4; Gothofred, Annotat. in Cod. Theod. vol. vi. p. 82; Baronius, Append. ad tom. v. p. 691.)

PARACLETICE (Παρακλητική, βιβλίον παρακλητικόν). One of the principal and most necessary of the Greek office-books. It is arranged on the principle of the Octoëchos, but extended so as to contain the Troparia of the whole Ferial office for the year. By some writers it is attributed to Joseph of the Studium (died A.D. 883); by others to another Joseph, surnamed Melodus (see Leo Allat. de Libris Eccles. Græc. p. 283). Two derivations are given for the name: viz. either quasi consolatorius, because its contents tend to the consolation of the penitent; or quasi invitatorius, because they largely consist of invocations.

The course of the Ferial office depends not so much upon the season of the year as upon the Tones (ἤχοι), of which there are eight, arranged to follow one another in regular sequence, beginning with the week after Easter week, after which they recur again, and so on. Each Tone has its own Troparia, and governs the service at all the Hours for its week. Thus the entire set of variations of the service is finished in a period of eight weeks. There are proper tables to shew how these periods of eight weeks, with their Tones, fall in different years, according to the date of Easter. By referring to these tables the proper Tone for the week in which any given day falls may be found; and then the paracleticè gives the proper Troparia for the different offices of the day. [C. E. PARADISE (παράδεισος, from a Persian word meaning a park or pleasure-ground) is used (1) in inscriptions to designate the place in which the dead in Christ wait the final judgment. It is said (Martigny, Dict. p. 577, 2nd ed.) not to occur earlier than the end of the 4th century, when (A.D. 382) it is found in the epitaph of Theodora (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 141, No. 317). But, without the actual use of the word "Paradise," the dwelling of a soul in bliss is often indicated by pictures or symbols of the last resting-places of the faithful. An arcossolium of the cemetery of Cyriaca shews an oranti standing between two figures, who draw back the curtains on each side; this is supposed to typify the entrance of a soul into the rest of paradise (De Rossi, Bullet. 1863, p. 76). A painting in the cemetery of Petronilla (Martigny, p. 639) is thought to represent the reception of a soul into Paradise by Petronilla. The soul admitted to the joys of Paradise is sometimes represented as a female figure standing between two trees in an attitude of contemplation (Perret, Catacombes, v. pl. v.; De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 95), often accompanied by the words IN PACE. This inscription appears in the representation of Dionysas (said to be of the 3rd century) in the cemetery of Soter (De Rossi, Roma Sott. iii. tav. i.), where the departed appears in the midst of a garden full of fruits and flowers, where birds seem to flit from branch to branch. On some sarcophaguses (as in Bottari, Sculpture, xix.; Millin, Midi de la France, lxv. lxviii.) trees or vines form columns separating the different groups; these are thought by some to typify Paradise. Occasionally the promised land is typified by the two spies bearing a great bunch of grapes between them on a pole (Millin, lix. 3; Garrucci, Vetri, ii. 9). And again the soul is typified by a bird sitting on a tree (Lupi, Severae Epitaphium, tav. xvii. p. 137), or in the midst of flowers. See the epitaph of Sabinianus (Martigny, p. 576). The flowers and leaves, which often enclose representations of the Lord in glory, as in some of the ancient mosaics of Rome and Ravenna, are thought to refer to Paradise [MOsaICS, p. 1337]; and figures of saints in basilicas are frequently placed in the midst of a Paradise indicated in the same manner. The same kind of symbolism is found in gilded glass (Buonarroti, Osservazione sopra alcuni Frammenti di Vetro, xviii. xxi.; Garrucci, ix. 8). The rich dress in which many female figures are represented on sepulchral monuments is thought by many to indicate the "splendour of Paradise" (τρυφή τοῦ παραδείσου) of which the liturgies speak. The banquets which are so often represented on the walls of sepulchral chambers are also very commonly supposed to typify Paradisaical joys (Polidori, Conviti Effigiat, in the Milan Amico cattolico) (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Paradis).

(2) The word Paradise is sometimes used to designate the quadrangular space enclosed by a cloister, often used as a burial-ground. Comp. NARTHEX, p. 1379. [C.]

PARAGAUDA, PARAGAUDIS (παπαγαυδῖς). This is a species of ornamental fringe attached to a dress. We find in the Theodosian Code (lib. x. tit. 21, l. 1) a law of Valens prohibiting the use of "auratae ac sericae paragaudae auro intextae" to private persons. A law of Theodosius the Great (ib. l. 2) repeats the prohibition in stronger terms. The word is also used, by a natural extension, for the dress so ornamented (see Gothofredus's note in loc.). As there is no special Christian connexion of the word, it is needless to give further instances. It is apparently oriental, but the derivation is unknown. [R. S.]

PARALYTIC MAN. Two cures of the palsy (besides that of the centurion's servant) are circumstantially narrated in the gospels—one of the sufferers at the Pool of Bethesda (John v. 2-17), the other of him whom his friends lowered through the roof in the crowded assembly of Capernaum (Matt. ix. 1-8; Mark v. 21; Luke viii. 40, v. 17-26). The former is by far the more frequently represented—almost always in the act of carrying away his bed, or "that whereon he lay," which is sometimes a Greek couch, sometimes a somewhat modern stump-bedstead. See Rohault de Fleury, L'Evangile, pl. li. figs. 1-5, Bottari, tav. xxxix., and BETHESDA, p. 201, for a cut from a Vatican sarcophagus. See also Rohault de Fleury, pl. lii. for many varieties of the grabatum, two from ivories at Ravenna and at Cluny. A scribe or apostle is sometimes present (Bottari, xxxi.). The other paralytic sufferer is seen as lowered through the roof by cords in a sarcophagus photographed by Mr. Parker (2906), and engraved in Bottari. i. pl. 39. See Westwood, Early Christian Sculptures, p. 23. But the most graphic and excellent representation is in the upper course of mosaics in St. Apollinare Nuova at Ravenna (Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, pl. xliii.). De Fleury gives two other examples from 9th and 11th century MSS. nos. 510 and 70 in the Bibliothèque nouvelle.

PARAMENTA. A general word signifying ornaments, or decorations; from parare. It might be applied to the tapestry with which a church is adorned for a festival; to the coverings of the altar; to the sacerdotal vestments; or (in a still narrower sense) to the orphreys, or apparels, of a vestment. The authorities for its use all seem to be late.

PARAMONARIUS, an ecclesiastical official, the nature of whose duties seems to have been different at different times and places. The word occurs but rarely, and there is little in the context of the passages where it is found to indicate the position occupied. The first place where it occurs is in the second canon of the council of Chalcedon, where the "paramonarius" (or, according to another reading, "prosmonarius") is ranked with the "oeconomus" and "oedicus" (church advocate) as one of the subordinate officers of the church, whose post was sometimes the object of a simoniacal bargain. In this passage it is considered by the best authorities to mean a "villicus" or bailiff, who managed the estates of a monastery or church. "Monasterii administer." (Bevereg. Pandect. Can. tom. i. p. 112; ii. p. 109; annotat.; Justellus, Bibl. Jur. Canon. tom. i. p. 91; Suicer, sub voc.) It is also explained in the same manner by Gothofred in his annotations on a law of the Justinian code (de Episc. et Clericis, l. 46, sect. 3), where the paramonarii are associated with the xenodochi, ptochotrophii, nosocomi, &c., as administrators of church property. Du Cange, on the other hand, considers the office to be one of lower grade, identical with that of the mansio-narius in the Western church, concerned with lighting the candles, opening and shutting the doors, and other servile duties. The word is so rendered by Dionysius Exiguus, and explained in the margin by ostiarius, and the quotations given by Du Cange (sub voc.) prove that it was used in this inferior sense in the West in mediaeval times (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. iii. ch. xiii. § 1; Bevereg. Pandectae, u. s.; Justellus, ut. s.).

PARAPHONISTA. This word occurs frequently in the early Ordines Romani published by Hittorp, and by Mabillon, Museum Ital. tom. ii. The four principal singers in the Schola Cantorum at Rome were named paraphonistae. The first in number of these (prior scholae) presented the anthem. It was the duty of the fourth, who was called archiparaphonista, to keep the pope informed of any matter that concerned the choir, what anthems were to be sung, &c. The choir-boys were sometimes called infantes paraphonistae.

PARATORIUM, a designation of the prothesis or credence table in the Ordo Romanus, also called oblationarium, "because when the offerings were received preparation was made out of them for the Eucharist" (Bingham, viii. vi. 22). [PROTHESIS.] It also stood for the Secretarium Ecclesiae or Sacristy. "Calicem subdiaconus dat acolyto et illa revocat in Paratorium." Ordo Romanus, "Reponitur liber in paratorio quodam sive in secretario" (ibid.). See Ducange, Const. Christ. S. Soph. cc. 67, 68. PARENTS. [FAMILY.]

PARIS, COUNCILS OF (1), A.D. 360 (al. 362), where the Arian formula, concocted at Rimini, published at Nice, and reaffirmed at Constantinople, from which the word "Homoousios" had been eliminated, was condemned in a synodical letter addressed to the Easterns, and preserved in the 11th Fragm. of St. Hilary. (Mansi, iii. 357-359.)

(2) A.D. 555 (al. 551), at which Saffaracus, who subscribed to the 5th council of Orleans as bishop of Paris, being convicted of various crimes by his own confession, was deposed. (Mansi, ix. 739-742.)

(3) A.D. 557, in the pontificate of Pelagius I., like the former one, when ten canons were passed, all relating to church discipline, and most of them re-enactments; e. g. the eighth, which says, "Let no bishop be ordained against the will of the citizens; but him only who has been elected with fullest choice of the people and clergy. Neither let any see be filled up by the power of the prince, nor any potentate whatsoever, against the will of the bishop of the metropolis, or his suffragans." Six more canons are given to this council by Gratian and others, which, as Mansi shews, embody rules of the ninth and following centuries. (Ib. 752.)

(4) A.D. 573, when Pappolus, bishop of Chartres, complained of the consecration of Promotus to the see of Châteaudun in his diocese, by Aegidius, bishop of Rheims, who was therefore called upon, in the name of the council, to withdraw his nominee. The council also addressed a letter to king Sigebert, begging of him not to interpose in his favour. (Ib. 863-872.)

(5) A.D. 577, when Praetextulus, bishop of Rouen, was accused by king Chilperic of having encouraged the revolt of his son Meroveus, which the bishop denied. Forty-five bishops, among whom was Gregory of Tours, the historian, heard his defence. But in the end, having been induced to become his own accuser, he was carried off forcibly, thrown into prison, and then exiled. (Ib. 875-880.)

(6) A.D. 615, the most considerable that had yet met there; said to have been attended by seventy-nine bishops, and even called general in a council of Rheims ten years later. Its preface deposes to its having been summoned by king Clotaire, who confirmed its canons afterwards in a special edict. They were fifteen in number, all disciplinary. By the second of them, no bishop may choose or have one chosen to succeed him during his lifetime, unless he should have become, for some reason, incapable of administering his diocese. By the third all manumitted slaves (liberti) are to be defended by priests, and not reduced again to their former state. And by the fifteenth no Jew may hold or apply for any public office giving him power over Christians. Any Jew endeavouring to compass this is to receive baptism at the hands of the bishop of the place, with all his family. The rest are less new, than old canons revived. (Mansi, x. 539–546.) Ten more canons (Mansi makes them fifteen) are preserved of a nameless council (Delaland, Suppl. ad Sirmond, p. 62, has invented a name for it), by the first of which these fifteen are confirmed, as being in no way contrary to the Catholic faith or church law, while by the eighth priests and deacons are forbidden, under pain of deprivation, ever to marry. (Ib. 546–548.)

(7) A.D. 638. When the exemption of the abbey of St. Denis is stated to have been renewed, “in universali nostrâ synodo Parisiis congregata,” as king Dagobert, who subscribes first, is made to say. But if so, why should it have formed the subject of a grant afterwards, A.D. 658, by bishop Landeric? (Mansi, x. 659 and xi. 61.)

[E. S. Ff.]

PARISH. I. Names for.—The Greek word παροικία, from which the English parish is derived, through the Latin parœcia, parochia, the Norman-French paroisse (Lois de Guillaume le Conquerant, 1), and the early English paroeche, parosche, pareosche (Stratmann, s. v.), appears to have had two meanings. (1) In Greek inscriptions it is not uncommon to find the inhabitants of a town divided into those who have and those who have not full civil rights, and described collectively as οἱ τε πολῖται καὶ οἱ παρόικοι πάντες, e.g. Corpus Inscr. Gr. No. 1631 at Thespieae, No. 2906 at Priene, No. 3049 at Teos, No. 3595 at Ilium Novum; hence, in the first use of the term and its cognate terms in Biblical and ecclesiastical Greek, they are found in this literal sense of a “sojourner” and “sojourning,” e.g. in the LXX. Exod. ii. 22; Deut. v. 14; 2 Kings viii. 1, in the N. T. Acts vii. 29; Ephes. ii. 19; Heb. xi. 9; in Philo, e.g. vol. i. pp. 161, 511, ed. Mangey; in Josephus, e.g. Antt. Jud. viii. 2, 9. It is probable that the term came thus to be ordinarily applied to the colonies of Jews in the great cities of the East, who were not absorbed in the ordinary citizens, but kept their nationality distinct; e.g. at Cyrene, where Strabo ap. Joseph. Antt. Jud. xiv. 7, 2, says that there were four divisions of the population—citizens, farmers, μέτοικοι, and Jews. It was probably continued or adopted by the colonies of Christians in the same cities, who stood in a similar relation to the rest of the population: hence, in Clem. Rom. i. c. 1, the church of Rome describes itself as ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ παροικοῦσα [Ρώμην], so Poly. ad Philipp. 1; Martyr. Poly. 1. With this mingled the metaphorical sense of the word in which this “sojourning” upon earth was contrasted with the “abiding city” in heaven, e.g. 1 Pet. i. 17; Clem. Rom. ii. c. 5; Corpus Inscr. Græc. No. 9474, 9683.

(2) It was used, in a sense which continued its earlier sense of “dwelling near a city,” as equivalent to a rural commune or a detached suburb. This meaning is rare, and the editors of the Corpus Inscr. Græc. treat the use of παρόικος in the sense of “colonus,” as a proof that the inscription on which it occurs, No. 8656, is not earlier than the 4th century, A.D. In the later civil law παροικία was applied to villeins or peasant-farmers; e.g. in the Practica, tit. 15, c. 2, ap. Von Lingenthal, Jus Græco-Romanum, pars i. p. 42.

In the ecclesiastical use of the words these two meanings were confounded—the former meaning predominates in the earlier period, the latter in the later; nor does the confusion disappear until far on in the middle ages; i.e. παροικία, parœcia were used (i.) of the whole colony of Christians in a given city or district, i.e. of the “diocese,” in its modern sense of the district over which a bishop came to have jurisdiction; (ii.) of the rural or suburban communities which were more or less dependent on another church—i.e. of the “parish” in its modern sense. Between these two uses of the words it is not always easy to distinguish. The following must be taken as being only an approximate classification of some leading instances:—i. = the modern “diocese”: S. Iren. Ep. ad Florin. ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 20; Apollon. Ephes. ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 18; Alexand. Alexandrin. Ep. ap. Theodoret. H. E. i. 3; Conc. Ancyra. c. 18; Nicaen. c. 16; Const. Apost. ii. 1; viii. 10; St. Cyrill. Hierosol. Catech. xiv. 21; St. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 49, vol. i. p. 131, id. Hist. Arian. c. 17, vol. i. p. 279, id. Tom. ad Antioch. vol. i. p. 616; St. Greg. M. Ep. vi. 11; xiv. 7; in Gallican documents from the 6th century onwards—e.g. in the instrument of foundation of the abbey of St. Mesmin ap. D’Achery, Spicileg. vol. iii. p. 307; in England, Conc. Clovesh. c. 3, Conc. Cealcyth. c. 3; in the probably genuine writings of popes—e.g. Epit. Hadrian. Can. Apost. 40, Hormisd. Ep. 117, ad Episc. Hispan. c. 3; in the Carolingian Capitularies—e.g. Karolomanni Capit. A.D. 742, c. 3, Pippini Capit. Suession. c. iv. 1, Capit. Vern. c. 3, Karoli M. Capit. General. A.D. 769, c. 8; in the Liber Pontificalis, Vit. S. Sixti. p. 8; in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals—e.g. Epist. Clem. i. c. 36, 70, Epist. Calixt. ii. c. 13, Epist. Lucii. c. 5; and even in the 12th century—e.g. Legenda S. Hugon. Lincoln. ap. Giraldus Cambrensis, ed. Dimock, vol. vii. p. 176. So far did this wider sense of parœcia prevail that a distinction sometimes appears between the parœcia of a simple bishop, and the diœcesis or provincia of a metropolitan—e.g. S. Bonifac. Mogunt. Epist. 49, ad Zachariam, A.D. 742, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxxix. 714, “tres ordinavimus episcopos et provinciam in tres parochias discretivimus;” so S. Zachar. Epist. 3, ad Burchard, Migne, vol. lxxxix. 822. ii. It = the modern “parish”: S. Basil. Epist. 240 (192); Const. Apost. ii. 58; Conc. Chalced. c. 17; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. ix. 20, Emerit. c. 19, 2 Hispal. c. 2, Agath. c. 21, Rem. c. 19, Cabillon. c. 5; Sidon. Apollin. Epist. vii. 6, p. 183; S. Greg. M. Epist. i. 16; Vit. S. Elig. ii. 25, ap. D’Achery, Spicil. vol. ii.; in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Epist. Clem. iii. c. 70 (from Lulli Epist. ad Pontif. Max. in S. Bonifac. Epist. 112, p. 290); Hincmar Rem. Capit. Synod. 4, c. 1, ed. Sirmond. p. 732, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxv. p. 795. Conversely diœcesis is frequently used, probably by a survival of one of its classical uses (for which see Marquardt, Römische Staats- verwallung, Bd. i. p. 5) as equivalent to the modern parish—e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. ix. 16, p. 283; S. Greg. Turon. H. F. iv. 13, p. 152, id. vi. 38, p. 315, uses “parochiae” and “dioceses” synonymously in the same chapter; Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 54, Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 8, 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 33, 3 Brac. A.D. 572, c. 2, 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 34, 36. This use of diocesis (and the concurrent absence of the use of parocchia) is especially found in Italy—e.g. in the long dispute between the bishops of Arezzo and Siena, the documents relating to which are given by Muratori, Antiquit. Ital. vol. vi., where parochia does not appear to occur until the decree of the Roman council respecting the case in A.D. 853.

ii. Origin of Parishes.—The origin of parishes, in the modern sense of the word, is to be found in the suburban and rural organization of the Roman empire. In the more civilized countries of that empire, each important city had a district surrounding it, within which its magistrates might exercise jurisdiction (= regio, Sicul. Flacc. in Gromat. Vett. ed. Lachmann, p. 135; territorium, Digest, 50, 16, 239, § 8; διοίκησις Cic. ad Fam. 13, 15). This district might contain within it vici, castella, pagi, κῆμαι, φρόβια, which formed dependencies of the city (Isidor. Hispal. Origin. xv. 2, 11; cf. Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, Bd. i. pp. 7-sq.). In addition to these large cities, with their surrounding territory and their dependent villages and hamlets, there were independent communities in rural districts, which had their own officers, and sometimes also their own territory (Marquardt, ibid.; Kuhn über die Entstehung der Städte der Alten, Komerverfassung u. Synoikismos, Leipzig, 1878). By the end of the 3rd century, Christianity had penetrated to the majority of these suburban and rural organizations, and provision had to be made for them in the general organization. The provision varied considerably at different times and in different countries; and the modern parish is the survivor of many earlier experiments.

(1.) In Syria it was sometimes the practice to attach a small town for ecclesiastical purposes to a neighbouring larger town, for example, Bethlehem was attached to Jerusalem (Sulp. Sever. Dial. i. 8, ed. Halm, p. 159, writing of St. Jerome, says, “ecclesiam loci illius (Bethlehem) Hieronymus presbyter regit; nam paroccia est episcopi qui Hierosolymam tenet”). But more commonly in Syria, and some parts of Asia Minor, it appears to have become the practice, as early as the 4th century, to appoint presbyters and deacons for small towns and country districts, who were in some respects on a lower footing than the presbyters and deacons of city churches (Conc. Neo-caes. c. 13; Antioch, c. 8), and who were superintended by rural bishops, χαρειακόκοι, or itinerant bishops, πεποδευταί, who were themselves in some respects subordinate to the city bishops (Conc. Ancyra. c. 13; Neo-caes. c. 13; Antioch, c. 10; S. Basil. Epist. 54 (181). The controversy to which this fact gave rise in the West, in the 8th and 9th centuries, is referred to under ORDERS, HOLY, III.). An interesting example of the ecclesiastical organization of a small Syrian town in the 4th century, A.D. 354, is afforded by an inscription at Eitha (El-hît) in Batanea, printed in Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions Grecques, &c. No. 2124 (= Corpus Inscr. Graec. No. 8819), where the clergy consisted of two presbyters, one of whom was also archimandrite of the local monastery, and two deacons, one of whom acted as οικονόμος, or “bursar.” (2.) In North Africa, the system of rural or itinerant bishops, with jurisdiction over detached towns or villages, does not seem to have existed. It is clear, both from the large number of bishoprics which are known to have existed, and from the taunts which were thrown out on both sides in the course of the Donatist controversy, that bishops of full rank were ordinarily appointed, wherever a Christian community existed; but at the same time there are traces of the system which afterwards came more generally to prevail, e.g. in St. Augustine, Epist. 209, where he speaks of a “castellum” which formed an outlying dependency of the church of Hippo: “antea ibi nunquam episcopus fuit, sed simul cum contigua sibi regione ad parocciam Hippo-nensis ecclesiae pertinebat.” (3.) In the district round Alexandria, ἡ Μαρεώτης χώρα, the villages were entrusted to presbyters, under the superintendence of the bishop of Alexandria. Athanasius mentions upwards of ten such villages, and also speaks of the bishop visiting them (περιερχομένῳ). The dispute with Ischyrras, which occupies a prominent place in his controversy with the Arians, seems to have arisen out of the attempt of Ischyrras to have himself appointed bishop of one of these villages, which Athanasius resists on the ground of its being contrary to local practice (S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 63, vol. i. p. 143; c. 85, vol. i. p. 158). (4.) In Gaul and Spain, the circumstances under which Christianity spread, and the elaborate civil organization with which it found itself in contact, led to the growth and consolidation of the system which has since become permanent in the Western church. It is probable that in those countries it did not penetrate to the country districts and rural communes until long after its complete organization in the chief towns. Those towns consequently became missionary centres. Presbyters and deacons were sent into the castella and vici, partly to preach and partly to minister to the scattered Christians who were to be found there. That they did not go far from the towns, and that they did not give to the Christians the full advantages of Christian worship, is shewn by their having to return to the city church every Saturday, in order to assist in the services of the Sunday (Conc. Tarrac. A.D. 516, c. 7). By degrees the Christians of these country districts became more numerous; but by that time the tendency had arisen to limit the number of bishops. The episcopate had become more important. Its dignity was not to be impaired by creating a bishop, as in primitive times, for every new community. Presbyters and deacons were detached from the staff of the city church, and deputed to serve country churches. They were sent not merely “ad praedicandum,” but “ad regendum,” i.e. to exercise ecclesiastical discipline. At first they were still nominally on the roll of the city clergy. They received their allowances, as before, from the common fund. They could be recalled by the bishop, and re-attached to the city church (so late as Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 12). But gradually they became fixed in their several districts, or "parœciæ." As such they were at first called "cardinales,"^a a term which was also applied to the permanent chaplains of endowed oratories (e.g. by S. Greg. M. Epist. xii. 11), and was ultimately superseded in the case of almost all parishes, except the Roman tituli, by the terms diocesani, e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 22; Tarracon. c. 13, parochitani, parœciani, parochiales, Conc. Emerit. c. 18; 3 Tolet. c. 4; 7 Tolet. c. 4; 9 Tolet. c. 2; locales, 3 Tolet. c. 20; forastici, Can. Martin. Brac. c. 15 (translating the ἐπιχώριοι πρεσβύτεροι of Conc. Neocæs. c. 13).

Such is in outline the history of the origin of the parochial system. When it finally came to prevail, it tended to absorb into itself the other systems upon which Christian communities had been organized, and, although only after struggles which stretch far into the middle ages, and not without the co-operation of the civil power for the purposes of political convenience, to spread the network of its elaborate organization over the whole of Western Christendom. But it will be noted that the history which has been given takes account only of rural or suburban districts, and of towns which were included in such districts. It is necessary to explain briefly the extension of the system—i. to episcopal cities; ii. to privately founded churches.

(i.) In the larger cities, some kind of subdivision soon became necessary, not only because a single building became too small for worship, but also because a single organization became too cumbrous to discharge effectively the various functions of discipline and of charity which the church assumed to itself. But instead of subdividing the church into separate communities, each complete in itself, the theory of the unity of the church was preserved by assigning to each community one or more presbyters, and regarding these presbyters as forming collectively a single συνέδριον, or consilium, under the presidency of a single bishop. This was the case at Alexandria; each district and quarter (λὰβρα) of the city had its own church and its own presbyter (S. Epiphanius adv. Hæres. 68, 4; 69, 1; Sozom. H. E. i. 15). This was also the case at Rome. The earliest certain evidence which we possess on the point is the letter of Cornelius in Euseb. H. E. vi. 43, which says that there were at that time forty-six presbyters at Rome. A few years later Optatus (de Schism. Donat. ii. 4) mentions that there were more than forty basilicas; it is inferred that there was one presbyter for each basilica, and probably a larger number for the bishop's basilica. The Liber Pontificalis is of less authority as to the early period, but is more precise in its details. The earliest account which it gives is that St. Evaristus assigned churches and their revenues in Rome to presbyters ("titulos in urbi Roma divisit presbyteris." Vit. S. Evarist. p. 6). The next account is that St. Dionysius assigned churches to presbyters, and instituted cemeteries and parishes (the text is partly uncertain: Bianchini reads "parochias dioceses instituit," but probably the second of these words is a gloss of the first, as parochia was a comparatively rare word in Italy, and also as Hincmar of Rheims Opusc. in caus. Hincm. Laudun. c. 15 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxvii. 380 and the Pseudo-Isidore, Epist. ii. Dionys. c. 3; Hinschius, p. 196, evidently read "parochias" only). A few years afterwards, pope Marcellus is said by the same authority to have instituted twenty-five "tituli" at Rome, "quasi dioceses propter baptismum et poenitentiam multorum qui convertebantur e paganis" (Vit. S. Marcell. p. 31). It may be inferred from these three accounts that in the first instance the presbyters of the several Roman churches had no special district assigned to them, and that probably they were not even attached to any particular church. After the time of pope Dionysius, each church had its own clergy, its own proper district, and its own revenues. The presbyters, deacon, and sub-deacon of each church were "cardinales," i.e. fixed to the given church; but collectively, as at Alexandria, they formed a single body, which, by corporate continuity, with changes of detail but not of principle, remains to this day as the "collegium sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ cardinalium."

But the questions of the relation of these "tituli," "parochiæ," or "dioceses," to the "regiones" into which the city was also divided for ecclesiastical purposes, and also of the degree to which they were analogous to the parishes of other parts of Christendom, are questions which do not seem to admit, upon extant evidence, of any certain answer (some help towards the solution of the first of these questions will be found in the treatises of the learned 16th-century antiquary, Onuphrio Panvino, ap. Mai, Spicilegium Romanum, vol. vi., and in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. Comm. præv. in Ord. Rom. c. 3).

(2) Co-ordinate with the normal formation of Christian communities by the aggregation of the Christians of a city or district, and their organization, whether under presbyters or bishops, was the custom of erecting places of worship upon the estates of landed proprietors. In the first instance there appears to have been no restriction upon the erection of such places of worship; the civil law, for fiscal reasons, required the officers of such churches to be taken from the estate (law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 398, Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 33 = Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 11), but otherwise until the middle of the 6th century left them practically free. It is not clear whether Conc. Chalced. c. 4, which forbids the erection of μοναστήριον ἢ ἐκκλήριον οἶκον without the consent of the bishop of the city, refers to these churches; if, as appears most probable from the general tenor of the canon, it does not refer to them, the

^a That cardinalis in this use, which was transferred from certain civil offices under the empire, means "fixed" is rightly maintained by Gothofred, ad Cod. Theodos. 12, 6, 7, Böcking, Notitia Dign. Orient. c. 5, 2, vol. i. pp. 24, 205; it is shown, e.g. by a letter of pope Zachary to Pippin (Epist. 8, c. 15, Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxix. 935) who will not allow a "presbyter cardinalis" to be appointed on a private estate, but rules that whenever masses are required in private oratories a presbyter must be specially asked for from the bishop. The other late Latin meaning of "cardinalis" (i.e. præcipuus, according to Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 135), is less applicable to either its civil or its ecclesiastical use.
